TO THE MOST HIGH AND MIGHTIE MONARCH, ELIZABETH, (MY DREAD SOVE-RAINE) BY THE GRACE OF GOD, QVEENE OF EN-GLAND, FRANCKE, AND IRELAND, DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, &c.

ALL my labour whatsoever, in translating another mans worke, I present here unto your Highnesse, and consecrate to the happie and immortal memorie of your most sacred Majestie. An attempt (I confesse) in regard of mine owne imperfections, venturous and overbold; as the first enterprise, right, hard and exposed to perill. Yet, most Worthie and Powerfull Emperesse, Who is there so unsufficient, that by the favourable aspect of your countenance, may not be graced and enabled? What so difficult and dangerous, which under the fortunate auspices of your Majestie, cannot be effected with ease and passe in safetie?

Accept then, most gracious Lady, the first fruits of a few-years studie, for the benefit enjoyed of life and libertie. An offering, as well in that respect, as of my selfe the meannest of many thousands, under all proportion; but considering either the argument or the first Author, not much unfitting. Hee, in penning the Historie of the greatest state in his time, for exquisite eloquence had not his equall; no more than your Highnesse in glorious government at this day, any second: Such are the incomparable perfections resplendent in your Royall person; the Wonder of the world.

Vouchsafe also, of your accustomed clemencie shewed to aliens; of your fervent zeale to learning and good letters, wherein (among other rare vertues and singular gifts seated in your Heroicke mind) no Prince cometh neere unto your Excellencie, to reach forth your gracious hand to T. Livius; who having arrived long since & conversed as a meere stranger in this your famous Iland, & now for love thereof learned in some sort the language, humbly craveth your Majesties favour, to be ranged with other freedizens of that kind: so long to live under your princely protection, as hee shall duly keepe his owne allegiance, and acquaint your liege subjects with religious devotion after his manner, with wisdom, pollicie, vertue, valour, loyaltie; and not otherwise.

And the Almighty guard your Majestie alwaies with his holy angels: prolong your life among us in perfect health: adorne your noble heart with divine graces: maintaine your regall estate in all honour: blesse the rest of your daies (and infinite may they be) with sweet repose and firm peace, to the joy of your true-hearted and loving people: and finally, accomplish all your desires, for present prosperitie and future felicitie.

Your sacred Maiesties most humble and obedient subiect,

Philemon Holland.

TO THE READER.

THe is that Axiome received from Philosophie, τὴν ἑνὸς φθορὰν γεννᾷ τὸ ἐκείνης εἶναι. i. The corruption of one thing is the generation of another. Thus out of the ashes and ruines of Troie sprung the citie of Rome: and by the wofull fall of that one state, arose not only the most glorious empire of the Romans, but also the best writer of their historie, Titus Livius. For wher-as after the fatall destruction of Troy, two principall men of name remained alive, Aeneas and Antenor: the one with his fleet arriving in that coast of Italie where Tybre runneth, built Lavinium, and became the first father of the Romans, according to Virgil in the first Aeneid:

— genus unde Latinum, Albanique patres, atque alta moenia Romæ.

— from whence are Latines come,
The noble Albanes eke, and vvalles of stately Rome.

Antenor entered the Venice gulf, and founded the citie of Padua, the native place of Livie their historiographer; as the same Poet writeth a little after:

Hic tamen ille urbem Patav! sedesque locavit Teucrorum, &c.

Yet here the citie Padua built he: therein to plant His Trojanes, lest when Troy vvas lost, vvhose resting seat did vvant.

And I wor not wel, whither they were more beholden to that fortune of theirs, (wherof so much they boasted) for Aeneas the author of their beginning & admirable greatnes: than for this writer Livie, who comended their deeds to everlasting fame. For from their very first rising, even vvvith Aeneas, unto their sensible declining and decay, were not twelve hundred yeeres compleat: but since Livie enchronicled their acts, sixtene hundred are come and gone: yet continue they as fresh this day as at the first, and spred still farre and neere into all parts of the vworld. So much more durable and permanent are the memorials recorded by learned Historians, than either any monarchie bee it never so great, or all those vvonderfull Pyramides and Obeliskes, reared by most magnificent kings, and mightie emperors, to immortalize their name and memorie. This T. Livius then, vvas borne at Padua, in the yeere 694 after the foundation of Rome, when L. Afranius and Q. Cecilius Metellus Celer vvere Consuls. He flourished all the time of Augustus Caesar, and died in the fourth yeere of Tiberius: By vvhich account, hee lived full LXXVI. yeeres: as appeareth by an auncient Epitaph upon his tombe at Padua, (where it is thought hee died) with the pourtraict of his visage: whereof the one is represented here, and the other immediatly before the beginning of the Historie.

TO THE READER.

Other evidences there be concerning the same, which needlesse it were to call to witnesse: for no Epitaph nor inscription either enchaſed in ſtone or cut in braſſe, is there left; better than the monuments of his owne writings (if they had come entire to our hands) and the teſtimonie of good and approved authors. For during the time of Augustus, he wrote the worthe deeds of the Romanes, and continued the narration thereof, from the verie foundation of the cittie of Rome unto the one and twentieth yeere of his Empire. A ſtorie of 750 yeeres, and a peece of worke for the artificiall frame and elegant ſetting out, comparable to the beſt in that kind. My purpoſe is not here, to enter into a large field and rhetoricall diſcourſe of his praifes in regard of any gifts of fortune where-with he was plentifully enriched: namely, the place of his nativitie, a cittie more auncient by 400 yeeres than Rome; flouriſhing in martiall puiſſance, able to ſet out and maintaine 100000 fighting men for the warres; in ſtately port at home, having a nobilitie of 400 in number; in gorgeous and coſtly buildings; in traffique and frequent affluence of Merchants thither; as alſo, that Venice was a Colonie deducted and drawne from thence; and, which is not the leaſt, how at this day the famous Vniverſitie there, affourdeth excellent profeſſors in all kind of learning: nor his happineſſe and felicitie to live and die with the glorie and beautie of Rome, and not to behold with his eyes thoſe daies of her declining ſtate and deformitie, which in great wiſdome he foreſaw in his ſpirit, and denounced accordingly: ne yet the ſpeciall favour wherein hee ſtood with his prince Augustus, and Livia the Empreſſe; much leſſe then meane I to ſet forth the ſingular qualities and perfections of his mind, and namely his rare and paſſing eloquence; which my pen is no more able now to deſcribe and amplifie to the worthineſſe thereof, than it was to imitate and expreſſe the ſame in tranſlating of his ſtorie. Moreover, if I ſhould ſet into his commendation, beſides that I muſt needs come farre ſhort of his merit, the thing it ſelfe would but renew the juſt griefe, that all learned men have taken for the piteous maime and defect of that notable peece of worke and uniforme compoſition which hee left unto poſteritie. For having digeſted the whole hiſtorie into an hundred and two and fortie bookes, as Petrarch was of opinion, and as Sigonius therein well colleceth: like as alſo it is evident by the Breviaries of L. Florus the Epitomiſt, whereof vve have 140, vvith an evident flawv and default of twaine, to vvith, the 136 and 137: ſee the partiall iniurie of the time, the crooked & maligne deſtinie of the man! Bookes of farre leſſe moment and importance, yea and thoſe of greater antiquitie, have been ſpared and remaine ſafe: but of that vvork of his, one fourth part hath not eſcaped the envie of fortune: and that vvich nowv is extant, hath been delivered unto us either by fragments of old copies unperfect, or by the over-curious meddling of ſome buſie Ariſtarches of late daies depraved, who vvith their correcting have corrupted; & in ſtead of reforming vvords, have deformed the naturall ſenſe and primitive conſtruction. Where, by the vvay, I muſt advertiſe the Reader of that vvich Petrus Crinitus hath obſerved, even againſt the common opinion approved by thoſe vvho otherwiſe are vvell learned, namely that our Author diſpenſed not this hiſtorie into Decades: that is to ſay, luted and ſorted them not into ſeverall Tomes and Sections of ten bookes a peece. For Triſcian and other old Grammarians, vvhen when they cite any testimonie out of Livie, quote the book, and make no mention at all of any Decade: and with him the abovenamed Petrarch, Florus, & Po-litian doe agree. Now in these 35 bookes, so few as they be, preserved as another Palladium out of a generall skarefire, we may conceive the rare and wonderfull eloquence of our vvriter in the whole: for the farther he proceedeth into a world as it were, of matter, the more copious still he floweth; and vvith such varietie, as that he never iterateth one thing twice; but at every change of new affaires, returneth alwaies fresh and gay, furnished vvith new deuises, inventions, and phrased: much like a second Anteus, gathering greater strength & more forces still at every turn; or after the maner of a little rill, vvhich issuing from a small source, is maintained vvith fresh springs and new riverets; & hastning toward the vast ocean, carrieth a deeper channell & broader streame. For the forme of his style, I referre the readers to the sound & staied iudgement rather of Quintilian, who cōpareth him vvith Herodotus, Thucydides, & the best Greeks; than to the fantastical conceits of some Criticks of our time, vvho seeking nodum in scirpo, have dreamed of I vvot not vvhat Parauinitie in him. What should I speake of that Patheticall spirit of his in moving affections? But, that vvhich most of all commendeth an historie, vvhich being lux veritatis, ought especially to deliver vvith synceritie the vvhole truth & nothing but the truth, vvithout respect of face or person: to keep only to the substance & train of the subiect arguēt; the due & orderly regard of the important circumstances thereto belonging, vvithout inserting extravagant & impertinent by-matters, much lesse then, fabulous tales: therein he hath the pricke and price above all others. For, neither forbeareth he to reprove (as occasion is offered) the Romans, in whose fauour he might be thought to have vvritten, nor doubteth to praise the good parts & the valiant exploits of their mortall enemies. The Gauls he may seem to gall more bitterly upon a sinister affection, glauncing at them, as he doth, in many places for their greedie desire of gold & idle slouth, as not able to endure any long travell, and hear least of all: yet so, as the French now living, seeme not much offended therewith: for above other nations they have given him most friendly intertainment, and twise enfranchised him among them.

I am not unwilling to touch by the way this principal point and vertue of an Historio-grapher, I meane the deliverie of a simple truth in his narrations: for that I have observed in him throughout, that he hath been most modest in reporting from others by hearesay any thing that soundeth to an untruth: so little deserveth he to be noted with the infamous brand of lye. The vvare circumspection of his in that behalfe vvhich I dare be bold to recommend unto the reader, I proposed unto my selfe in making him english; endeavoring by conference especially of the select copies in Latin, yet not reiecting other translations (such as I had some little skill in) to come as neere as possibly I could, to the true meaning of the Author: making this account, that if I could approve my diligence that way to men of reason and understanding, all other my wants and defects might sooner be passed by and pardoned. A desire I had to performe in some sort, that which is profitable to the most, namely, an english Historie of that C.W. which of all others (if I have any iudgement) affourdeth most plenteous examples of devout zeale in their kind, of vvisedome, pollicie, iustice, valour, and all vertues vvhatsoever. According to this purpose & intent of mine I framed my pen, not to any

any affected phrase, but to a meane and popular stile. Wherein, if I have called again into use some old words, let it be attributed to the love of my countrey language: if the sentence be not so concise, couched and knit together, as the originall, loth I was to be obscure and darke: have I not englished everie word aptly? Each Nation hath severall maners yea and tearmes appropriate, by themselves: have I varied in some places from the French or Italian? censured I looke to be, and haply reprooved: but like as Alcibiades said to one, παραφοινίζεις ἀνέ-σσοι, i. Strike hardly (Euribiades) so you beare me speake: even so say I; Find fault and spare not; but withal, read the original better before ye give sentence. And how-soever I have faulted otherwise by oversight, set against it my affection & desire to do some good whiles I live to my sweet native country: adde thereto the long travell that I have taken to testifie the same: and if that will not bring down the ballance, let the profit and delight both, which you shall find in the argument and discourse of the historie, countrepoise and over-weigh my wants, more or lesse. And thus I recommend unto my countrymen, Livie in English habit: Livie (I say) who whether he were more honored whiles he lived, than beloved at this day of forrein nations, I cannot easily determine. For like as then, (by the testi-monie of S. Hierome, and Plinie in his Epistles) there repaired many great and noble personages from the farthest parts of Spaine and Fraunce, only to see his face, for the admiration they conceived of him by the fame of his incomparable eloquence: even so of late time, his spirit (which yet liveth in his writings) hath made a voyage by Florence into the same Fraunce and Spaine; and hath passed as far as into Arabia one way, & Almaine another. In which dissite and remote parts he hath found such kind entertainment, not only in courts of emperours and kings, in pallaces of princes and great potentates; but also with the people in generall: that they seeme to strive no lesse (who may endow him with most ample franchises and free burgeoisie) than those seven citties in old time who every one chalenged to themselves, the birth of the poet Homer. Since then, he hath thus long been desirous to crosse the seas into this noble Iland, not as a travailer to sojourne for a time, in the Court onely or the Vniversities; but to remaine here still both in citie and countrey, and thereto hath learned our language indifferently; let it now appeare that this nation of ours (like to reap as great fruit and benefit by his acquaintance as any other) is readie also to receive and embrace him as friendly as the rest.

THE FIRST BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF TITVS LIVIVS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the said Booke.

He coming of Aeneas into Italy, and his acts there: the reigne of Ascanius in Alba¹ of Silvius Aeneas, and so forth of other Sylvii, kings thereof, are contained in the first book. The daughter of Nannitor with child by Mars. Romulus and Remus are borne. Amulius killed. The cittie of Rome built by Romulus. The Senat by him chosen. Romulus.²² He made warre with the Sabines. He presented unto Iupiter Evectus the votall spoiles of their king, whom he slew with his own hands. He divided the people into Centuries, vanquished the Fidenates and Veintians, and was canonised a god. Numa Pompilius Numa Pompili-^{us. 22} taught the rites and ceremonies of sacrifice and divine service, erected a temple to Luna, and was the first that shut the doores thereof, after he had made peace with all the nations thereabout: and faining that hee had secret compaignie and conference by night with the goddess Egeria, won the stout and fierce hearts of the people to religion. Tullus Hostilius warred upon the Albanes, Tullus Hostili-^{us. 3.} whereupon ensued the combat of the three brethren, twins on both sides. Horatius was acquit for killing his sister. The execution of Metius Suffetius. Albans raised and destroyed. The Albanes made five daizens of Rome, and there dwelt. War denounced against the Sabines. Finally, Tullus was consumed with lightning. Ancus Marcius renewed the ceremonies by Numa first ordained. Vnto the Latines being conquered and made citizens of Rome, he assigned the mount Aventine to inhabit. He won againe by force, a towne of the Latines called Politorium, which the old Latines had surprised and possessed themselves of, and utterly destroyed it. He made the Sublician or wooden bridge over Tybris, and adjoined to the cittie the hill Laniculum. He enlarged the bounds of the Empire, built Ostia, and reigned three and thirtie yeares. In the time of his reigne, Lucumo the sonne of Demavatus a Corinthian, removed from Tarquinus, a cittie of Tuscane, and came to Rome: and there entering into amitie with Ancus, began to beare the name of Tarquinus, and so to be called: and after the death of Ancus took the kingdome upon him. He increased the number of the Senators, by one hundred, subdued the Latines, appointed the Circus or Theatre, set forth the publicke games and plaues: and being warred upon by the Sabines, he augmented the centuries of the horsemen. And for to make proofe and triall of Ancus Nanius the Augur: his cunning, he demanded of him, as they say, whether that which he conceived in his mind, were possible to be effected: and when he made answer that it was, he commanded him to cut a whetstone in two with a rasour, which out of hand was by Ancus done. Moreover, he won the field of the Sabines, and deffited them, walked the cittie about, made the vaulted finkes: and when he had reigned eight and thirtie yeares, was murdered by the sonnes of Ancus. There succeeded after him Servius Tullius, the sonne of a captive, a noble lady of Corniculum, who being a child, lying swaddled in the cradle, had a flame of fire as the report goeth burning about his head. He deffied the Veientes and Uscianes in battell: He was the first that numbred the people of Rome, valued their goods, and instituted the Lustrum every five yeares, in which were reported to have been numbred eightie thousand citizens. Hee described the Classe and Centuries: set out further the bounds of the Pomerie, without and within the cittie walls: and put to the cittie, the hills Quirinalis, Viminalis, and Esquilinus. He together with the Latines, founded the temple of Diana in mount Aventine, and when hee had reigned foure and thirtie yeares, hee was with the privitie and by the counsel of his daughter Tullia, murdered by L. Tarquinus, the sonne of Priscus. After him L. Tarquinus Superbus assumed the kingdome, without the election, either of the Senators or the people. On which day Tullia (most wicked and caused wretch that soe was) caused her coach to be driven over the corps of her father, lying dead on the ground. Hee had about him a troupe of armed men for the guard of his person. By a subtile wile he put to death Tarminus Herdonius. He had warre with the Volsicans, and of their spoiles edified a temple to Iupiter, on the hill Capitol, where the god Terminus and goddess Lucretia, agreed not to be displaced, whose alters could not be shivered nor removed, as the others. By the fraudulent practise of his son Sext. Tarquinus, he brought the Gabians to his obedience. Vnto his other two sonnes, being gone to Delfi, and consulting there the Oracle, whether of them should be king of Rome, answer was made, That he should reigne who first kissed his mother: which answer they interpreting wrong, Junius Brutus, who accompanied them in the night made as though he caught a fall, and kissed the ground, the mother indeed of all: which proved true on G his enemies fell out in the end. For when as Tarquinius Superbus by his proud tyrannicall demeanour had incurred the hatred of all men: he at last upon the forcible outrage and villanie done by Sex. Tarquinius (his sonne) in the night slew him: the brother of Lucretia: who finding for her father Tricipitinus, and her husband Collatinus, besought them earnestly not to see her death avenged, and so with a knife killed himselfe. I say, by the means of Brutus, especially was driven and expelled out of Rome, when he had reigned five and twentie yeares. Then were the Consuls first created, Lucius Brutus, and Lucius Tarquinius Collatinus.

Hether in writing the acts and affairs of the people of Rome, from the first foundation of the citie, I shall performe a worke of importance and worth my traualle, neither wote I well, nor if I wist, dare I advouch: seeing it is a thing both old and usuall; that new Writers alwaies perswade themselves, either in matter to deliver more truth and certaintie, or in manner of curious penning thereof, to outgoe the rudenesse of elder time. Howsoever it fall out, this yet will doe me good, that even I also, to the utmost of my power, have endeavoured to eternise the worthie deeds of that people which is the soveraigne of the whole world. And if among so manie writers, my fame chance to be obscure, yet may I comfort my selfe in this, That they who shall darken and shadow the same, are men so highly reputed and renowned. Besides, the thing it selfe is of infinite toile and labour, as computing and comprising from above 700 yeares past, and which arising from small beginning hath proceeded and growne so great, as now the bignesse thereof is comberous to it selfe: and I doubt not, but the readers for the most part will take but small delight and pleasure, either in those rare fetched originals, or in the times next ensuing, for halt they make to these novelties of latter daies, wherein the puissance of that so mightie people hath wrought long since their owne downefall and overthrow. But I contrariwise will seeke even this for guerdon of my paines, namely, to turne away from beholding these calamities, which this our age for manie yeares hath seene, so long at least: whilest I call to remembrance, and wholly employ my spirits in considering those ancient monuments of old time, exempt from care and trouble, which were able, if not to withdraw my mind as I write, from the truth, yet to make it pensive and heavie. As for such things as are reported, either before, or at the foundation of the citie, more beautified and set out with Poets fables, than grounded vpon pure and faithfull records, I meane neither to averre nor disprove. This leave and priviledge hath antiquitie, by interlacing the acts of gods and men together, to make the first rising of cities more sacred and venerable. And if it may be lawfull for anie people under heaven to consecrate and ascribe vnto the gods their Original: certes, such is the renowned martiall prowes of the Romans, that all nations of the world may as well abide them to report Mars above the rest, to be the stockefather both of themselves and of their first founder, as they can bee content to liue in subiection vnder them. But these and such like matters, howsoever they shall hereafter be censured or esteemed, I will not greatly weigh and regard. This would I have everie man rather to thinke upon in good earnest, and consider with me what their life, and what their carriage was, by what men and means both in war and peace, their dominion was achieved and enlarged. Afteward, as their discipline began by little and little to shrink, let him marke how at the very first their behaviour and manners sunke withall: and how still they fell more and more to decay and ruine; yea and began soone after to tumble downe right even untill these our daies, wherein wee can neither endure our owne forces, nor salves for the cure. For this is it that is so good and profitable in an historie, when a man may see and behold as in a conspicuous monument and lightesome memoriall, the lively examples of all sorts, set up in open view for his instruction, whereout he may chuse for himselfe and his countrey what to follow, as also learne, how to eschew a foule enterprise, and avoid a shamefull end. But unless I be deceived with the affectionate love of mine owne commended worke, never was there Commonweale, either more mightie, more holie, and devout, better stored of good precedents, or into which covetousnesse and excesse more lately crept, or wherein povertie and frugallitie, were so greatly or so long time honored, in so much, as the more they wanted, the lesse they desired. Now of late daies wealth hath brought

A brought in avarice, abundant pleasures have kindled a desire by riot, lust, and loose life, to perish and bring all to naught. But these complaints, which will be nothing pleasant, no not when perhaps they shall be needfull, banish we must (howsoever we doe) at our first entrance of so weightie a matter: when as we rather should begin (if as the Poets use, it were our manner also) with good offices and luckie forepeakings, with vows and prayers to gods and goddes, to vouchsafe their furtherance and happie successe to the enterprise of so great a worke.

B Ifst of all, this is generally held for certaine, That the Greekes, after the winning of Troy, delt cruelly with all the Trojans, save only Aeneas and Antenor: to whome, as well in regard of the bond of mutuall entertainment, as also for that they ever perswaded peace and the rendring againe of Helene, they wholly forbore to shew any rigor at all, as by martiall right of warre they might have done. And how Antenor afterwards, accompanied with a number of Henetians, who driven by civill discord out of Paphlagonia, and having lost at Troy their king Pylemenes, were to seeke both a resting place, and a captaine to conduct them, arrived through many adventures and accidents of fortune, in the inmost gulfes of the Adriaticke sea: and after they had expelled the Euganians that inhabited betweene the sea and the Alpes, those Henetians together with the Trojans, kept those parts and there remained. The place where first they landed, hight Troy, whereof the territorie and signorie thereabout was also named Troy, and the whole people in generall called Henetians. Moreover, how Aeneas upon like misfortune, having fled his countrey, yet aspiring by the fatal direction of the destinies to greater affaires, came first into Macedonie: and after into Sicilie, seeking an abiding place: and sailing with a fleet from Sicilie, arrived at length, and landed in the countrey of Laurentum: which place likewise was cleaped Troy. Where the Trojans being set a shore, having after their long wandering, nothing in a manner left them but ships & armor, as they forraied & drave booties out of the countrey, King Latinus with the Aborigines, who at that time inhabited those parts, ran forth in warlike manner out of towne and country, to withstand the violent invasion of these strangers. But what befell thereupon, is two manner of waies reported. Some say, that Latinus being in a battell vanquished, first made peace with Aeneas, and after that allied himselfe to him by marriage. Others affirme, that as both armies stood ranged in battell array, before the trumpets sounded the battell, Latinus came forth into the vaward, and called out the generall of the strangers to parle: demanding who they were, from whence they came, by what chance they departed from their owne home, and to what end they entred the Laurentine borders? After that he heard the companie were Trojans, the Captaine Aeneas, sonne of Venus and Anchises, and that upon the burning of their citie, they having forgone their countrey, sought some place to abide and build them a citie in: wondred much, not onely at the noblenesse of the people and their leader, but also at their courageous hearts, resolved either for war or peace: whereupon, by giuing his right hand, he plight his troth, and faithfully promised them friendship and amitie. So the two generalls made a league, and each host saluted other. And Aeneas was by Latinus entertained and lodged in the court. Where Latinus solemnly in presence of his familiar household gods, by giving his daughter in marriage to Aeneas, joined private alliance to the former publicke confederacie. Which thing truly put the Trojans in good hope and full assurance, to end one day their wandering and flitting to and fro, and to settle themselves in one certaine place of abode. Hereupon, a towne they built, which Aeneas of his wives name called Lavinium. Within a while, by this new marriage, he had issue a sonne: whom the parents named Ascanius. But after all this, were both Trojans and Aborigines warred upon. For Turnus king of the Rutilians, unto whom Lavinia before Aeneas his coming, had beene espoused, taking it to heart that a stranger was preferred before him, made warre both upon Aeneas and Latinus: but neither armie departed from the battell with joy and well apaid. For the Rutilians were vanquished: the Aborigines and Trojans wan indeed the field, but lost their Captaine Latinus. Then Turnus and the Rutilians mistrusting their owne strength, fled for succour to the puissant and mightie Tulcanes, and to their king Mecenius, who keeping his roiall court at Cere, a towne in those daies of great wealth, not well pleased even from the first beginning, with the foundation of a new citie, and supposing the Trojans power was already much more encreased, than might well stand with the safetie of the borderers, joined full willingly his forces with the Rutilians. Aeneas to win the hearts of the Aborigines against so dreadfull and dangerous warre, to the end, they all should not onely live under one government, but also be all of one name, called both nations Latines. And from that time forth were the Aborigines nothing inferiour to the Trojanes in love and loialtie towards their prince Aeneas. Aeneas also trusting confidently in the valiant and faithfull hearts of these two States, growing vp daillie more and more in mutuall amitie, albeit Hetruria was so mightie, that the name thereof was renowned not onely throughout the inland parts, but the sea coasts also, even from one end of Italie to the other, from the Alpes to the narrow seas of Sicilie: yet whereas he might well have resisted the force of his enemies, and maintained a defensive war within his wals, he brought his armie forth into the open field. This was the second battell that the Latines fought, and the last deed that ever Aeneas whilest he was man, achieved. And howsoever by right he ought to be named, he lieth interred upon the river Nimicus, and Jupiter Indiges men him call. Now was not Ascanius, Aeneas his sonne, ripe as yet for age to sway the scepter. Howbeit the roiall crowne remained whole and safe for him, untill he came to fourteene yeares of age. So long continued the state of the Latines, and the kingdome by grandfire and father descended, unto the childes behoofe, under the government onely of a woman, as protectresse: of so vertuous disposition and princely carriage was Dame Lavinia. Doubtfull much I stand (for who can certainly avouch a thing so long agoe) whether this were that Ascanius, or one elder than he, who had to his mother Cressa, whilst Ilium flourished, and who fled with his father from thence, and from whom being named also Iulus, the house and familie of the Julij doe fetch their name and pedigree. That same Ascanius wheresoever or of whomsoever he was borne (but Aeneas his sonne of a truth he was) when Lavinium grew exceeding populous, left that citie now flourishing and wealthie (as the world went then) unto his mother or stepmother, I wot not whether. Hee himselfe built another out of the ground under the mountaine Alba, which of the situation thereof, stretching out in length on the side of the hill, was named Long Alba. Betwene the building of Lavinium and Long Alba, which became an under-towne or Colonie drawne out of the other, and peopled from thence, were almost thirtie yeares. But so mightie grew they, especially after the discomfiture of the Tuscans, that neither upon the death of Aeneas, nor during the time of a womans government, nor all the while that the young prince learned to bee a king, durst either Mecentius or the Tuscans, or anie other of the borderers, once stirre or rise in armes. But peace was concluded upon these tearms, That the river Albula, which now they call Tyberis, should divide the Tuscans from the Latines, and limit to either of them their owne bounds. After this raigned Silvius, the sonne of Ascanius, born by chance within the Forrests: who begat Aeneas Silvius, and he had issue Latinus Silvius, by whom were certaine Colonies or pettie townships erected, & the inhabitants named Prisii Latini. And from thenceforth all the kings of Alba continued the surname of Sylvius. This Latinus begat Alba, of Alba came Arys, Arys begat Capis, and of Capis descended Capeus, whose sonne Tyberinus in ferrying over the river Albula, was drowned, and by his name renowned that river unto all posteritie. Next to him raigned Agrippa his sonne, and after him succeeded Romulus Sylvius in his fathers kingdome, who being stricken dead with a thunderbolt, left the crowne to Aventinus. This Aventinus was buried in that hill, which now is part of the citie of Rome, and beareth his name. Then raigned Procas, who had two sonnes, Numitor and Amulius. And unto Numitor, because hee was the elder, he bequeathed by his last will and testament the auncient kingdome of the Sylvians line. Howbeit, might prevaile more than either the will of the father, or the reverent regard of elder brother. For Amulius having driven out Numitor, raigneth himselfe: and not herewith content, heapeth one mischeefe upon another. For first he murdered the issue male of his brother: then by making Rhea Sylvia his brothers daughter, a vestall Nun, and that under colour of honour and dignitie, by perpetuall vowed virginie, he bereft her of all hope of childbearing. But it was a farrall thing, and (as I thinke) which God would have, that so great a citie should be built for to yeeld the ground and beginning of that Empire, which next under the gods is most mightie. For behold, the Vestall virgin was by force deflowered, and after delivered of two twins: and were it that shee thought so in very deed, or because the name and credite of a god might carrie away and cloke the fault more cleancly, shee fathered her bastard children vpon Mars. But neither god nor man was able to save her selfe or her children from the kings crueltie. For the Votarie was committed to clost prison, and there kept bound in yrons: as for the babes he commanded they should bee cast into the

A streame of the river. But (as God would) by good hap the Tyber overflowed the banckes, and the standing waters on either side was nothing rough, yet so, as there was no coming to the deepe current or channell of the very river: and they that brought the infants, hoped well they might be drowned in anie place of the water, were it never so still and low. So to fulfill after a sort, the kings commandement, they laid the children in the next plash they came to: even where as now standeth the figtree Ruminalis, called as they say, Romularis: but all that ground then was nothing but wast desarts, and a very wildernesse. The report yet goeth, that when the ebbe and shallow water was gone, & had left on drie ground the floating trough or vessel, wherein the babes were put forth, a shee Wolfe from out of the mountaines thereby, being a thirst, turned towards the childrens crie, and with their pendant teares so gently gaue the infants sucke, that Fausstulus the head Recue and overseer of the kings cattell, found her licking them with her tongue: who brought them to his homestall, and gaue them to his wife Laurentia to be fostered. There be that thinke, that Laurentia being a common strumpet among these heardmen and sheepeheards, was vially called Lupa. Whereupon arose the occasion of this strange tale and wondrous miracle. Well, so were they borne, and so brought vp. And as soone as they grew once to some bignesse, it was no boot to keepe them within dores, nor to let them idlie tend the cattell, for they would use to hunt abroad in the Forrest: whereby having gotten strength of bodie and courage withall, they were able now, not onely to withstand the violence of wild beasts, and to kill them, but also to set upon common robbers by the high waies side, laden as they were with booties, and to spoile them thereof, yea and divide the prey among the sheepeheards: and as the number of yonkers daillie encreased, with them to keepe hollidaies, to make merrie, and follow their disports. And even in those daies (as men say) was the feastivall pastime Lupercal, used in mount Palatine, which of Palanteum, a citie in Arcadia, was first called Palantium, and after Palatine, wherein Evander, who descended from the Arcadians, long before raigned in that country, and ordained a solemne game and recreation, yearely to be held, as aforetime in Arcadia, in this manner: that young men in the honour of Pan Lyceus, whom the Romans after called Janus, should loosely and wantonly run naked. Now whilest they were busily occupied in this kind of sport, which by vow yearely they performed; there lay in ambush the robbers afore said, in reuenge and for anger of the prizes which they had lost. Where Romulus manfully quit himselfe, but Remus they tooke prisoner: and being thus taken, they brought him before king Amulius, accusing him greivously, and laying especially to his charge, that he with others invaded and made rodes into Numitor his land, and with a power of lustie youths, assembled in warlike sort, had forraied and spoiled the same. Thus was Remus delivered unto Numitor to bee put to death. Now had Fausstulus even since the first day conceived some hope, that there were in his house foster children of roiall blood: For well hee wist, that both by the kings commandement the babes were cast forth to perishe, and also that the time when hee tooke them up, fell out fely thereunto: marie this would hee in no wise should bee knowne in hast, and before due time; unlesse it were either upon good occasion or great necessity. Necessitie happened first: and so for very feare hee was driven to reveale the whole matter to Romulus. It happened also, that Numitor himselfe, having Remus in durance, and hearing they were brethren twins, by comparing their age, and avising withall their very countenance and towardnesse, proceeding from no servile and base parentage, bethought himselfe of his sisters children: and by farther enquire and computation, came so farre, as hee seemed welneere to acknowledge Remus for his nephew. Thus on all hands were meanes wrought to circumvent and surpise king Amulius. For Romulus on the one side not accompanied with a troope of tall fellows, for he was not able in open fight to make his part good: but giving the heardmen his supposts, in charge to come at a time appointed, some one way, and some another, to the kings pallace, hee set upon the king. On the other side, Remus with another crue from Numitor his house, came to second him: and so they slew the king. Numitor at the first upstare giving out effoones, that the enemies had entred the citie, and assailed the kings pallace, and thereupon having called the youth of Alba into the Citadell, to keepe it by force with a good guard, and espying the two young men after the murder done, coming towards him with ioy: forthwith assembled the people together, and declared openly before them all, the wicked dealings of his brother against him, the parentage of his nephewes, the manner of their birth and bringing vp, and how they came to be knowne: after that, hee reported the murder of the Tyrant, and tooke it vpon himselfe as the authour thereof. The two young men passing with their companies through the midst of the people, saluted their grandfire king, whereat the whole multitude also with one accord and voice ratified the same: so was his roiall name and estate by them established. Thus was the whole regiment or kingdom of the Albanes committed to Nunitor. Then Romulus and Remus had a great desire to found themselves a cittie in the verie place where they had bene cast forth and fostered. Now were there of Albanes and Latines both, very manie that might be spared, besides, a number also of heardmen: who, all set together, put them in good hope, that Alba and Lavinium too, would bee but small Citties in comparison of that which now was a building. Whilest they were devising of these things, an old canker came betwene to marre all, even desire of rule and soveraigntie, the same which had troubled their grandfires before them: and thereupon a foule fray, which arose from a final and slight occasion. For as much as they were both twins at one birth, and the respect of their age might yeeld no choice and difference, it was thought good and agreed upon, that the gods, who had the tuition of those places, should by Augurie or flight of birds, declare and shew whether of the twaine should both name the citie, and also rule the same. Romulus chose the mount Palatine, and Remus the Aventine, for their temples or religious quarters, to marke the bird-flight, and each one apart to receive their Augurie. First (as they say) had Remus appearing in flight sixe vultures or gripes: and as tidings came unto him of this Augurie, it happened that the number unto Romulus was presented double: whereupon they were both of them by their supposts and favourites saluted kings. The one side tooke the vantage of the time: the other of the number, for the prerogative of the kingdom. Thus they fell to hot words first, and from chollerike words to blowes and bloodshed: in which sturte and preasse of the people, Remus was wounded and slaine in the place. The more common report goeth, that Remus in scorn of his brother, leapt over the new wals: whereupon Romulus in great choler flue his brother with his owne hands, and in menasing wise, added these words withal, So perish he, what ever else he be, that shal once dare to leape over my wals. Thus Romulus alone became king, and the Cittie new brilt, of the founders name was called Rome. Wherein first hee fortified mount Palatine, in which he was himselfe reared. To all the rest of the gods he sacrificed after the rule and custome of the Albanes: onely to Hercules after the manner of the Greekes, according to the first institution of Evander. For the same goeth, that Hercules vpon a time, after hee had slaine Geryon, drave that way exceeding faire Oxen, and neere the riuer Tybris, where hee had swum ouer with his drove afore him, laid him downe in a faire greene meadow, as well to rest himselfe, being wearie of his way, as also to rest and bait his cattell in so plentifull grasse and forage. There, fallen he into a sound sleepe, as having well charged himselfe with wine and viands, and one Cacus a sheepeheard dwelling thereby, a man right fierce, and bearing him proudly of his strength, being greatly in love with the fairenesse of the beasts, had a good will, and minded to fetch away that bootie: but for that if hee had driven the beasts into his owne cave, the verie trackes would have led the owner of them thither, hee drew the goodliest and biggest of them backward by their tiales into his hole. Hercules early in the morning when he awoke, and beheld his droue, and missed some of his count, went on toward the next cave, if haplie their footing would traine him thither: But seeing all traces from wards, and leading no other way: as one troubled in spirit, and doubtfull what to doe, he began to drive farther out of that theevish and dangerous corner. But as some of the Oxen in driving, missed their fellows behind, and honing after them, bellowed as their nature is: Hercules chanced to heare them loow again, and answere from out of the cave wherein they had been bestowed: whereat he turned backe, and made in hast thither. But as Cacus forcible made head against him, and would have kept him from entrance, Hercules smote him with his club: and for all his calling upon other heardmen for helpe, flew him outright. At the same time Evander, who fled out of Peloponnesus, governed that Countrey, rather by a kind of countenance and authoritie, than by force and lordly command. A man much honoured for his wonderfull invention of letters, a strange and rare thing among those rude and vnlearned fore: but more honoured for the opinion that the people had of his mother Carmenta, reputed to bee a goddesse, whom for her spirit of prophesie, those countries, before that Sibylla came into Italie, had in great reverence and admiration. This Evander being raised with the concurse of the sheepeheards, affrighted about the stranger, guiltie of manifest murder, and hearing of the fact committed, and the occasion thereof: avising well therewith the person of the man, his feiture and favour, more stately a good deale, and carrying a greater majestie than the ordinarie proportion of men, demandeth

A of him who he was. And as soone as he understood his name, his father, and native countrey: O Hercules (quoth he) the sonne of Iupiter, All haile: my mother a most true prophetesse hath foreshewed vnto me, that thou shalt encrease the number of heavenly wights, and that in this place an altar shall be reared and dedicated vnto thee, which the most mightie and richest nation one day of the world, shall name Maxima, and honour according to the ceremonies by thee ordained. In a good houre be it spoken (quoth Hercules) and the offe I gladly accept: and so giving him his hand, faithfully promised to accomplish the will of the gods, and erected streitwaies and consecrated an altar in the place. There and then first, hee sacrificed one of the fairest Oxen, chosen out of the whole drove, calling to the ministerie of that divine service and feast, the Potitij and Pinarij, two most noble houses at that time in those parts. It happened so, by chance, that the Potitij were readie at hand in due time, and the inwards or intrals were set before them: which being eaten, the Pinarij came to the good cheere behind: whereupon the custome held, that so long as the familie of the Pinarij continued, they might not feed of the sacred inwards. But the Potitij, instructed by Evander, became the priests of that holie sacrifice manie ages after: untill the solemne service and ministerie of this familie was put ouer to publicke servants, and the whole stocke of the Potitij utterly worne out and dead. These were the onely forraine sacrifices of all other, that Romulus received and admitted, being even then a furtherer and maintainer of immortalitie, by his owne prowess atchieued, and whereunto his fortune conducted him. Having in this manner religiously performed and established the service of the gods, hee assembled the multitude to an audience: and for that they could by no means but by lawes, bee united together into one bodie and societie of a people, he devised Statutes, and ministred justice unto them. And supposing that those laws would be accounted sacred and inviolable of the wild and rusticall sort of men, in case he shewed himselfe by some regall ensignes venerable: he carried with him a greater port and majestie, not onely in his robes and princely habite, but most of all in the attendance of twelve officers or sergeants, called Libitores, whom he caused to goe ordinarily before his person. Some thinke he chose this number according to the birds, which by Augurie did foreshew and prognosticate his raigne: I rather am of their opinion, who thinke that Sergeants at armes, and this kind of officers came from the Tuscans their neighbours, from whence also the yvorie chaire of estate, called Sella curulis, and the royall purple robe embroidered, named Toga pretesta, was fetched, as also the very number of sergeants or Libitors. For that the Tuscans had this manner, when they chose their king by the common voices of their twelve principall States, each one found a sergeant. All this while grew the cittie more and more to bee fortified with ramparts and bulwarkes, as men still built in sundrie places where they liked best, seeming thereby to provide rather for a future multitude in time to come, than for the present number wherewith it was then peopled. Furthermore, least that the citie so large in compasse, should stand void and vacant, Romulus for to encrease the number of inhabitants (according to the old practise of the founders of cities, who by gathering about them the base multitude and obscure, feined that they were an offspring borne out of the earth) set up a sanctuarie or lawlesse church, called Asylum, in that place which at this day betwene the two groves, is enclosed and fenced round about with thicke briars & brambles. Thither resorted (as to a place of refuge) out of the neighbor countries, a rabble and confused medley of all sorts, rag and rag, bond and free, one with another, folke desirous of change and noveltie.

So began first the citie according to the plot of large buildings, to be wel peopled and grow mightie. Thus being provided of power sufficient: he thought then upon a counsaile and policie to his power. And so created a hundred Senatours: either because that number seemed great ynough, or for that there were no more but one hundred that were of worth to bee elected counsellors or (wife) fathers. These men certainly for honour and dignitie, were called Patres or Sage fathers: and their lineall descent Patritij or nobles. Now by this time was the State of Rome so mightie and puissant, that it was able in fight to match any citie neere adjoining whatsoeuer. But for default of womankind, this puissance was to indure but the age of one man: for neither had they hope of issue among themselves at home, nor yet made marriages with their neighbours abroad. Whereupon Romulus by the advise of his Senatours, sent Embassadors to the countries thereabout, to treat for societie and alliance for his new people, by way of marriage. Alledging that citties also, as well as other things, arose of base beginnings, and in proesse of time by their owne prowess, and helpe of God withall, grow to great power and and reputation: whereas therefore they were full well assured, that as the gods were gracious to their first uprising, so their own vertue and valor should not be wanting: their neighbors ought not, in regard of common humanitie, and as they were men, thinke much and disdain to ioinc in blood and kindred with them, being also men as well as they. Howbeit, this embassage in no place had gentle audience and courteous entertainment. For they all in general despised them, and were in feare for themselves and their posteritie, by reason of so mightie a state, encreasing in the midst of them, and under their very noses. And from the most of them the Embassadors were dismissed and sent away, with this frumpe and demand, Whether they had set up a sanctuarie or lawlesse place for women to? For that were alone, and a fit marriage indeed to fort together. This tooke the youth of Rome in great displeasure, and doubtlesse the quarrell grew like to be tried by knocks. But Romulus dissuading his inward heart-burning, to the end he might find time and place meet for the purpose, prepareth to set forth certaine solemne plaies and games, which he nameth Consualia, to the honor of Neptune Equestris. Hereupon he commanded to proclaim these games al over the country adjoining, and with as great preparation and furniture, as in those daies either their skill or abilitie might afford, they celebrate the same, and all to make the shew more goodly, and worthe so great expectation. Thither resorted manie a one, desirous also to see this new citie, but their next neighbours especially of Cenina, Crustuminum, and Antemnæ: The whole multitude of Sabines likewise came with their wives and children. Who being friendly invited to their houses, from one to another, and courteously entertained: when they beheld the situation of the citie, the strong wals and faire buildings, so thicke standing, wondred how in so short a space the citie of Rome was growne so great. Now when the time of this solemne sight was come, and that their minds were busied, and their eies bent thereon: then at once, as it was agreed before, there arose an uprore. And the youth of Rome upon a token and watch-word given, fell on every side to carrie away the Sabine maidens. A great many of them were ravished by hap hazard, as they did light upon them, and as they came next to their hands. Other some more beautifull than the rest, were appointed for the cheefe of the Senatours, and by certaine of the commons, as they had given them in charge, conveyed home to their houses. But one passing faire and lovely above all others, was harried by the companie or crue of one Thalassius (they say) and when as anie asked to whom they carried her, they ever cried out (for feare she should bee forced or deflowered) Thalassio, Thalassio, Vnto Thalassius. Whereupon Thalassio became a common by-word at weddings ever after. Thus their sport and pastime upon this sturre and fright, was marred, and the parents of the virgines fled away with heaveie cheere, blaming them highly, and complaining of their breach of hospitalitie: and calling upon the god for vengeance, to whose feativall games they being come, were under colour of religion and truth, beguiled. The damfels likewise that were ravished, conceived neither better hope of themselves, nor lesse indignation against them. But Romulus himselfe in person went from one to another, declaring, That their fathers pride, who denied their neighbours marriage, was the cause of all this: promising neverthelesse that they should bee linked in lawfull wedlocke, made partakers of all worldly goods, obtaine the freedome of a citie, and (than which, nothing is more deare to mankind) enjoy the blessing of children: exhorting them to appease their anger, and quiet themselves: and to give them their harts, whose hap it was to have their bodies. For oftentimes upon wrong and iniurie there groweth loue and reconciliation. Alledging moreover, that they should find their spouses so much more louing and kind, as everie one of them for his part would endeavour, after they had in their turne and course fulfilled the dutie to them of good husbands, for to make amends, and supplie the misse they haue of father, mother, and native country. Their husbands withall used faire speeches and flattering words, excusing the matter, and laying all the weight upon fervent affection and pure loue: which kind of persuasion of all other, prevaileth most with womens nature. Thus were the ravished young wives in some sort quietted in mind, and held themselves well contented. But their fathers, then most of all araid in mourning weed, with teares and heauie complaints, stirred vp the Cities where they dwelt: neither contained they their mood within home, but assembled themselves from all parts vnto Tatius the king of the Sabines: and to him repaired their Embassages, for that the name of Tatius was highly renowned in those countries. They of Cenina, Crustuminum, and Antemnæ, who were partly touched and grieved for that wrong done, thought that Tatius and the Sabines dealt but coldly in the action, and went but slowly about revenge. These three nations therefore

A fore banded themselves, and agreed to prepare for warre. But so sharpe let were the Ceninians that the men of Crustuminum and Antemnæ, bestirred not themselves quick ynough for them. So they of Cenina entred alone by force of armes the territories of the Romanes. As they wasted and spoiled without order and measure, Romulus met them with an armie, and in one small skumish made prooffe, how Mood without might is vain and bootelesse. For he discomfited, put to flight, and pursued in chase their whole hoist, slew their king in battell, and him despoiled: and having slaine their generall, at the first assault hee won the towne: and after hee had from thence brought backe his armie with conquest and victorie, as a man no lesse desirous to shew his noble acts with glorie, than to achieve the same by prowesse, he bare afore him on high as a pompeous pageant in a frame fitly for the purpose wrought, the spoile and armour of his enemies captaine, by himselfe slaine: and so ascended up to the Capitoll hill, where laying them downe at the Oke which the sheepeheards had in great reverence, hee consecrated them as a present to Iupiter: and set out withall, the foundation and bounds of a temple unto him: giving moreover this addition and title to the god, and saying solemnely: O Iupiter Feretrius, I king Romulus upon my victorie, present unto thee this armor of a king, and within this compasse of ground, which even now I haue conceived and assigned, I dedicate a temple, to receive those rich and roiall spoiles, which the posteritie, following mine example, shall beare away from the kings and captaines generall of their enemies, whom they shall happen hereafter to kill. This is the very beginning of that temple, which first of all other was in Rome consecrated. And so it pleased God, that neither the first founders words were spoken in vaine, whereby he foretold C and pronounced, that his posteritie should bring their spoiles thither: nor his glorie made vulgar and common to manie compartners with him in the like exploit and glorious present. For after him, in so many yeres, and after so many wars, two roiall spoiles only were won of the enemies. So rare was the happinesse of honour in that behalfe. Whilest the Romanes were thus employed about Cenina, the armie of the Antemnates, taking the vantage of the time, and of the Romanes absence from home, and seeing their frontiers without a guard, with a power of armed men entred the confines of Rome. Against whom also the Romane legion made head in all hast, and finding them scattered out of order in the fields, charged upon them. By reason whereof, at the very first shooke and shout made, discomfited were the enemies and their towne surprised. As Romulus returned with triumph and joy for these two victories, his wife Herstilia, at the importunate sute of the wives that had bene ravished, earnestly besought him to pardon their fathers and receive them into his citie: for so by concord and unitie, the weale publicke, and the good estate of his kingdom might flourish and grow mightie. This sute was gently heard, and soone obtained. After this, he set forth against the Crustuminiens that began to warre upon him: with whom hee had the lesse adoe, for that their courages were well abated already by the ouerthrowes of others. To both these places as unto Colonies, were new inhabitants sent. But the greater number were desirous to enter their names, and to plant themselves at Crustuminum, for the fertilitie of the soile. And manie likewise removed from thence to Rome, the parents especially and kinsfolke of the ravished women. Last of all, the Sabines warred farre more sharply and dangerously than the rest: for nothing did they either in furie or rage, or for covetous desire of spoile. Neither made they talke & shew of war, before they warred indeed and were seene in field. And besides this their confiderat policie, they dealt also with craft & subtiltie. For whereas one Sp. Tarpeius had the charge of the castle in Rome, his daughter a young maiden, Tatius with a summe of money corrupted and procured, at what time as hee went to fetch water without the wals for sacrifice, to receive armed souldiours into the fortresse. But so soone as they were let in, they with their armour smothered and killed her: either for that thereby it might bee thought the castle was woon by force: or because they would make her an example to posteritie, that no traitor should ever thinke to escape unpunished. But here to belongeth a tale, namely, that the Sabines used commonly on their left armes to wear bracelets of massie and weightie gold, and faire rings besides on their fingers, set with precious stones of great value: and that shee covenanted and agreed with them to have that which they ware on their left hands, whereupon shee had their targets in steed of those golden ornaments, heaped upon her. Others say, that upon agreement and covenant made to deliver that which was on their left hands, she demanded their armour, and because she seemed to deale deceitfully, shee was overtaken therewith, and perished by receiving a reward of her owne chusing. However it was, the Sabines were possessed of the castle. From whence the morrow after (when as the Romanes manes armie well appointed in battell ray, had taken up and overspread the whole plaine that lieth from mount Palatine to the hill Capitoll) they would not come downe on even ground before that the Romanes, partly nettled with anger, and partly pricked with an hot desire to recover the castle againe, began with their great disadvantage to climbe against the hill. Whereupon the captaines on both sides joined battaile: Metius Curtius for the Sabines, Hostius Hostilius for the Romanes; who albeit he was on the lower ground, yet in the forefront most courageously and stoutly abid the brunt of the conflict. But so soone as hee was stroken downe and slaine, incontinently the Romanes reculed and gave ground: and thus discomfited, fled backward to the old gate of Palatium. Romulus himselfe also, borne backe with the presse and throng of those that fled, lift up his weapons on high towards heaven, and cried out saying: O Iupiter, I Romulus by thy direction guided and ruled, have here in this mount Palatine laid the foundati-H on of this citie: and now already have the Sabines by corruption and trecherie got the citi-dell and fortresse thereof: from whence they having passed the midst of the vale betweene, make higher in haile with force of armes: but thou O father of gods and men, vouchsafe yet from hence at leastwise to repulle the enemies, deliver the Romans from this so great feare, and stay their shamefull flight. And here to thee O Iupiter Stator I vow a temple, for a memoriall to all posteritie, that by thy present helpe this citie was saved and preserved. Thus having once praised, as if he had knowne for certaine that his praies were heard. Even here (quoth he) O yee Romanes, dooth Iupiter Opt. Max. i. the best and greatest of all the gods command you to stay and begin the battell afresh. Herewith the Romanes, no lesse than if they had been commanded from heaven above, made a stand. And Romulus in person highed him with all speed to the for-most in the vaward. Now was Metius Curtius, principall leader of the Sabines, run downe from the castle, and had scattered and chased the Romanes backe as farre as the Forum or common place of Rome at this day reacheth in length: and being come within a little of the gate of Palatium, he lift up his voice and cried aloud, Vanquish we have these faithlesse friends, and hartlesse foes: and now know they well, it is one thing to ravish maidens, and a farre other thing to fight with men. In this fort as he braved it out, Romulus with a troope of lustie young men, made head against him. Metius haplie at that time, fought on horsebacke, whereby he was forced the sooner to recule, and the Romanes made after and pursued him. The other battell of the Ro-manes in like manner, being much encouraged with the valour of their king, discomfited the Sabines. Metius with his horse under him, affrighted at the noise of them that ran after, leapt into a marsh or bog thereby. Which accident, considering the danger of so great a person, made the Sabines to looke backe to him. And hee verily taking heart againe at the calling and encouragement of many his favourites, escaped. But the Romanes and Sabines both, in the middle valley betweene the two hills, renewe the battell againe: where the Romanes got the better hand.

Then the Sabine dames, for whose wrongfull usage all this war arose, with their haire hanging loose about their shoulders, and renting their garments, for very griefe and sorrow past all feare, ventured to run amongst the javelins & darts as they flew: & thus hauing thrust themselves violently overthwart betweene them, began to part these bloodie armies, and to end their deadly feud: Beseeching their owne fathers on the one side, and their husbands on the other, that they being fathers and sonnes in law, would not embrew themselves with so unkind and unnatural bloudshed, nor as parricides, murder the young ones newly borne, some their graundchildren, and others their owne heirs of their bodie begotten. If ye our fathers, thinke much (say they) of the affinitie betweene our husbands and you: or if yee our husbands are displeased with our ma-riage, bend all your anger and malice against us: we are the cause of this warre, we are the cause of wounding and killing both husband and father: yet will wee rather die, than live either orphans without the one, or widows without the other. This thing mooved as well the multitude of soldiours, as also the captains; and presently of a suddaine all was hushed, and the fight ceased. Whereupon, the Generals came forth to conclude a league. Neither made they peace only, but one citie of two: united their realms, & joined together in the regiment: but the roiall estate they setled in Rome.

The citie thus being made one of twaine, the Romanes for to gratifie the Sabines in some fort, were of Cures, a towne of the Sabines, called Quirites. And for a memoriall of that battaile, the very place where Curtius, after he was gotten out of the deepe marsh, first set his horse on firme ground, was named Curtius his lake. This joyous peace ensuing presently upon so cruell war, made these women better beloued of their husbands and parents: but especially of Romu- lus himselfe. And therefore when hee divided the citie into thirtie wards or parishes, hee called them by their names. But it is not left in any record (for out of all question the women were farre more in number than so) whether those that should give names unto the wards, were chosen by age, or by their owne dignitie and worthinesse, or their husbands degree and calling, or by casting lots. At the same time were enrolled and ordained three centuries of gentlemen or knights: The Ramneses were so cleaped of Romulus, the Titienles of Titus Tatius; but of the name and first beginning of the Lucernians, the occasion is not certaine. So these two kings not onely rai-ged together, but also governed with great unitie and concord. But after certaine yeares the kindred of king Tatius chanced to bear and euill intreat the embassadours of Laurentum. And when as the Laurentines pleaded the law of nations, for satisfaction of this outrage; Tatius his kinsfolke what by favour, and what by intreatie, prevailed more with him than the just complaint of the others. Whereby hee brought vengeance due to them upon his owne head: For being come upon a time to Lavinium, unto a solemne factifice and feast, there in an upore or huribury the people ran upon him, and so was he slaine. Which thing (they say) Romulus, made lesse regard of than was meet: either for that fellowship in lordship is neuer faithfull, or because he esteemed him not unjustly to be made away. Whereupon he forbore indeed to make warre: yet to the end the wrong done to the Embassadours, together with the murder of the king, might bee expiate and purged cleane away, the league betweene the cities of Rome and Lavinium was renewed. But whilest peace verily was beyond mens expectation with them concluded: behold another fresh warre arose, much neerer than the other, and hard almost at their very gates. For the people of Fidene supposing the Romans power and riches to encrease over-much so neere unto them: before they should grow to such greatnesse as they were like to doe, began first to warre upon them: and sending a power of lustie tall souldiours, invaded and wasted all the countrey betweene the citie of Rome and Fidene. And taking their way on the left hand, for that the Tyber kept from the other, they forraied and spoiled as they went, to the great feare of the pezants and countrey people. So as this suddaine tumult and garboile heard out of the fields into the citie, brought the first newes of the warre. Romulus raised therewith (for so nigh a warre might beare no delay) led forth his armie, and encamped within a mile of Fidene: and leaving there a competent guard, hee departed thence with all his other forces, commanding part of his souldiours to lie close in certaine covert places, among the thickets in ambush-ment. Himselfe with the greater number, and all his horse, advanced forward, and riding up and downe before their gates after a disordered and bragging manner, made semblant of a bravado, and all to traine the enemy forth, which was the thing he onely fought. This kind of horse service was a meanes that the Fidenates lesse suspected and marvelled at their flying, which they were to counterfet. For whilest the Cavallirie stood unresolved as it were, in a mammering whither to flie or fight, and the infanterie withall began to retire: all at once the enemies in thrun-ging manner sallied forth of the gates, and chased the Romanes so fiercely, that in their eager pursute they were drawne to the verie place of ambush. Thence the Romanes suddainely arose, and charged the flocke of the enemies: And to encrease their fright, they likewise that were left behind to guard the campe, shewed themselves with banners displayed. So the Fidenates terrified sundrie waies, before well neere that Romulus and his men of armes could reine about their horseheads, turned their backs, and rode full gallop towards the towne againe, and so much the faster for that they fled now in good earnest themselves, that pursued them, who a little before made but semblance thereof. Yet for all this could they not escape the enemy: for the Romanes hard at their heeles, rushed together with them pelmell into the towne, before the gates could be shut against them. At this Fidenatian warre, spreading so dangerously, the Veientians grew angrie in their hearts, and began to chafe. Touched they were also in regard of kindred and alliance: for the Fidenates were likewise Tuscanes. And fearing least (if the Romane forces should thus distresse and lie upon all the borderers) they being so neere, should not goe free, they were the rather pricked forward, and thereupon made rodes, and entred in armes the confines of Rome, spoiling and boothaling, more like robbers than professed warriors. So without pitching any tents, or abiding the coming of their enemies, but onely driving and carrying away great booties out of the fields, they returne againe to Veij. The Romanes contrariwise, not finding the enemies in the field, but yet provided and resolved to give battell, and to hazard all, passed over the Tyber, Whom the Veientians understanding to be encamping themselves, fully minded to come against their citie: issued forth and met them, intending to trie the quarell by dint of sword, and in open field, rather than to be mued up within the town, & to fight & defend themselves from off their houses and wals. There the Romane king with the strength onely of his old beaten souldiours, without anie other helpe and supplie whatsoever, without policie or stratagem, had the better: and having thus discomfited the enemies, he chased them even to their verie wals. And for that the cittie was exceeding strong, fortified as well by naturall situation, as by wals, he forbore to assault it. But in his returne homeward, hee wasted the countrey, more upon a mind to revenge, than hope of spoile. With this defeature, the Veientians no lesse subdued than if they had lost a field, sent Oratours to Rome to sue for peace: unto whom truce was granted for an hundred yeares, but they were amerced to lose part of their lands. These were in a manner all the acts that were done both at home and abroad, during the reigne of Romulus. Whereof none seemed to derogate anie jot from the opinion, both of his divine birth and beginning, and also of his immortallitie or deification after his death. Such was his courageous heart in recovering his grandsires kingdome: his policie and wisdom in founding the cittie first, and after in establishing and governing the same, as well in war as in peace. By whose good proceeding it got such strength, and so sure footing, that for fortie yeeres space after, it enjoyed peace with Italie. Nevertheless of his commonns hee was better beloved than of his nobles: but above all, his souldiours most heartely affected him: of whom he had alwaies about him, as squires of the bodie, three hundred pensioners armed, not onely in time of warre, but also of peace, whom he called Celeres. Thus having atcheeved these noble and immortall deeds, as he upon a time assembled al the people upon the plaine, at the marsh Capra, there to number or muster his annie: behold, upon a suddaine there arose a tempest with great crackes of thunder, which with so thick & cloudie a storme, covered the king, that the people lost the sight of him. And never after was Romulus seene on earth. The Romane youth, after their feare was at length past, and that upon so darke and troublefome weather, it prooved a faire day againe, and calme withall, seeing the kings throne emprie, albeit they credited the Senators that stood next about him, who gave out he was taken up aloft in the storme, yet stricken into sad dumps, as it were for the losse of their father, held their peace a good while. But afterwards, when some few of them had once begun, they all set on and cried aloud, All hail god Romulus the sonne of a god, king and father of the cittie of Rome: With earnest praier beseeching him of his grace, that he would vouchsafe to be propice, and save their offspring and posteritie for ever. I am of this mind, that some there were even then, that suspected and secretly furnished that the king was pulled in peeces by the hands of the nobles. For this rumour also was bruited abroad, although in very darke and obscure tearmes. But by reason of the high admiration of the man, and the present feare withall, the former opinion tooke place, and was more currant. Over and besides, it grew the rather credible, through the politike practise of one person. For as the whole cittie was pensive and sorrowfull for the misse of their king, and sore displeased with the Senators, one Proculus Iulius, a substantiall good author (as men say) and to bee beleevied in a matter of great importance, stepped forth into the assemblie. Romulus (quoth he) O Quirites, the founder and patrone of this cittie, even this verie morning at the day breake, descended suddenly downe from heaven and met me, and as I stood all quaking for feare, readie to worshipp him, and humbly beseeching that I might behold him face to face: Away (quoth he) & tell the Romans, that the will of the gods in heaven is, that my cittie of Rome shall bee the head and cheefe of the whole world: will them therefore to follow and practise chivalrie, and the knowledge thereof: and wot this well, and so let them doe their posteritie to wit, That no power in the world shall be able to withstand the puissance of the Romanes. Which (said he) was not so soone spoken, but he ascended on high, and departed. A wonder it was to see, how much they gave credite to this mans tale, and how greatly the misse of Romulus both among the commonns and the annie, was by this beleefe of his immortallitie, digested.

In this meane while, the Senators fell to strive who should bee king: and the desire of soveraigntie troubled much and perplexed their minds. But as yet, there was no banding nor siding from any one person in particular: for that in a state so newly risen, & of so small continuance, there was not one that far excelled another in authoritie. All the contention was betwene the two severall factions in generall. For they that were descended of the Sabines, fearing least because after the death of Tatius there was none of their part, that had reigned with Romulus in equall jurisdiction, they should now loose their possession and title to the crowne, were desirous to have a king chosen out of their corporation. The old Romanes againe might not abide

A an alien or forrainger to be king. Howbeit, thus diuersly affected as they were, a king they all will needs have, as who (God wot) had not yet tasted the sweetnesse of libertie and freedome. Besides the Nobles began to feare; least peradventure in case the hearts of manie citties thereabout, should not be well disposed, but provoked against them, some forraigne power would make invasion, finding the cittie without government, and the armie without a capitaine. Therefore they all liked well to have one head, but none could find in his heart to giue place unto another. Whereupon the hundred Senatours associate and combine together in the rule of the Common-weale, by deviding themselves into ten Decuries, and for euerie Decurie chusing one to beare the cheefe authoritie. So that ten governed at once, but one alone had the regal ensignes and the Lictors before him. This soveraigntie and preheminnce determined every five daies: and thus went it through them all round in course. After which manner they continued the space of one yeare. And the government upon this occasion was (as it is still at this day) called Interregnum. Then after a yeare began the commonns to grudge and mutter, that their servitude was greater than before, having now lords over them, an hundred for one: and seemed they would no longer endure, but have a king againe, yea and one of their owne chusing. The Senatours seeing them thereabout, and taking it to bee good policie for to offer that of their owne accord, which they were otherwise like to forgoe, carried favour with them in this wise, to wit, by graunting the cheefe prerogative unto the people (in chusing a king) yet so as they gave them no greater privilege, than they reserved to themselves. For thus it was decreed, that when the people had elected a king, it should stand firme and ratified, if the Senatours liked thereof, and gave thereto their roiall assent. And even at this day in making of laws, and chusing magistrates or rulers, the same right is in some sort observed, setting aside the violence of Tribunes. For that now before the people give their voices, the Senatours passe by their authoritie, that which they would have done, saltie out in the assemblie of people, by scrutinie, doubtful as it will. To proceed then, the Interregent having called a generall parliament: In the name of God (quoth he) O Quirites, and which may be to you good, luckie, and prosperous, elect, or nominate yee a new king: for so is the good pleasure of the Nobles and Senatours: and in case yee shall elect a man of such qualitie, as may be deemed worthie to succeed Romulus, then will they by their assent passe the same, and allow thereof. This pleased and contented the commonns so highly, that because they would not seeme behind in bountie and curtesie, they answered againe, that this onely they ordained and agreed upon, to wit, that the Senate should determine who should be king of Rome. Ther was in those daies one Numa Pompilius, much renowned and esteemed for his just life and religious: he dwelt in Cures, a cittie of the Sabines, a man right skilfull and very well seene (as any one might be in that age) in all lawes both divine and humane: whose teacher and first maister, for want of other authour of his science and knowledge (they say) but yet vnruly, was Pythagoras of Samos. Concerning whom, this is well knowne, that he a hundred yeeres after and above, in the daies of Servius Tullius king of Rome, held a schoole of yong men students, that were his disciples, and followed his sect, in the utmost and farthest coast of Italie, about Metapontum, Heraclea, and Croton. From which places (albeit he had lived in that time) what fame of him could spread so farre as to the Sabines? or by what entercourse and affinity of language might hee possible have trained any man unto him for desire of learning at his hands? or by what good meanes and helpe, could Numa trauell alone unto him in safetie, through so many countries, of diuerse tongues and sundrie manners? I am of this opinion rather, that the man by nature was framed and disposed to vertue, and that hee was instructed, not so much in strange and forraigne sciences, as after that strict rule, that sterne and severe discipline of the ancient Sabines; than whom, there was not a nation in times past, more precise, reformed, and void of corruption. The Romane Senatours hearing the name of Numa, although they saw well enough, that the Sabines were like to proove of great reputation and power, by chusing their king from among them, yet was there none of them so audacious, as to preferre either themselves, or any one of their bend and faction, not any one I say, Senator or Cittizen, before that man: but all in generall with one accord, agreed to conferre the kingdome upon Numa Pompilius. Who being sent for and come; like as Romulus at the founding of the cittie was inaugurate King, or attained to the crowne by meanes of Augurie: so hee also would needs, that the will and counsell of God should be sought for, touching his owne election. Whereupon hee was by the Augur (unto whom for ever after that publicke ministerie or priesthood, in regard of honour and reverence by patent belonged) brought unto the castle hill, and there he set him

downe upon a stone, with his face towards the South. Then the Augur on his left side, with head covered, tooke his place: holding in his right hand a smooth staffe without knot or knob, and hooked towards the top, which they called Litus. From whence after that he had with good avisement taken a prospect and view towards the cittie and countrey, and made his prayers to the gods, he limited the quarters of the heaven, from East to West: and the parts Southward he appointed for the right hand, and those Northward for the left. And so farre as ever hee could cast his eie and see forward, he imagined to himselfe a marke: then shifting his staffe into his left hand, and laying the right hand upon Numa his head, he praised in this forme. O father Jupiter, if it may be right and lawfull, that this Numa Pompilius, whose head I lay my hand upon, shall be king of Rome, shew I beseech thee some certaine and manifest signes within that compassse and those precincts, that I have conceived and set out. Then pronounced hee in plaine words what tokens by sight or flight of fowles he would have to appeare. Which being once seene, Numa was declared king, and so came down from the temple or place of prospect above-said.

In this manner, being inaugurate and invested in the kingdome, hee provideth by good orders, lawes, and customes, to reedifie as it were that cittie, which before time had been new built by force and armes. Whereunto, he seeing that they might not be brought and framed in time of warre, whose hearts were already by continuall warfare growne wild and savage: and supposing that this fierce people might be made more gentle and tractable, through disuse of armes, he therefore built the temple of Ianus in the nether end of the street Argiletum, in token both of warre and peace: with this invention, that being open it should signifie, that the cittie was in armes: and standing shut, that all the neighbour countries were in peace and quiet. Twise onely after the reigne of Numa was this temple shut: once, when T. Manlius was Consul, after the first Carthaginian warre was done and ended: and a second time (as God would) in our age for us to see, when as the Emperour Cesar Augustus, after the battell of Actium (with Antonius and Cleopatra) had obtained peace both by land and sea. Numa then having knit the hearts of the borderers about him in firme league and amitie, and thereupon closed up the dores of Ianus, secured now from all feare and care of dangers abroad, yet doubting least through ease and idleness their minds might fall to loosenesse and riot, whom the dread of enemies and martial discipline had held in aw and in good order: devised above all things to strike some feare of God into them, and to plant religion in their hearts: a policie no doubt, with the simple multitude (rude in those daies and ignorant) most effectually. Which reuerence of God, for that it could not sincke nor enter well into their heads, and take a deepe impression, without some devise of a fained miracle, he made semblance, and gave out, that he conversed in the night season, and had, I wot not what, secret conference with the goddesse Egeria. By whose counsell and direction forthwith, he ordained such divine service and sacrifices to the gods, as to them was most acceptable: and to everie god appointed severall priests for the ministerie thereof accordingly. But first above all other things he divided the yeare, according to the course of the Moone, into twelve moneths: and for as much as the Moone hath not full thirtie daies to euerie moneth, whereby some daies are wanting to make up the iust yeare, after the revolution and circle of the sunne: he, by putting the odde daies between everie moneth, so disposed and ordered the yeare, that in every three & twenty years space the daies agreed just to the same point of the sun from whence they began, and so made up the void spaces, and accomplished fully the tearme of everie yeare. He appointed likewise law daies and daies of vacation, called Fasti and Nefasti, thinking it good, that otherwhiles there should bee rest from attendance on the courts, and no dealing with the people. After this, he set his mind about the creation of priests, albeit in his owne person he performed very manie sacrifices, especially those which at this day pertaine to the priest, of Jupiter, called Flamen Dialis. And supposing that in a cittie so martiall, there should succeed more kings like to Romulus than Numa, who in proper person would goe forth to warre: least haply the divine ministerie that belonged to the king, might be neglected, he created a Flamen to Jupiter, for to be a sacrificer continually resident: endued and adorned him with a rich cope or vestiment, and with an yvorie chaire of estate upon wheelles, called Sella curulis. Vnto him he adjoined two Flamines more: one for Mars, another for Quirinus. He instituted also a Nunne-rie as it were, of religious vestall virgines. A priesthood that had the beginning from Alba, and sited well with the house, from whom the first founder of the cittie was descended. And to the end they should attend continually about the church, as resiant chaplaines, he allowed them an

- A ordinarie fee or pension, at the publike charges of the cittie: and made them by perpetuall vowed virginities and other ceremonies to be revered and accounted holic. Likewise vnto Mars Gradivus he elected twelve priests called Salij, and gave unto them a rich purple coat, embroidered for an ornament, and to weare upon that coat a brasse breastplate, and to beare certaine scutcheions or bucklers that fell from heaven, called Ancilia: commanding them to run about the cittie, chaunting hymns and songs, with dancing and leaping full solemnly. Moreover, he chose for a Superintendent or high Priest, Numa Martius, the sonne of Marcus, one of the Senatours: and to him hee gave in writing, set downe under his hand and seale, a rule, whereby he might know what beasts should be killed for sacrifice, upon what daies, and at which temples, and how the monie should be levied and disbursed for the diffaying of all charges.
- B All other sacred rites as well publicke as private, hee submitted and referred to the discretion and ordering of that high Priest: to this end, that the common people might know unto whom they were to resort for counsell and instruction, and that no part of Gods worship and service should by neglect of the auncient rites and traditions of their owne countrey, bee confounded and corrupted by bringing in any strange and forraine superstitions. Hee ordained besides, that the same Archprelate should teach, not onely these heavenly ceremonies, but also funerall obsequies, and how the spirits beneath, and ghosts of bodies departed, should be quiered and pacified: and what strange and prodigious tokens, that came by way of lightening, thunder, or any other fearfull sight whatsoever, should be expiate and purged by sacrifice accordingly. And for to know the truth, portended by these tokens even from the minds of heavenly spirits above, hee consecrated unto Jupiter Elicius an altar upon the mount Aventine. And by the meanes of Augurie, he consulted with that god, what things he was to enterprise and goe about. Whilst the whole multitude was thus drawne away, and cleane turned from thinking of force and armes, and busied about devising and ordering of these matters, not onely their minds were occupied in doing somewhat, but also the continuall feare of God now settled in them, (as being persuaded that the heavenly power was present in the managing of mens affaires) had possessed now all their hearts with such pietie and religious holinesse, that faithfull promise once made, and the reverence of an oath taken, abandoning all feare of law and punishment, was able to rule and governe the cittie. And as the people framed and reformed themselves to the fashions and manners of their king, as the only and speciall patterne to follow: so the nations likewise bordering upon them, who before time verily thought that cittie to be built, and as it were encamped in the midst of them to the disturbance and disquieting of all their peace, were now become so respective of them, that they thought it an impious and sinfull deed, once to offend or offer abuse to that cittie, so well given, and so devoted to the worship and service of God. Furthermore, there was a grove, the midst whereof was watted continually by a spring that issued out of a darke and shaddowed gage, into which, because Numa used verie oft to retire himselfe alone, without any other, as it were to have familiar companie with Egeria, hee dedicated that grove unto the Muses, for that, their assistance also in counsell and advice hee desired together with his wife Egeria. And to Faith alone hee instituted a solemne yearly feastivall day, and erected a chappell. Vnto which hee commanded the Flamines to ride in an arched or embowed close chariot, drawn with two horses, and to sacrifice and execute their function, with their hands covered and wrapped close to their fingers ends: signifying thereby, that faith is to be kept and preserved: and that her seat was sacred and consecrated even upon the right hands. Many other sacrifices, and places for sacrifice, which the Priests call Argeos, did he appoint and dedicate. But of all his acts this was most worthie and memorable, that during the time of his reigne hee had no lesse regard to preserve peace, than to maintaine roiall estate and dominion. Thus two kings one after other, taking either of them a severall course by himselfe, that one by warre, this other by peace, mightily promoted the welfare of the cittie. Romulus reigned 37 yeares, Numa 43. So that now the cittie became very puissant, as being well and equally tempered both with feats of armes, as also with discipline of peace.
- F Vpon the death of Numa the regiment returned againe to an interreigne. Then the people nominated and elected for their king, with the roiall assent of the Senatours Tullus Hostilius, the nephew or grandsonne of that Hostilius, who had in times past fought valiantly against the Sabines, at the foot of the castle hill. This man was not onely unlike the former king, but also more fierce and hardie than Romulus himselfe. For besides the heat of youth, and strength of bodie withall, the glorious remembrance of his grandfather set him on and pricked him forward. Supposing therefore that the cittie through rest and ease began to age as it were, and to decay, hee sought everie way to picke quarrels, and to give occasion to make warre. It fortuned, that the pezants about Rome, and those of Alba likewise, preided and spoiled one anothers land. At that time C. Cluilius was lord and king of Alba. From both parts wel neere at one time, were Embassadours addressed to demand restitution of good, and satisfaction for their harmes. Tullus Hosti- lius he had streightly charged his messengers to have no dealing with the Albane prince, before they had delivered unto him their message. For well hee wist, that hee would make deniall, and yeeld no amends: and then might hee with safe conscience justly proclaime warre against him.

 On the contrarie side, the Albane embassadours followed their businesse but slackely, for being courteously invited, and friendly entertained by Tullus, and lodged within his pallas, they were well content to bee feasted by the king, and were his daily guests so long, that the Romanes had by this time both challenged their owne first, and upon deniall made by the Albane King, given defiance and proclaimed open warre within thirtie daies next ensuing. Vpon which tidings by them related to Tullus, hee gave the Albane Embassadours audience, permitting them to declare what their errand was, that they came about. They (simple men) ignorant of all that was done, first spent time in excusing themselves, saying, they were very loath and unwilling to speak ought that might displease Tullus, but being commanded by authoritie, they might not will nor chuse: and thereupon were come to make claime of goods, and amends for wrongs, and if they were not restored and recompence made, they had commission to denounce warre against him.

The Ambassadors of the Albanes to King Tullus.

Whereunto Tullus made answer in this wise, Tell your king and maister (quoth hee) that the Romane king calleth the gods to witness, whether of the two Nations sent the Embassadours away first, and rejected them when they demanded restitution, that upon his head they might bring the miserie, losse, and calamitie of the present warre. With this dispatch the Albanes returned home. So they made preparation of forces on both sides all that they could, most like in all the world to a ciuile warre, betwene fathers and sonnes, proceeding both from the Trojane race: considering that by Trojanes Lavinium was founded: from Lavinium came the people of Alba: and from the Albane kings were the Romanes in right line descended. But the finall issue and end of this warre, made the warre it selfe lesse wofull and lamentable, both because they came not to a fere field, and also for that by raising the houses onely of the one cittie, two nations were intermingled and united in one. The Albanes first with a mightie power entered the territorie of Rome, and encamped themselves not past faine miles from the cittie, where they strongly entrenched themselves: which place of the Captaines name was called * Fosse Cluiliæ, many yeares after: vntill both it and the name withall in processe of time, decayed cleane and came to nothing. In this campe the Albane king Cluilius ended his daies, in whose stead the Al-bane armie created Metius Sufferius their Dictator. Tullus in the meane time became haue and prouid, especially upon the death of the king, effluons giving out and saying, that the mightie power of the gods, having thus begun at the verie head, would likewise take vengeance on the whole bodie of that Albane nation, for this their vnjust and godlesse warre: and one night above the rest passed secretly by the campe of his enemies, and in warlike manner invaded the Albane land. This newes raised Metius out of his standing campe. Who led forth his armie and marched on as neere to his enemies as hee could, dispatching aforehand an herault unto Tullus, to notifie unto him thus much from him, that it was needfull and expedient before they joined battell, to parle and commune together. If he would vouchsafe to conferre, he knew very well, that he should alledge and say forth such matters, as might concerne the weale of the Ro-manes, as well as of the Albanes. Tullus refused not the offer, albeit they were but vain toies that were pretended, and therefore set his men in battell aray. The Albanes seembly come forth against him. After they were thus ranged and embattelled readie to fight, the generalls on both sides, accompanied with a few of their principal Nobles, advance betwene both armies. Then began the Albane Dictator in this wise. Mee thinkes (quoth hee) I heare already of iniurie and wrongs done, and how such goods as were demanded are not restored againe according to the form of the league, as also that Cluilius our king was cause of this war: neither doubt I, O Tullus, but even you pretend, and are about to alledge as much. But if wee would as wee ought to doe, stand upon the truth of things, rather than upon I wot not what gloses, and goodly shewes of words: it is ambition and desire of rule onely and nothing else, that spurreth on two nations of one bloud and neere neighbours to take armes and war one with another: justly or unjustly, I am

 Albanes.

The Creation of
 104.

A I am not able to say, Let him on Gods name that first began the quarrell, in conscience see to that. As for me, the Albanes indeed have made me their generall. But this one point Tullus I would have you to remember and consider: How strong about us and you especially the Tuscanes are, you know better, the neerer yee are unto them: mightie they are by land, much more by sea. Then wot well this, that when you shall cause the trumpet to sound unto battell, these two armies will bee to them a faire marke and spectacle to behold: that they may give an assault to both at once, as well the victors, as them that are vanquished, whilst they are wearied and toiled out of heart. For the love of God therefore, if there be any sparke of grace in us, since we not contented with that libertie which we surely enjoy, will needs venture & put in doubtful hazard, which of us shall rule and command, and who shall serve and obey the other, let us take some good course whereby it may bee decided without great losse or bloodshed on both sides, whether shall bee lord and soveraigne. The motion Tullus misliked not, albeit both for disposition of nature, and hope of victorie, hee were the haughtier of the twaine. And as they fought on both parts what way to take, this meanes at length they found, whereunto fortune it selfe presented fit matter and occasion. For by good hap even then, in either host three brethren twins there were, borne at one birth, and those neither in age nor strength unlike. Their names were Curatij and Horatij, that is very certaine; neither is there any thing of ancient record more famous and notable. Yet as cleere in substance as it is, there remaineth still some doubt and error in their names: of whether people the Curatij and the Horatij were. Writers there bee on both sides, but the greater number say, as I find, that Horatij were the Romanes, to whom I rather en-cline, and my mind giveth mee to follow them. With these three brethren the kings went in hand, perswading them to fight for the honour of their countrey, and trie the quarrell by dint of sword: shewing them, that on whether side the victorie fell, there should remaine the soveraigne dominion. Nothing refused they to doe, the time and place both, were agreed upon and appointed. But before the combat, it was covenanted betwene the Romanes and the Albanes, and these conditions drawne: That whose champions in fight should have the better, that nation should peateably command the other. There are of covenants many and sundrie Capitulations farre different in matter: but they run all after one manner and forme. As for this, it was made, as wee have heard in this wise, neither is there extant a more auncient record of any composition whatsoever. The Herald (called Fecialis) demandeth of king Tullus in this wise: Is it your will and commandement my lord, that I make a covenant and accord with the Paterpatrate of the Albane people? It is (quoth the king.) Then (quoth he) I demand of you sacred hearbs. The king answered againe, Take them pure and cleane. The Fecial then reached from the cattle hill pure hearbs from among the grasse: which done, he thus asked the king: Do you (my lord) ordain mee the messenger roiall of the commons of the people of Rome? and allow necessary implements, all furniture for my selfe, and my retinue and traine? The king answered: I doe, so far forth as may bee, without the harme or detriment of my selfe, and of the cittizens of the people of Rome. The Fecial or herald for that time, was Marcus Valerius, who created Paterpatrate or king at armes. Sp. Fufius, by touching his head and haire with vervaine. Now the Paterpatrate is for to confirme the agreement with an oath, and so he read out the covenant and oath, and that with manie words: which to rehearse, as they were in a long prescript forme pronounced, were verie needlesse. After this having recited all the articles and conditions thereof. Harken (quoth hee) O Iupiter, listen thou Herald for the Albanes, attend also and give eare yee the Albane people, how these conditions from the first to the last, have bene read aloud out of those bookes or tables of waxe, without coven or fraud, and how at this day they are most rightly meant and understood, according to the tenure of the words: from these articles I say, I shall not the people of Rome start backe first, nor make default: If they shall first goe backe and faile therein by publlike consent, and fraudulently; that day, O Iupiter, smite thou the cite of Rome, as I to day will strike this swine: yea and smite thou home so much more, as thou art more able and powerfull than my selfe. And after he had thus said, he smote the swine with a flint stone. The Albanes likewise repeated their prescript forme of words, and the oath, by their Dictator and Priests for the purpose. The complements of the covenant and composition thus performed, and all concluded, then those three brethren of both sides, as it was before agreed, buckle to arme themselves. And being encouraged on both hands by their well-willers and friends, that put them in mind of their countrey gods, their native soile and parents, saying, that all their fellow cittizens and countrey men whatsoever, both at home in the cittie, and abroad in the campe, euery one, had their eie onely upon them, their weapons and their hands: the young men being both of themselves by nature forward and lustie, and also emboldened with the comfortable words of their friends, advanced forth betwene both armies. Now were the two hosts set on both sides before their camps, rid of present danger, rather than void of care and pensiveness. For why? the whole triall of soveraigntie and rule, rested in the valour and good speed of a few. Whereupon they longing to see the sequels and issue, were wholly bent to behold, and onely minded this unpleasant sight and spectacle. At sound of trumpet these brave brethren, three to three, like as they had bene two for battels, and carrying the stomakes verily of two great armies, affronted one another, and with cruell and mortall weapons gave the charge. Neither regarded they their owne proper peril, but set before their eies, only the rule or servitude of the common-weale, as if the state of their country from thenceforth lay wholly upon their good or bad success in this action. So soon as they began to cope together and make assault, that their harness and weapons once clattered, and their drawne swords shone and glittered againe, behold such an exceeding feare came upon the beholders, that they trembled and quaked withall: and during the time of equall combat, seeing no inclination of victorie to the one side or the other, they were so astonied, that unneath they could well speake or freely take their wind. Afterwards, when as they were come to closing and handstrokes, and that now not onely the stirring of their bodies, and the doubtfull handling of their weapons and armour, but bloodie wounds also were seene, two of the Romanes (having sore wounded all the three Albanes) fell down one upon the other, and yielded up the ghost. At whose fall, the Albane host shouted againe for ioy: but the Romane legions, albeit they were now past all hope of victorie, yet they were not void of care, being amated, and in an extasie as it were with very feare what should become of him, who being but one, had three Curiatij upon him at once. But as good hap was, hee as yet was fresh and unwounded. And as hee was not able alone to make his part good with them altogether, so in single fight, man to man, he thought himselfe good ynough for them all, one after another. To single them therefore, and to part them in fight, he begins to flie, thinking thereby they would follow after him, each one as his hurt bodie would give him leave. Now when he was retired a prettie good way from the place where they had fought, and looking behind him espied them follow farre asunder, and one of them not much behind himselfe, hee turned againe upon him with great violence. And whilest the host of the Albanes cried out to the Curiatij to rescue and succour their brother, Horatius by that time had slaine his formost enimie, and was in hand with the second. Then the Romans with such a shout, as they are wont to make who after a great fright recover themselves and take heart againe, encourage their champion: and hee himselfe halteneth to finish the combat. And before that the third, who was not far off, could get to the other, he had slaine the second Curiatius. So that now there was but one to one, left to fight on even hand: and they, neither in hope nor strength equally matched. As for the one of them, his bodie as yet not wounded, and his double victorie withall, caused him to attempt the third conflict stoutly and courageously. The other faint and feeble of his hurt, tired with running, had much ado to come forward, and quite out of heart, seeing his two brethren lie slain at his feet, offereth himselfe as a prey to his victorious enimie: for surely betwene them was no fight at all to speake of. The Romane he, triumphing and crying out for joy, Two brethren already (qud he) have I sent to the divell, the third likewise I shall I send after them, that a Romane may command an Albane, which is the cause of all this warre. And therewith he thrust his sword aloft into his throat, who had much ado to hold his weapons: and so soone as he was downe, stript and rifled him. The Romanes with great triumph and gratulation, receive Horatius, rejoicing so much the more, as his case was more dangerous and well neere desperate. Then of both sides addresse they themselves to burie their champions, but not with like cheere and alacrity of heart. For why? they of the one part were become lords, and they of the other, subiects. Their tombes remaine yet to be seene in the very places where they were each of them slain, two of the Romans entombed together in one place neerer unto Alba: the three Albanes towards Rome, but distant asunder, like as they fought and left their lives. Before they dislodged and departed thence the one from the other, Mellius according as it was capitulated in the composition, asked & demanded what Tullus would command him to do: who enjoined him to keep his youth readie in armes at an houres warning, for that hee would employ them in service, in case hee should warre with the Veientians. So were the armies dismissed home. And Horatius he went formost, bearing afore him the threefold spoile of three brethren. Whom his sister, a maid affianced before to

A one of the Curiatij, met before Capena gate: and espying upon her brothers shoulders, the coat of armes of her espoused husband, which she her selfe had wrought with her owne hands; she unbound her head, let her haire loose, and pittiously called upon her dead spouse by name. This lamentable wailing of the sister presently upon victorie, and amidst great and publicke joy, moved the proud and haughtie young man to wrath, and drawing out his sword therewith, ran the filie damsell through: and with these bitter words rebuketh her also, Get thee hence (quoth he) to thy spouse with thy unseasonable and foolchastie love, forgetfull as thou art, of thy two brethren dead, and him that is alive: forgetfull of thy native countrey, and the honour thereof: and so with a mitcheefe goe she, what ever she be, that shall bewaile an enimie of Rome. A cruell and horrible fact this seemed, as well to the Senatours, as to the commons: but his late and fresh desert made it the lesse trespass: yet for all that was hee apprehended, and brought before the king. The king, that hee might not seeme the authour of a judgement so unpleasant and odious unto the people, and consequently of punishment according to the doome, assembled the people together and said: I ordaine Duumvirs to sit upon Horatius, in triall of a criminal cause of felonie; and to judge him according to the law, in that case provided. The tenor of the law runneth thus, in a dreadfull kind of forme. THE MAGISTRATES CALLED DUUMVIRS SHALL IUDGE THE PARTIE ACCUSED IN A CAPITAL ACTION OF FELONIE, IF HE SHAL APPEALE FROM THE DUUMVIRS, LET HIM TRAVERSE HIS APPEALE, IF THEY OVERTHROW HIM, THEN HOODVINKE HIM, OR COVER HIS HEAD, HANG HIM UPON A CURSED GALLOV TREE BY A ROPE, AND STRANGLE HIM, HAVING WHIPPED AND SCORVED HIM BEFORE, EITHER WITHIN THE POMERIE OR WITHOUT. By vertue of this law were the Duumvirs created, who by the rigour of that law thought they might not quit so much as a guiltlesse person: and having once condemned him, then one of them gave sentence and said: I judge thee O Publius Horatius a murderer and enimie to the state of Rome. Goe Licor therefore, and bind his hands together. Then came the Licor and cast a cord about them. But Horatius, by the advise of Tullus, a gentle and mild interpreter of the law, I appeale (quoth he.) So upon his appeale was the matter debated, and to be tried before the people: who were not a little troubled in deciding or judging this cause, and most of all in regard of Publius Horatius the father, crying out and saying, That he deemed his daughter was justly and worthily killed: otherwise hee would himselfe have punished his sonne by his fatherly authoritie. Beseeching moreover, that they would not now make him childlesse, whom erewhile they saw with a goodly companie of children about him. And therewithall the old father embracing the young man, and shewing the spoiles of the Curiatij, set up and hanging in that verie place which now is called Pila Horatii, Horatius his pillar. And can yee indeed (O ye Romanes, quoth hee) abide to see him bound under a gallows, yea and whipped and tormented, whom a while afore yee beheld to march in great glorie and iolitie for his atcheeved victorie? So unseemely and foule a sight as which, the Albanes themselves can hardly suffer. Go Licor, goe bind those hands fast, which armed a little before, wan the people of Rome their dominion: Go I say, and hoodwinke his head, who saved and delivered this cittie from bondage, hang him by the necke, and strangle him upon a cursed tree: scourge him and spare not, either within the circuit of the wals, so it be among those javelins and spoiles of the enemies: or without the wals, so it be within the compass of the Curatian sepulchres. For to what place can you lead this young gentleman, where his honourable acts may not save him from so unworthie and shamefull punishment? The people could no longer endure, either the teares of the old father, or the constant resolution of the youth his son, who shewed himselfe still the same, & not to change for any danger. So they quit him, in the honorable regard rather of his prowess & valor, than in the right and equity of his cause. Yet to the end that the murder so manifest and openly knowne, should be in some sort expiate, and satisfaction made therefore, his father was charged to purge his sonnes sinne, and make amends, at the expences of the cittie. Who having performed certaine purgatorie sacrifices, which afterward belonged to the house and familie of the Horatij, put a raster or beame crosse overthwart the street, and caused the young man with his head covered to goe under, as under a yoke or gallows: which remaineth yet unto this day, from time to time at the cittie charges repaired, and they call it Sororium Tigillum, i. the Sisters beame. And in that verie place where Horatia was wounded and fell downe, her tombe was erected of foure-square stone. But not long continued the Albanes in quiet and peace. For the common people finding fault fault and greatly discontented, that the whole state of the weale publike was put into the hands G of three souldiours, infected so and poisoned the vaine and shittie head of the Dictator: that for as much as plaine and upright dealing sped no better, he began to win againe the hearts of his commons by crooked meanes, and indirect courses. Seeking therefore warre in time of peace, as before in time of warre he sought peace: and seeing his people had more heart than hand, and their strength not answerable to their stomackes: hee stirred up other nations, openly by way of proclamation and defiance to make warre, and reserved his owne men under a colour of league and confederacie, for to practise treason and falshood. The Fidenates, a colonie of the Romanes, having made the Veientians partakers of their counsell, and combined with the Albanes to forsake the Romanes, when time came, and turne unto them, brake out and tooke arms. When Fidene had thus openly revolted, Tullus sent for Metius and his power from Alba, and H setteth forward against his enemies: and passing over the river Anio, encamped neere the confluent, where both streames meet together. Betwene which place and Fidene, the armie of the Veientians had crossed the Tyber, wio put themselves in the right wing of the battell fast by the river, and the Fidenates in the left, neerer to the mountaines. Tullus directly opposeth his owne forces against the Veientians, and placeth the Albanes to affront the Fidenates. The Albane capitaine having as litle heart as honestie and truely, neither durst keepe his standing, nor openly turne unto the enemy, but by litle and litle withdraweth himselfe toward the mountaines: and when hee thought hee had gained vantage ynough, hee mounted up the hill with all his companies, and with a wavering mind to spend the time, displaieth his rankes. His intent and purpose was, on what side fortune seemed to give the better, with them to joine and take their part. The Romanes that stood next, perceiving their flankes naked by reason of the departure of their friends and allies, at first marvelled much at the matter: but afterwards there gallopt an horseman, and advertised the king that the Albanes were gone away. Tullus in this so fearefull and dangerous case, vowed twelve Priests Salij, and two temples to Pallor and Pavor, to Palenesse and Feare: and with a lowd voice cried out in the hearing of his enemies, commanding the said horseman to return to the battell, saying, There was no cause at al to feare, for that himselfe had commanded the Albane host to wheele and fetch about, and so to charge the Fidenates on their backs where they lay open. Villing him expressly moreover, to cause the men of armes to hold up their launces on end. By which meanes, a great part of the footmen could not see the Albanes as they departed and went their waies. And those that had scene K them, thinking it was a truth which they heard the king to speake, fought so much the more hotely. So the feare turned now from them, and fell upon the enemies: for they heard the king when hee spake so lowd, and also a great manie of the Fidenatians being cohobitants with the Romanes, under stood Latine. For feare therefore, that the Albanes should all on a suddaine run down from the hils, and stop their passage to the towne, they turned their backs and fled. Then Tullus presteth hard upon them, and having discomfited the Fidenatians wing, commeth back more fiercely upon the Veientians, being already amased at the fright of the other. Neither were they able to withstand the bruit. Howbeit, the river behind at their backs kept them at first from flying away, but afterwards when their flight bended thitherward: some flinging their weapons shamefully away, like blind men ran headlong into the water: other lingering still, and staying L on the banke side, doubtfull whether to flee or to stick to it and fight, were trod under foot and hewen in peeces. Never had the Romanes before that day a more cruell battell. Then the Albane armie, which beheld and saw all this conflict, descended downe into the plaine. And Metius forsooth, rejoiceth much on Tullus behalfe for his victorie. Tullus againe speaketh Metius faire, and gave order, that the Albanes in a good hower should joine their campe to the Romanes: and against the next day, prepared a purging or Lustrall sacrifice. The morrow when it was day, and that all things were in a readinesse, according to the manner, hee commandeth both armies to assemble together to an audience. The criers, beginning at the furthest part of the campe, summoned the Albanes first. Vho also for the strangenesse of the matter, and desirous to heare the Romane king to make his Oration, prest forward to stand next. The Roman M legion for the nonce, as it was before decreed, stood armed round about, and hemmed them in: and the Centurions had in charge without delay to execute whatsoever they were commanded. Then began Tullus to speake in this wise. If ever in anie warre heretofore yee had cause, O Romanes, to render thanks, first to the immortal gods, and then to your owne manhood and valour, certes it was in yesterdaies battell. For yee fought not then with the force of your enemies, more

A more than with the trecherie and falshood of your friends and confederates, which is the greater conflict and farre more dangerous. For to put you cleane out of doubt, and to beare you no longer in hand with a wrong perswasion; The Albanes went up toward the hils without my commission, neither was it my commandement that, but a policie and countenance onely of command: to this end, that yee not knowing how ye were forsaken, might not withdraw your hearts from fight, and also that your enemies weening they were environned behind, should be afraid and so enforced to flee. Yet are not the Albanes all in generall to be charged with this fault which I reprove. They did but follow their leader, as yee likewise would have done, if I had willed the march to have turned anie whether from thence. It is Metius that was the guide and leader of this journey, Metius is hee that is the worker and deviser of this warre, Metius I say it is, and none but Metius, the breaker of the Romane and Albane league. But let who that will from B henceforth presume hardly to do the like, if I make not him forthwith a notable example to all the world, The Centurions stood armed round about Metius, and the king goeth on with the rest of his speech as hee began, and said: That which I pray God may turne to the good, prosperitie and happinesse of the people of Rome, of my selfe, and you the Albanes, I am minded to reduce all the Albane nation to Rome: to endue the commons with the freedome of the citie: to advance their cheefe gentlemen to the order of Separators, & to make one uniforme citie and Commonwealth: that as in times past the Albanes state, out of one body was divided into twain, so now it may bee united and become one againe. At these words the Albane youth unarmed, and beset on everie side with armed men, albeit they were distracted in mind, yet were they forced with a generall feare to keepe silence, and hold their peace. Metius Saffertius (quoth Tullus then) If thou couldest have learned to keepe allegiance, promise, and covenants, thou mightest have bene taught it at my hands with life. But now since thy froward nature is intractable, teach thou by thy fearefull example and death all mankind, to hold and repute those things for sacred and holie, which have by thee bene broken and violate. Like as therefore erewhiles thou barest a double heart in doubtfull ballance, betwene the Fidenates and the Romanes state: even so, straightwaies shalt thou yeeld thy bodie to be drawne asunder, and plucked in two peeces accordingly. Then forthwith hee caused two teemes of foure horses to bee set to, and Metius to be stretched out and tied unto the chariots to them belonging. Afterwards were the horses driven a contrarie way, and carried with them in both chariots the bodie torne in peeces as farre forth as the lims hung fast together by their cords and ligaments: which made all men averte their eyes from beholding so cruell and horrible a spectacle. This was the first and last punishment that ever the Romanes executed with so litle respect, or none at all (to say a truth) of the lawes of humanity. In all other they may safely make their boast, that no nation in the world hath ben lesse delighted and pleased with extremities of torment.

Whilest these things were in doing, there had bene certaine horsemen sent afore to Alba, for to translate the multitude to Rome. After whom were the legions also of the footmen thither led, to rase and destroy the citie. At whose entrance within the gates, ther was not that stir nor fearefull hurric, as usually is scene when citties are lost: and when with breaking down the gates, beating and battering the wals with rams and other engines, forcing the citadell, the enemies shout, and the armed souldiours run to and fro in the citie, killing and slaying, firing and burning all afore them as they goe: but a sad silence, and a still kind of sorrow and pensivenesse so possessed and astonied all their minds, that for feare forgetting what to leave behind them, or what to take with them, without advise and counsell, one asking another what to doe, they one while stood in their house entries, another while ran up and downe wandring in their houses, as if their last day had bene come. But so soone as they heard the horsemen crie aloud, and command them with menacing to void and depart, and that now the ratling of the tiles and slates from off the houses, as they were a pulling downe, was from the furthest part of the towne heard: and that the dust raised from places farre off, had as it were with a cloud overcast and filled all: then everie man catching up hastily, and carrying forth what hee could, leaving their domesticall gods, leaving their houses wherein they had bene borne, bred, and brought up, departed forth: so that now they filled the streets as they went close on a row together, and the sight one of another with mutuall commiseration, redoubled their teares and wofull complaints. Yea & pittious mone & lamentations were heard of women especially, as they passed by their faire and stately churches, beset with souldiours, and abandoned their gods as it were captives and prisoners. After the Albanes had thus quit the citie, downe went the Romanes everie where where with the buildings, as well publicke as private, and laid them even with the ground, and so in one hower destroyed and raised foure hundred yeeres worke, for so long had Alba stood and flourished. Howbeit the temples of the gods they spared, for so the king had given commandement. Rome all this while, riseth by the fall of Alba. The number of Citizens increased double: to enlarge the citie the mount Celius was annexed to it: and that it should bee better peopled and more inhabited, Tullus had his roial seat and pallace there, and therein from that time forth he kept his court. The cheefe Citizens of the Albanes he advanced to the order of Senators, that hee might augment that state also of the Commonweale, namely, the houses of the Tulli, Servilij, Quintij, Geganij, Curatij, Cloelij: and for that degree and order of Senators by him encreased, he built an hall or new court, called until our fathers daies Hofilia curia, Hofilia court. And that all estates and degrees might out of this new people be somewhat strengthened, hee chose from out of the Albanes ten troopes or cornets of horsemen, and with the same supplie hee both fulfilled the number of the old legions, and also made and enrolled new.

Curia Hofilia.

With the Sabines.

Tullus upon this affiance he had in his strength and power, denounceth warre against the Sabines, a people in those daies of all other most puissant and mightie, both in men and munition, next the Tuscans. Wrongs had been done, and outrages committed on both parts, and restitution or amends demanded, but to no effect. Tullus found himselfe grieved, that divers occupiers or merchants of Rome, at an open mart or faire of great resort before the temple of Feronia, were laid hold upon and apprehended. The Sabines on the other side complained, that their men, notwithstanding they took sanctuary in a certain sacred and priviledged grove, were arrested and in hold at Rome. These were the quarrels and occasions pretended of the warre. The Sabines well remembring, that not onely part of their owne forces was by Tullus translated to Rome, and there planted, but also that now of late the puissance of the Romans was well amended by the supplement of the Albanes, began likewise for their part to cast about, and seeke for helpe abroad, and forraigne aids. Now was Tuscan their neighbour nation, and of the Tuscans the neereft unto them were the Veientians. From thence they gat certaine voluntaries to take their part, by reason that their minds already were well disposed to revolt upon old grudges and rancour, remaining still of the former warres past: other some also vagabonds and idle persons of the rascall sort, and needie commons, were soone hired for monie. But as for any succor from thence by publicke consent of the state, they had none at all. So much prevailed even with the Veientians (for in the rest it was lesse marvell) the faithfull covenant of truce concluded with Romulus. Now when these preparations of warre were made on both sides to the uttermost of their power, and that it stood upon this point, That they were like to have the odds and vantage, who should begin first, and enter the field: Tullus prevented the enemies, and invaded the Sabine land. A sharpe and bloodie battell was there fought under the wood Malicusa. Where the Romanes bare themselves bravely that day, much upon the valour of the Legionarie footmen, but more upon the strength of their men of armes, whose number lately was augmented: for by the suddain and forcible charge of the horsemen, the battell of the Sabines was so broken, their ranks so disordered, that they could neither stand close together to fight it out, nor yet spread themselves to flie, without great slaughter and bloodshed.

The Sabines thus vanquished, and the kingdome of Tullus and the whole state of Rome, being verie glorious and wealthie: behold, newes came to the King and Senators, that in the Albanic mount it rained stones: which hardly was beleaved, and therefore certaine men were sent of purpose to see this strange and prodigious sight: who might plainly behold stones to fall thicke out of the skie, like as when some forcible winds drive haile in big round balls upon the earth. They imagined moreover, that they heard a great and mightie voice out of the grove from the verie top of the hill crying unto them, & warning the Albanes to do sacrifice and divine service according to the rites & ancient maner of their forefathers, which they had discontinued and forgotten, as if together with their country they had abandoned their gods, and either taken to the Romane fashion, or else being angry with fortune (as it is commonly seene) forlet and neglected the worship of the gods altogether. The Romanes likewise upon that miraculous signe, for the purging and expiation thereof, celebrated solemne publicke sacrifices for the space of nine daies, called a Novendiall: either because they were mooved thereto by that voice from heaven (for that also is reported) or tooke direction from the Soothsayers that prie into the inward of beasts. Certaine it is, that a solemne custome remaineth still unto this day,

A Novendiall.

A day, that whensoever word commeth of the like wonder, they keepe hollyday nine daies together. Not long after this, the pestilence rained in the citie. And albeit the people began thereby to slacke souldierie and militarie service: yet would not this martiall prince give them rest and respite from warre: being of this mind, that the bodies of young men were more healthie in armour, abroad in the open field, than at home in the citie under covert: until himselfe at length fell sicke of a long and lingering disease. Then that haucie and courageous stomacke of his, together with his lustie and able bodie, became so abated, that hee who earst before thought nothing lesse besetting a king, than to set his mind, and busie his braines about religious ceremonies; now all upon a suddaine became wholly devoted to all kind of superstition both more and lesse, yea and filled the peoples heads besides with holinesse and devotion. So as now the verie common fort wishing againe for the old world, under the reigne of king Numa, were verily persuaded, that there was no other remedie left for their sicke and diseased bodies, but to obtaine at Gods hand grace and pardon. Men say, that the king himselfe in perusing and turning over the Commentaries and registers of Numa his predecessor, and therein finding certaine hidden and solemne sacrifices that had bene unto Iupiter Elcius, retired himselfe, and kept close within house to celebrate the same. But for that this holie service, was neither begun aright, nor duly administrated, hee had not onely no divine apparition and heavenly vision presented unto him, but also incurred the heave displeasure and wrath of Iupiter, whom by his preposterous religion he had thus disquieted; and so both himselfe and his whole house were consumed with lightning. This Tullus in great glorie and renowne of martiall prowesse, reigned two and thirtie yeares.

Tullus consumed with lightning.

When Tullus was dead, the government returned againe, as it was from the first beginning ordained, unto the Senators; who named an Interregent, and he called a parlement, wherein the people elected Ancus Martius for their king, and the Senators gave their assent thereto. This Ancus Martius, was Numa Pompilius his daughters sonne, who so soone as hee was come to the crowne, both in remembrance of his grandfathers glorious government, and also in regard of the raigne of his next predecessor, which in other points right excellent and commendable, in this onely failed, and was not so happie: either for that religion was neglected, or not with due ceremonies exercised: and thinking it a thing most necessarie, and of greatest moment, to reduce all publicke divine service and sacrifices to the first institution of Numa, commanded the Archprelate or Highpriest, to make an extract, and transcrip of all the sacred rites and misteries out of Numa his Commentaries, and ingrosse them into one table, and to publish them abroad unto the people: whereby both his subjects and citizens desirous of peace, as also the States thereby adjoining, were in good hope, that the king would altogether conforme himselfe, and take after the customes and ordinances of his grandfather. Hereupon the Latins, with whom in king Tullus his daies a league was made, tooke heart unto them, made in-roads into the countrey about Rome, and fetch out booties. And when the Romanes demanded restitution, they made them a proud answer, supposing belike, that the king of Rome would passe the whole course of his raigne in ease and idleness, sitting still in his chappels, and by his holie altars. But Ancus was of a meane and indifferent disposition by nature, having an eie as well to Numa, as to Romulus, & composed as it were of both. For over & besides, that he thought peace more expedient and necessarie for his grandsires reigne, the people being as then but new risen, unsettled, and fierce withall: considering also, that himselfe should not easily without taking wrong, enjoy the quietnesse which to him happened: for that his patience was already tried, and not onely tried, but also despised: and seeing that the State of the present time was fitter for a Tullus to be king, than a Numa: yet to the end that, as Numa in time of peace instituted ceremonies of religion, so he might likewise set out to posteritie others concerning warre: and that warres should not onely be made, but also denounced and proclaimed orderly, and in some religious forme of solemnitie: he set downe in writing that law and formall order, by vertue whereof restitution is demanded (which at this day the Fecials or heralds observe) like as he received it from the ancient people Aequi.

Ancus Martius king of Rome.

F The Embassadour Fecial, comming to their borders, at whose hands the goods are required againe, covering his head with a bonnet or vail of woollen yeerne, saith thus: He re o Iupiter, give eare yee limits and confines (naming them of such and such a countrey) let Iustice and right hearken also to what I shall say: I am the pvelicke messenger of the people of Rome, of a iust and religious embassage

BASSAGE AM I COME, AND TO MY WORDS GIVE CREDITE. After this, relieaseth he, G all his demands, and then calleth Jupiter to witnesse, saying, If I UNIVISTLY AND IMPIOVSLY DEMAND THAT SUCH PERSONS SHOULD BE DELIVERED, OR SUCH AND SUCH GOODS BE RENDRED UNTO ME, THE PUBLICKE MESSENGER OF THE PEOPLE OF ROME; THEN LET ME NEVER RETURN AGAINE TO ENIOY MINE OVNE COUNTRY. These wordes he hearseth he, as he setteth foot, and steppeth into the confines: the same also he speaketh to him whomsoever he meeteth first: the selfesame words he pronounceth, as he entrench within the gate of the citie: yea & when he is come into the market place he saith the same, changing and varying in some few tearmes, from the prescript forme of the demand, and taking the solemne oth. In case then, the persons whom he requireth, bee not yeelded after three and thirtie daies expired (for so manie just, are usually graunted) then proclaimeth hee warre in this wise, H HEARE O Jupiter, and thou Iuno, Quirinus thou: YE CELESTIAL SAINTS ALL, AND TER-RESTRIALL POWERS, YE INFERNALL SPIRITS ALSO LISTEN, AND GIVE EARE. I CALL YOU ALL TO VVITNESSE, AND PROTEST BEFORE YOU, THAT THIS NATION, (naming them whosoever they be) IS UNJUST, AND DOETH NOT ACCORDING TO RIGHT AND EQUITIE. BUT OF THESE MATTERS VVILL WE CONSULT AT HOME IN OUR COUNTRY, VVITH OUR ELDERS, AND ASKE THEIR ADVISE NOV VVE MAY COME BY OUR OVNE. Herewith returneth the messenger unto Rome for counsell, and presently the king would in these or such like words, sitting in counsell with his Peeres, move them in this manner. WHEREAS THE PATERPATRAT OR HERALD, IN THE BEHALFE OF THE PEOPLE OF ROME, AND THEIR QUIRITES, HATH TREATED VVITH THE PATERPATRAT, OR HERALD, IN THE NAME OF THE ANCIENT LATINES, AND VVITH THE FOLKE OF THE ANCIENT LATINES, CONCERNING CERTAINE THINGS, DIFFERENCES, SHYES, AND CAUSES THEREUPON DEPENDING; WHICH THINGS THEY HAVE NEITHER YEE-DED NOR PAID, NOR PERFORMED AND DONE; VVHICH OUGHT TO HAVE BEN PAID, YEEDED, PERFORMED AND DONE; WHAT IS YOUR IUDGEMENT? speaking to him, whose opinion first hee asketh in this case. Then (saith hee) MY ADVISE IS, THAT THOSE THINGS BE SOUGHT FOR AND RECOVERED BY PURE FORCE, BY JUST AND LAV-FULL VVAR. THIS DO I FULLY AGREE UNTO, THIS DO I DETERMINE RESOLUTELY.
After him were the other asked in course: and when the greater number of them there present accord therunto, then by generall consent, they were wont to proclaim war in this order: K that the Feclal or king at armes should go with a javelin, having an yron head, or with a red bloodie spear burnt at the end, as far as to their borders or marches: and there in the presence of three witnesses at the least, not under foureteene yeares of age, should say thus: VVHEREAS THE PEOPLE OF THE OLD LATINES, AND THE OLD LATINE FOLKE HAVE PRACTISED AND TRESPASSED AGAINST THE PEOPLE OF ROME AND THE QUIRITES, AND VVHEREAS THE PEOPLE OF ROME, AND THE QUIRITES HAVE SO DETERMINED, CONSENTED, AND AGREED, THAT VVAR SHOULD BE MADE VVITH THE ANCIENT LATINES; I THEREFORE TOGETHER VVITH THE PEOPLE OF ROME, DO DENOUNCE AND PROCLAME AND MAKE VWAR VVITH THE NATIONS OF THE OLD LATINES, AND VVITH THE OLD LATINE FOLKE. And when he had thus said, he launced his speare L or javelin within the confines of the enemies. After this manner then, was restitution demanded of the Latines, and warre denounced or proclaimed: which order of proceeding their posterity by tradition received.

Ancus having committed the charge of divine service and sacrifice unto the Flamins and the other Priests, levied a new armie, went forth into the field, and by force wan Politorium, a citie of the Latines. And following the usuall maner of the former kings his progenitors, who had mightilie increased the Romane estate, by admitting their enemies into the number of citizens, transported the whole multitude from thence to Rome. And because the ancient natural Romanes inhabited Palatium, the Sabines about the Capitoll and rocke Tarpeia, and the Al-banes replenished the mount Celius: therefore the hill Aventine was allowed this new compa- M nie to dwell in. Unto whom not long after, there came fresh inhabitants to people it, upon the winning of Tellene and Ficana. But after this, the Romanes were driven to recover by war Pol-itorium againe: for that whilest it stood void and vake, the old Latines had surprisid and taken it.
Which was the cause, that the Romanes destroyed that citie quite, that it should not bee at all times a receptacle for the enemies. Last of all, when as now the Latines warre was driven wholly and

A and brought before Medullia, there for a good while was much ado, and doubtfull issue of fight, and interchangeable victorie: for that the towne was both well fortified with bulwarkes, and furnished with a strong garison of men: and also by reason that the armie of the Latines being in-camped in plaine and open ground, had sundrie times with banners displaied, encountred hand to hand with the Romanes. At the last Ancus bending his whole power against them, fitt gaue them an overthrow in a set battell: and so having gained rich pillage, returned to Rome. At what time also were many thousands of the Latines received into the citie. Who to the end, that the Aventine and Palatium should meet together, were appointed to seat themselves about the temple of Muria*. The Ianiculum likewise was adjoined unto the citie, not for want of ground, Venus but because it might not be at any time a fortresse and hold for the enemies: which was thought good to be united unto the citie, not onely with a wall, but also for more commodious passage to and fro, with a wooden bridge over Tyber. The Quirites fosse or ditch also, no small defence against the easie access from the plaine grounds, was a worke of Ancus. Thus the estate being growne to exceeding strength and bignesse: when as now in so huge a multitude of people there was much confusion, and no difference of well doing or ill, and thereby many mischeefes and outrages began secretly to be committed: for to restraine therefore with some terror, such boldnesse increasing daily more and more, there was a gaole or common prison built in the hart of the citie, even over against the common place of assemblie. And in this kings daies not onely the circuit of the citie was enlarged, but also their lands and territories. For by reason that the Forrest Moesia was conquered from the Veientians, their signorie reached to the seavhere, C in the very mouth of Tyber was the towne Hostia built, and the salt pits made thereabout, and upon such noble exploits by armes atcheeved, the temple of Jupiter Feretrius, was in more ample and glorious manner reedified.

In the reigne of Ancus, there came to dwell at Rome one Lucumo, a pregnant nimble headed man, and a wealthie, upon a desire especially and hope of advancement and honour, which at Tarquinij (where he was borne, although descended of forraigne parentage) he had no means to attaine unto. The sonne hee was of Demaratus the Corinthian, who upon civile troubles and dissentions having fled his country, and by chance planting himselfe in Tarquinij, there married a wife, and had issue by her two sonnes, named Lucumo and Aruns. Lucumo survived his father, and became heire of all his goods. Aruns died before his father, leaving his wife behind him, conceived with child: neither lived the father Demaratus long after his son, who not knowing that his daughter in law and sonnes wife was with child, made no mention at all of his nephew in his will, and so departed this world. Whereupon the child after his grandsires decease, being borne to no part of his goods, for his poore condition, hight Egerius. But Lucumo on the other side, the sole heire and inheritor of all, as hee began by his wealth to bee haucie ynough, and to looke aloft, so hee grew much more proud for his marching in marriage with Tanaquil, a dame of a right noble house descended, and who could hardly beare a lower estate and degree than that wherein she was borne. When shee was once married, and saw the Tuscans to disdain Lucumo, for that his father was a stranger and banished person, shee could not indure that indig-nitie. But forgetting all kind affection to her native countrey, so shee might see her husband raised to high promotion, shee resolved and plotted to leave Tarquinij and depart. To which purpose and designement, Rome seemed a place most fit and convenient of all others. For thus the projected and discomfited: That in a citie lately founded, where all kind of nobilitie suddainely commeth up, and ariseth from vertue and prowess, her husband a valorous and industrious man must needs have place, and be entertained: that king Tatius a Sabine borne, had raigned there: that Numa was from Cures sent for thither, and called to the crowne: that Ancus also a Sabine by his mothers side, had the onely image of Numa to shew for his nobilitie. Thus shee soon persuaded him, as being a man ambitious and desirous of honour, and whose mother onely was a Tarquinien borne, and therefore hee was to make lesse scruple of abandoning the place of his nativitie. Thereupon they removed with all they had to Rome. And it fortuned that to Ianiculum they came. Where, as Tarquinij sat with his wife in the chariot, behold an Eagle came gently flying downe from aloft, & tooke up his bonnet from his head, and soaring over the chariot with a great noise, and clapping of her wings, as if shee had been sent from heaven to doe this feat, set it gainely and handomely on his head againe: which done, shee mounted on high, and flew away. Tanaquil, as they say, embraced this Augurie with great joy, being a woman skillfull, as commonly all the Tuscans are, in such prodigious sights and apparitions from heaven; and therewith

therewith taking her husband about the necke, willed him to be of good cheare, and to hope for great matters and high preferments: saying, how that bird came from such a quarter of the heaven, addrest as a messenger from such a god, and shewed a divine token and presage upon the highest part of man, even the top of the crown, and lifted up the ornament that stood upon his mortall head, to give it him againe immortall, as from God above. In these hopes and cogitations which they entertained by the way, they entred the citie: where they tooke an house, and from thenceforth hee was commonly called L. Tarquinius. Now within a while both his new comming, and his wealth withall, made him well knowne and himselfe also besides, set forward his good fortune by courteous and faire speech and affable language to everie man, by friendly inviting, and liberall feasting, and by making what friends he could by gifts, favors, and good turnes: so farre forth, as the fame of him came into the kings court: where, by his willing service and singular dexteritie, in short time he had not onely access to the kings knowledge, but also entered into familiar acquaintance and friendship with his highnesse. In somuch, that both in private counsels and publicke consultations, as well at home as abroad, hee was alwaies present, and bare a great stroke. And having in all kind of offices carried himselfe with credite, was in the end by the kings last will and testament made tutor or protector of his children. Thus reigned Numa foure and twentie yeares, for glorie and reputation of his sage governement, as well in warre as in peace, equall to anie of the former kings his predecessors. Now were his sons neere foureteene yeares of age when hee died. Tarquinius therefore made the more hast, that the high court of parliament should with all speed possible bee summoned for creation of a king, which being against a day proclaimed, he sent away the boies to the chase a hunting, at the verie instant of the said election. Hee himselfe (as men say) was the first, that both ambitiously sought for the crowne, and also to win the hearts of the commons, divided and framed an eloquent Oration. Saying it was no new and strange thing that he stood for: And why hee was not the first (that any man should be offended, or make any wonder) but the third alien that in Rome affected and aspired to the kingdome: that both Tatius, not of a forrainger onely, but of anemie became king: and Numa likewise, a man unacquainted with the citie and matters of State, was without any lute or seeking of his part, by the Romans sent for, and advanced to the crown. As for himselfe, hee alledged and said, That from the time he was at his owne libertie to dispose of himselfe, hee with his wife and all that he had, removed and came to Rome: and of that age wherein men are employed in civile affaires, he had spent a greater part in Rome, than in his own ancient country. Moreover, that he was trained up both at home in the citie and in war abroad, to the knowledge of the Romane lawes, orders, add customes, and that under no meane person, but an excellent master, even king Numa himselfe. And finally, for faithfull service and diligent attendance about the king, he had endeavoured to passe all others: and for liberalitie and courtesie towards all others, hee had striven to goe beyond the king. These and such like allegations, as he laid forth and pleaded, and that right truly, the people of Rome with exceeding great consent elected him their king. Who being a man otherwise of singular parts and of great worth, as hee was ambitious in seeking the kingdome, so continued he stil, when he ware the crowne: and minding no lesse to establish his owne state and throne, than to maintaine the good estate of the Commonweale, he advanced one hundred more to the order of Senators, who afterwards were called Minorum Gentium Patres, as a man would say, Senators of a latter sort, and meaner qualitie. A faction, no doubt to take part and side with the king, by whose meanes they had bene admitted into the Senate. The first warre he made, was with the Latines: from whom by force hee war the towne Appiolar: from thence having brought away a greater pillage in proportion, than the warre imported in brute, he set forth gamings and plaies more stately and with greater furniture and provision, than the other kings before his time. Then was the plot or compasse of ground first set out and appointed for the lists or Theatre, called now Circus maximus, wherein were assigned scaffolds for the Senators, and for the gentlemen or knights severally by themselves, called Fori, where they might make them places to see the pastimes at their ease and pleasure. And in this manner stood they to behold: namely upon scaffolds born up twelve foot high from the ground with forked perches or props. The gamings were running of horses, and fighting at fists and buffets: for performance whereof, there were champions sent for of purpose, especially out of Tuscane. These sports continued afterwards from yeere to yeere in great solemnitie, and named diversly, either the Romane games, or the Great games. This king moreover assigned certaine places about the Forum or common place for private men to build in: where the galleries & shops were

A were made. He went in hand likewise to wall the citie about with a stone wall, but the Sabine war staid him in the beginning, that he went not forward with that work. This came so sodainly upon him, that the enemies were passed over the river Anio, before the power of the Romanes could meet them, and make head against them. Whereupon great feare there was at Rome. And at the first a cruell conflict there was, and much blood shed on both parts, but no apparence of victorie. But after that the enemies were retired once into the campe, and that the Romanes had time to gather fresh forces, Tarquinius supposing his onely want was in his cavalerie, determined to joine unto the Rhamnenses, Titienles, and Luceres, which Romulus had ordained, other centuries or cornets of horsemen, and them to leave unto the posteritie after him, bearing his owne name. Which because Romulus had done aforetime by the counsell and advise of Augures, Accius Navius renowned and famous in those daies for his skill that way, opposed himselfe and gave out plainly, that there might be nothing changed or newly ordained in that behalfe, unless the birds first approved and allowed the same. Whereat the king was wroth, and in scorn and derision of his art, as they say: Come on Sir Soothsayer (quoth he) areed, and tell me by the flight of your birds, whether that may possible be done, which I now conceive in my mind. To which demand Navius, who had first made prooffe thereof by his learning, answered resolutely, that it might in very deed bee effected. Why then (quoth hee) I have imagined in my conceit, that thou shalt cut a whetstone asunder with a rasor: Here take them to thee, and dispatch that which thy fowles foretew may bee done: then as the report goeth, without more adoe, he cut the whetstone quite atwo. And in that verie place where this feat was done, the Statue or Image of Accius was erected, with his head covered, even in the Comitium, at the staires thereof on the left hand of the Curia or counsell house. It is reported that the whetstone also was set up in the same place, for a memoriall to all posteritie following, of that miracle. Certes, both Auguries, and the priesthood and colledge of Augures, from that time forward was so highly honoured, and had in such reverence, that never after was there ought done, either in warre abroad, or in peace at home, but by their counsell and advise. Assemblies of people summoned were dismissed, armies levied and readie to take the field were discharged, yea and the greatestt affaires of State, were given over and laid aside, when the birds allowed nor thereof. Neither did Tarquinius for that time alter the centuries of the horsemen anie whit, onely hee redoubled the number, so that in three centuries or cornets there were 1300 horse: and those latter sort who were added to the others, bare the names of the former, which at this day, because they be double, are called the sixe centuries. Tarquine thus having encreased that part of his power, had the Sabines battell the second time. And over and besides, that the Romanes armie was in strength well amended, he devised also privily a subtile Stratageme, and sent certain men to set on fire a mightie stacke of wood, lying upon the bancke of Anio, and so to cast it into the river: the wood burning still by the helpe of the wind, and most of it being driven against the piles of the bridge, and ther sticking close together with the boats and plancks, fired and consumed it cleane. This accident both terrified the Sabines in their fight, and when they were discomforted, troubled them much, and hindered their flight: so that manie a man having escaped the enemy, yet perished in the verie river. Whose armour and weapons floating downe the Tyber, were knowne at Rome, and brought newes thither of this victorie, in manner before word could be brought thereof by land. In this conflict the horsemen won greatestt price and praise. For being placed at the skirts of both the wings, at what time as the maine battell of their owne footmen, were now at the point to reule, they charged so forcible upon the enemy (as it is reported) from the flankes where they were marshalled, that they not onely staid the Sabine legions pressing hard and fiercely upon those that began to shrink and give backe, but all at once put them to flight. The Sabines ran amaine towards the mountaines, but few gat thither: for the greater number as we said before, were by the horsemen driven into the river. Tarquinius thinking it good to take the time, and follow hard upon them whiles they were frighted, after he had sent to Rome, the bootie with the prisoners, and burned on a great heape together (as hee had vowed to Vulcane) the spoiles of the enemies, marched on still forward, and lead his armie into the territorie of the Sabines: who albeit they had already sustained an overthrow, & could not hope for better successe, yet because they had no time to consult and advise with themselves, with such a power as might on a suddaine in that stirre bee raised, met with him. Where they once againe were defeated and vanquished, and in the end being in dispaire to make their part good, they sued for peace. Then was Collatia, and all the lands about it taken from the Sabines, Egerius the kings brothers sonne, was left with a garrison at Collatia to keepe that place. And (as I find upon record) the Collatines were yeelded into his hands, and the manner of their surrender went in this order. First the king demanded thus and said: Are yee Embassadors, or deputed assignes sent from the people of Collatia to make surrender both of your selves and the Collatines? We are (quoth they.) And are the people of Collatia in their owne power, and at libertie to doe what they will? They are (say they.) Do yee also render up your selves, the people of Collatia, their town, their territorie and lands, their waters, their limits, their temples, their household stuffe and implements, and all things els, as well sacred as prophane, unto my power and the peoples of Rome? We doe yeeld (say they.) Then (quoth he) doe I accept thereof, and receive all into my hands. The Sabine warre thus finished, Tarquinius returned to Rome in triumph. After this, he warred upon the old Latines, but they never proceeded so farre on any side, as to join issue in a generall battell, and one set field for all. But bringing his power first to one towne, and after to another, he made a conquest of the whole nation of the Latines. So as these townes, Corniculum, old Ficulnea, Cameria, Crustumium, Ameriola, Medullia, Nomentum, were recovered from the old Latines, or from those that had revolted unto them.

After all this ensued peace. Then was he more earnestly bent to goe forward with his workes, begun in time of peace, than he was before busied in managing of his warres: inso much, as he gave the people no more repose at home, than he had in warres abroad. For besides that he prepared to compass the citie (which as yet he had not fortified) round about with a stone wall, the beginning of which peece of worke was by the Sabine warre interrupted and broken off: he divided also certaine draughts or vaulted finckes from aloft into the Tyber, whereby he drained and kept drie the base citie, or lowest grounds about the market place, and the other vallies betweene hill and hill, for that out of the plains and flats, they might not easily make riddance and conueiance away of the water. Moreover, he levelled a large court or plot of ground, readie for the foundation of the temple of Jupiter in the Capitoll, which he had vowed in the Sabine war, his mind even then giving him, that one day it should be a stately place.

At the same time there happened in the court a wonderfull strange thing, both in present view, and also in consequence. For as the report went, a young lad, whose name was Servius Tullius, as he lay asleepe, in the sight of manie persons had his head all on a light fire. And upon an outcrie raised at the wondering of so great a matter, the king arose: and when one of the household brought water to quench the flambe, he was by the Queene staied. And after the stir was somewhat appeased, she forbid the boy to be disquieted, untill such time as he awoke of himselfe: and within a while as the sleepe departed, the blaze likewise went out, and vanished away.

Then Tanaquil the Queene taking her husband aside into a secret roome. See you this boy (quod she) whom we so homely keepe, and in so poore and meane estate bring up? VVot well this, and know for certaine, that he will one day be a light to direct us in our dangerous troubles and doubtfull affaires; hee will bee the cheefe pillar and succour of the afflicted state of the kings house. Let us therefore cherish and foster with all kindnesse and indulgence the subject matter of so great a publicke and private ornament. VVherupon they began to make much of the boy as if he had been one of their owne children, and to instruct and traine him up in those arts, whereby forward wits are stirred to great enterprises, and to atchieve high place of wealth and honour. And soone came that to passe, which pleased the almightie gods. For he proved a yong man indeed of princely nature and towardnesse: in such sort, that when there should be a sonne in law fought out to match with Tarquinius his daughter in marriage, there was not one of all the yong gentlemen of Rome to be found comparable to him in anie respect. So as the king affianced his daughter unto him. This so great honour whereunto he was advanced, upon whatsoever cause or occasion it was, induceth me to thinke he was not the son of a bondwoman, nor that he served whilest he was a little one, as a slave. I am of their mind rather, that report thus: When Corniculum was won, the wife of Servius Tullius, a great lord and principall personage of that citie, and there slaine, was left great with child: and being among other captives knowne whose wife she was, in regard of her rare nobilitie onely, was by the Queene preserved from servitude, and at Rome in Priscus Tarchinius his house, was delivered of a child: upon which so speciall favour, there grew more familiar acquaintance betweene the two ladies the Queen and her selfe, and the child also brought up of a little one there in court, was both tenderly beloved, and also highly regarded. But his mothers fortune, whose hap was after her countrey was lost, to fall into the hands of enemies, caused men commonly to thinke that he was the sonne of a bond-slave.

A slave. Now in the eight and thirtieth yeare almost, after that Tarquinius began his raigne, was this Servius Tullius in right great estimation and credit, not onely with the king, but also with the nobilitie and commons. Then the two sonnes of Ancus, who as they alwaies before disdained in the highest degree, that they were by the deceitfull practise of their guardian, so unworthily put by the inheritance of their fathers kingdome, and that a stranger raigned at Rome, one who was not defended of anie neighbour house thereby, no nor so much as of Italian bloud: so now they began much more to take stomacke and indignation, in case that after Tarquinius the kingdome should not returne to them and their line, but should still run on end, and headlongwise fall unto such base varlets: That in the same citie, a hundred yeares almost after that Romulus the sonne of a god, and a god himselfe, raigned therein, (during the time he remained here upon the earth) a verie bondlave and no better, and one borne of a bondwoman, should be possessed of the crowne: and that it would be a foule stain and dishonour generally to the name of the Romans, but most especially to their house and familie, if whilest the issue male of Ancus lived, the kingdome of Rome should lie open, and be exposed, not to strangers alone, but which is more, to verie bondmen and slaves. This ignominie therefore, and open wrong, they resolve by fine force to put by and avoid: howbeit, the greivance of this injurie done unto them, set them on against Tarquinius himselfe, rather than Servius Tullius; both for that the king, if he lived still, would be a more sharp revenger of the murder, than a privat person: and also if they should happen to kill Servius, whomsoever besides, the king would vouchsafe for his son in law, him was he like to make heir apparent, & inheritor also of the kingdome.

B. For these considerations they lay wait for to murder the king himselfe in this manner: There were for the purpose to do this feat, two passing stout and sturdie hearthen chosen, who having such rusticall yron tooles about them, as they were wont both of them to occupie, and made a great shew of a most tumultuous brawle and fray in the very porch of the court gate: by which means, they drew all the kings officers, sergeants, & guard about them: then as they called with a loud voice, both the one and the other upon the king, in such wise, as the noise was heard within the pallace, they were convented before his highnes. At their first comming, they cried out both at once, and interrupted one another in all outrageous manner, so as by a sergeant they were faine to be restrained & commanded to speak by turnes, untill at length they gave over their confused brawlings. Then one of them for the pones, as it was before agreed, began his tale: and while the king, as wholly bent to give care turned aside towards him, the other lift his axe aloft, and strooke the king on the head, and leaving it sticking there still in the wound, they whipt out both of them together, and ran their waies. And whilest they that stood next about Tarquinius, tooke him up readie to die, the sergeants made after them that were fled, and apprehended them. Whereupon an outcrie arose, and a great concourse of people, wondering what the matter might be. Tanaquil in this hurlyburly caused the court gates to bee shut, and commanded everie one to avoid the place: and at one instant with great diligence provideth things requisite to cure the wound, as if there were some hope of life: and withall, if that should faile, hee prepareth other meanes and remedies against the worst that might happen. Sending therefore in all speed for Servius, when she had shewed him her husband halfe dead, and already bloudlesse: shee tooke him by the right hand, and besought him not to suffer, either the death of his father in law unrevenge, or his wives mother, to be a laughing stocke unto the enemies. Thine is the kingdome O Servius by right (quoth shee) if thou bee a man; and not theirs, who by the hands of others have committed a most shamefull and villainous fact. Take a good heart therefore, and arme thy selfe, and follow the guidance and direction of the gods, who long since by a divine and heavenly flame burning about thy head, foreshewed that one day it should bee highly advanced. Now let that heavenly blaze, raise thee up: now awake in verie deed: what man! wee also being strangers have borne the scepter: consider with thy selfe who thou art now, and not from whence thou art descended. And if in so suddaine an occurrence, thine owne wits be astonished, and to seeke, then follow my reed, and be advised by my counsell. In this while the noice and violence of the people was so great, that it could not well be suffered. Then Tanaquil from the upper loft of the house, out at a window that opened into the new street (for the king kept his court hard by the temple of Jupiter Stator) spake unto the people, willing them to be of good cheare. The king indeed (quoth she) was amazed and shrownd at the suddaine stroke, howbeit it went nothing deepe: for now is he come againe to himselfe, his wound cleafed from bloud, and searched: all signes of life, and no danger of death: and I trust in God within a while you shall shall see himselfe againe. In the meane time his pleasure his, that the people shall be obeyant to Servius Tullius: he shall minister justice and give lawes, he shall execute and performe all the offices of the king. Then came Servius abroad in his roiall robe; called Trabea, attended with the Lictors; and sitting in the kings throne, some causes he dispatcheth himselfe, of other some he maketh as though he would consult and confere with the king. Thus for certaine daies, the king being dead, and his death concealed, he, under colour of executing the function of another, gathereth strength to himselfe. But when at the last it was openly knowne by the wailing and lamentation which arose in the pallace, that the king was departed, Servius accompanied with a strong guard, shewed himselfe, and was the first, that without the election of the people onely by the will and consent of the nobles, tooke the kingdome upon him.

The sonnes of Ancus at the first, seeing the murderers attached, and hearing that the king was alive, and Servius so mightie, retired themselves as banished persons to Suessa Pometia. And Servius now sought meanes to make himselfe strong, as well by private helpees, as by publicke. And least peradventure the children of Tarquinius should another day be as ill affected against him, as the children of Ancus were against Tarquinius, he gave in marriage his two daughters to Lucius and Aruns, two of the kings sonnes late deceased; Yet could not he with all the policie of mans wit, stay the fatall necessitie, nor stop and divert the course of the destinies, but that the envie that followeth a kingdome, bred all distrust, disloyaltie, and mallice, even among those of his owne household, for all their alliance and affinitie. Howbeit, in very good time, and fitly for the quietnesse of the present state, was the warre with the Veientes. (for now was the tearme of the truce expired) and other Tuscanes, taken in hand. In which warre, both the valour, and also the good fortune of Tullius was well scene and greatly renowned. Who having discomfited a mightie host of the enemies, as undoubted king in the conceit and judgement as well of the Senatours as of the commons, if their hearts had been founded, returned to Rome.

Then in hand went he with a worke of peace, and of all other the greatest, and of most importance. To the end, that as Nyma was the first author of divine law and religion, so the posteritie for ever after might report and record, that Servius was the founder of all distinction and order; whereby betwene degrees of worship and wealth, there might be scene due difference, and regard of worth. For he devised and ordained the Cense, to wit, the Assessing, and taxation of the cittizens: a thing most profitable to that state and government, which was like in time to come, to grow so mightie. By which Cense, the charges and contributions, either in war or peace, was not levied by the poll upon the cittizens, as aforetime, but according to the valuation of their wealth and abilitie. So he erected certaine Classes and Centuries, and appointed their degrees, according to the assessing, and valuation, meet in decent manner to serve in warre, and meet to be employed in peace. And first, of those who were rated at an hundred thousand ASSES and above, he ordained 80 Centuries; 40 of the elder sort, and as manie of the younger: and all jointly were counted the first Classis. The elder were charged to be in readinesse at all howers, for defence of the cittie: the younger to follow the warres abroad. These were bound to find harness: for defence of their owne bodies, an headpeece or morion, a sheild, greeves, and corselet, all of brasse: and for offence of the enemye, a javelin and a sword. To this Classis were adjoined two Centuries of carpenters and smiths, or engineers, who were in wage, and served without armour: and their charge was to find the campe engines of batterie and artillerie. The second consisted of those that were valued betwene 100000 and 75000 ASSES. And of this sort both young and old, were enrolled twentie Centuries: who were enjoined to provide for their armour, a target or buckler in stead of a shield; and excepting onely a corselet, in all points as the former. The third he would have to be of those that were esteemed worth 50000 ASSES, and as manie Centuries of them, and with the same distinction of age. Neither concerning their armour was any thing altered: only for their greeves they were dispensed with. In the fourth Classis were those that were assessed in the Subsidie booke, betwene 50000 and 25000 ASSES, and of them were 10 manie Centuries. Their armour was changed, having no more but a speare and a casting dart, with a loope called Verutum. The fift was greater, containing thirtie Centuries. These carried with them slings and stones to sling a farse off: among whom were reckoned the beadels or criers, together with the trumpetters & cornetiers, who were divided into three Centuries. This band stood of them that were assessed from 25000 unto 10000 ASSES. The valuation under this, comprised all the rest of the multitude. Whereof arose one Centurie, freed and exempted from warfare. Thus having furnished and disposed the forces of the Infanterie, he enrolled besides twelve Centuries of horsemen, and those out of the principall men of the cittie: and sixe other Centuries likewise, to those three that Romulus instituted, retaining the same name still, that they in their first solemne institution had. These horsemen for to buy their great horses, had 10000 ASSES out of the chamber of the cittie, a peece: & for to find and keepe those horses, were the rich widdows set, yearly at 2000 ASSES a peece. Thus were all these charges and burdens shifted from off the poore mens shoulders, and laid upon the rich. And therefore afterward was their dignitie and honour so much the more. For in the grand lectures and solemne elections of Magistrats, everie man had not prerogative alike, nor equall authoritie, as Romulus first ordained, and the other kings continued, when they gave their voices by the poll indifferently, one with another: but there was distinction made, and certaine degrees; but so, as neither any one was excluded or shut out, and yet the whole rested and lay in the power of the richer sort, and cheefe of the cittie. For first the horsemen were called: afterward, the eightie Centuries belonging to the first Classis, of the principall footmen: who if they disagreed, and happened to be at anie difference, then the Centuries of the second Classis were cited. And never went they likely so low, as to the last of all. Neither ought anie man to marvel, that this order in these daies, after five and thirtie tribes complete, agreed not with the Centuries of the elder and younger sort, according to the computation set downe by Servius Tullius, considering their number is now doubled. For having divided the cittie into foure Wards, according to the quarters and hils; those parts which were inhabited, he called Tribes, of the word Tribute (as I suppose.) For he it was that devised and brought up the manner of equall contribution and payment, proportionably to the assessment and rate of mens goods. Neither were these tribes anie waies at all respective to the division or number of the Centuries afore said. When this Cense and taxation was finished, which he dispatched the sooner, by reason of the peoples feare of an act by him made, concerning those that should not come in to be registred and enrolled in the Subsidie booke; he published an edict, under paine of imprisonment and death, that all cittizens of Rome, as well horsemen as footmen, should the morrow after at the breake of day, everie one in his owne Centurie, shew himselfe in Campus Martius, in Mars field. There, after he had mustered and embattelled the whole annie, he assailed and purged the same with the sacrifice of a Swine, a Sheepe, and a Bull. And this was called Conditum Lustrum. Which was the very closing up and accomplishment of the assessment. In this Lustrum, there were numbred and assessed 80000 Cittizens. Fabius Pictor, a most ancient writer sayth moreover, that so many there were of able men to beare armes. For to containe this multitude, it was thought good the cittie should be enlarged. Whereupon he adjoineth unto it two hils more, to wit, Quirinalis, and Viminalis. After this, he proceeded to augment the mount Esquilie: and to grace that hill, and make it of more reputation, there he dwelt himselfe, and had his court. He cast a trench and ditch, and raised a rampire about the cittie, and then walled it: by occasion wherof, he set out the Pomœrie further. Pomœrium, according to the Etymologic and litterall signification of the word, is as much to say, as Postmarium, or the Arriermure, that is, a plat of ground behind, or without the wall. But indeed it is rather a space about the wal on either side, which the Tuscanes in old time, when they built their cities, used by advise of Augures, to hallow and consecrate in certain bounds and limits, all along where they minded to set the wall: that neither within-forth the houses might joine upon the wall (whereas now adaies they build close to) and without also, there might be a void peece of ground, lying common, free, and unoccupied of men. This vacant space, that neither might lawfully be inhabited, nor yet eared and planted, as well because it was without the wall, as the wal without it, the Romanes called Pomœrium. And ever as the circuit of the cittie was made larger, looke how much the wals should be set out further, so farre those hallowed and consecrated bounds of the Pomœrie were extended.

Thus the cittie being much increased in compasse of building, and all things disposed in good order, requisite as well for war as peace; to the end, that he should not alwaies seeke to purchase wealth and puissance by war and martiall prowesse onely, he attempted to amplifie his dominion by pollicie, and withall to bestow upon the cittie some glorious ornament to beautifie the same. And even at that time was the temple of Diana at Ephesus, of great fame, and much renowned: which as the report went, was built in common by all the states and princes of Asia. When as therefore Servius would use highly to praise and commend unto the lords and heads of the Latines (with whom of purpose he had both in publicke and privat, mutuall intertainment and familiar acquaintance) that generall agreement of the princes of Asia, in matters of religion, gion, and in the uniforme worship of the same gods: at length, by much iterating and following still that theme, he prevailed with them so far, that the nations of the Latines, and the people of Rome together, built at Rome a temple unto Diana: which was a plaine confession, and cleare case, that Rome was now the imperiall seat, for which they had so often warred. This quarrell, albeit now the Latines all in a manner had neglected quite, and made no care at all thereof, seeing they had so often attempted it by force of armes, and sped so badly: yet fortune seemed to one only man to cast a favourable aspect, and yeeld good hope, by his private policie and industrie, to recover againe the imperiall dignitie unto the Latines. A certaine houtholder forsooth of the Sabines, had as they say, a cow bred with him of a wonderfull bignesse, and fair withall (for a memoriall of which so rare and wonderfull beast the hornes were set up, and remained fast fixed in the porch of Dianas temple, many a hundred yeares after) this was supposed (as it was no lesse in very deed) a strange and prodigious thing: and the wisemen or wizards prophesied, that the soveraintie and Empire should be seded and established in that State, where of any one citizen sacrificed that cow unto Diana. This prophesie came to the eares of the priest of Dianas temple. The Sabine above said, so soone as he had espied a meet and convenient day for sacrifice, drives the cow to Rome, and leads her to the temple of Diana: and there presented her before the altar: where the Romane priest wondering to see so huge a beast, where of there had been so much speech, and calling to mind withall the aforesaid Oracle, spake to the Sabine in this wise, My friend (quoth he) what meane you to sacrifice so uncleanelly unto Diana, and doe not rather purifie and wash your selfe all over in some running streame: before you come hither? Lo where Tyber runneth in the valley beneath. The stranger then, moved with some scruple of conscience, who desired nothing more, than that all should be well and orderly done, that an happie successe might be correspondent and answerable to so prodigious a beast, forthwith went downe to the Tyber. In the meane while, the Romane killed the Cow in honour of Diana. This thing pleased the king and the whole cittie wonderfull well.

Servius, albeit he were now without all question by so long continuance, fully and really invested in the kingdome; yet because he heard say, that young Tarquinius otherwhile gave out speeches of him, that he reigned without the nomination and election of the people: therefore after he had first wan the hearts of the commons, by dividing among them every one, certaine lands gotten by conquest from the enemies, he adventured to propound unto the people, & put it to their suffrages and voices, Whether their will and pleasure was, that he should raigne over them. Thus was he declared king with as great consent, as never any before with the like. But Tarquinius for all this, had never the lesse hope to aspire and attaine unto the crowne: nay rather so much the more, because he understood the said division of the lands among the commons, was a thing concluded & passed against the wil & mind of the Senators. Taking therefore occasion therby to accuse & blame Servius before them, he supposed he had good means offered to wind himself into favor with the lords of the Senat, & so to become strong in the counsell house. Over and besides, he was both himself a young man of great courage & hot stomach, & his wife likewise at home, dame Tullia, layever upon him, & pricked forward his distempered & troubled mind: for you must thinke, that the roiall court of Rome also, hath brought forth and afforded one example of a tragicall and horrible act: that by a wearines and lothing conceived against the kings government, liberty and freedome might the sooner ensue: and that raigne bee the last, which was by mischeefe gotten first. This L. Tarquinius whether he were the sonne or nephew of Priscus Tarquinius, it is not very cleare, howbeit, I would rather thinke with most writers, that he was his sonne. A brother he had, Aruns Tarquinius, a young gentleman of a mild nature. These two (as is aforesaid) had married the two Tullie, the kings daughters, and they also themselves were in conditions farre unlike. And happily it so fell out, that two froward and violent natures were not coupled together in wedlock: such was the good fortune, I beleve, of the Romane people, that thereby the raigne of Servius might continue the longer, and the cittie brought and settled in good order. The younger Tullia, a stout dame and a proud, grieved and vexed much that her husband had nothing in him, no mettall or matter at all, either to cover and desire, or to enterprise and adventure: her mind was fully set upon the other Tarquinius, him she esteemed highly, and had in admiration, him she said to be a man indeed, and defended of roiall blood. As for her sister, she despised and checked her, for that the having a forward and valorous knight to her husband, sat still, and seconded him not in audacitie and boldnesse, as a woman should doe. Well in short time likeness and disposition soone brought them together, and

A and as it is commonly seene, Naught will to naught, and fort best together. But the mischeefe and trouble that brought all up side downe, arose from the woman. For she using to have secret conference with her sisters husband, never ceased to speake badlie, and to raile of her own husband unto his brother, and of her sister unto her husband. Affirming in good earnest, it were better both for her selfe to be a widow, and for him to live single, and without a wife, than so to be mismatched as they were, and through the craven cowardise of others to languish and come to nothing. As for her selfe, if the gods had given her an husband according to her owne quality and worthinesse, she doubted not to see, and that very shortly, the crowne in her own house, that now she seeth in her fathers. In this manner possesseth she quickly the humorous young man, and filled his head with her owne rashnesse and follies. Now when Aruns Tarquinius and the elder Tullia, who died just in a manner both at one time, had well rid their owne houses, and made way and overture for a new marriage, it was not long but they were married, with Servius his leave and connivence, rather than his good liking. But then every day more than other began Tullius to be a continual mote in their eies, his old age hatefull, and his raign more odious: for now the woman minded nothing but one mischeefe upon another: and would not suffer her husband to be at rest night nor day, least peradventure the former murders done and past, should serve to no purpose, and misse the effect of their designements. And thus she brake out and said: That she wanted not before one that carried the name of an husband, with whom she served, & kept her selfe quiet and said nothing. But she had a want of one, that thought himselfe worthe of a kingdome, that remembered he was the sonne of Tarquinius Priscus, that loved better to be seised of a crowne and scepter indeed, than hope for a kingdome, and here thereof. But sir (quoth she) if you be the man to whom I take my selfe wedded, then I cal you both husband and king: if not, then is our case changed for the worse, in that, cowardlinesse is accompanied now with wickednesse. Why resolve you not? why arme you not your selfe, and go about this businesse? you need not go so far as to Corinth or Tarquinij, for to seeke and compasse forraine kingdomes, as your father did. The gods of your owne house and native country, the linage and example of your father, the kings pallace, and therein therioiall seat and throne of estate, yea the very name of Tarquinius, createth, nameth, and salureth you king. But and if your heart will not serve you to these designs, why beare you the world in hand and deceiue them? why take you so upon you as you doe, to shew your selfe as a kings sonne? Get you hence to Corinth againe, away to Tarquinij, turne backward to your former stocke and condition, more like to your brother than to your father. With these and such like motives, by way of reproofe she checketh the young man, set him on, and pricked him forwards, and she her selfe for her part, could be at no repose, for thinking that Tanaquil, an alien and stranger borne, could contrive in her head, and effect so great a matter, as to make two kings together, one after other, namely her husband first, and afterward her son in law: and she her owne selfe, a kings daughter, could beare no stroke either in giving or taking away a kingdome. Tarquinius kindled with these furies and temptations of a woman, went about, laboured, and made court to the Nobles, especially those that were Minorum gentium: erst soones putting them in mind of the pleasures and favours that his father had done them, and requiring now of dutie the like good time at their hands. The young men, the flower and manhood in generall of the cittie, he wrought and won to himselfe with gifts: and so partly with great promises, what wonders he would doe, and partly with raising slanders upon the king in all places, and charging upon him odious crimes, he grew very great and mightie. At the last, espying a convenient time to set on foot, and put in execution his intended projects, with a strong guard of armed men, hee entered forcible into the Forum or common place of assemblie, whereat the people all surprised with great feare, he sat him downe upon the kings throne, even at the entrance of the Curia or Senate house, and there, by the voice of the crier summoned the Senators to counsell before king Tarquinius. Who forthwith there assembled together: Some, thereto made and prepared aforehand others, for feare least their not comming, might turn them to displeasure. And as they were assented at this strange and wonderfull sight, so they thought Servius utterly undone, and his case desperate. This Tarquinius began an invective in spitefull and reprochfull tearmes, touching the first pedigree or parentage of Servius: saying, that he being a slave, and born of a bond woman, after the cruell and shamefull death of his father Tarquinius, usurped the kingdome: not by meanes of an Interreigne, as the order was aforesaid, nor by a solemne assemblie, and the free voices of the people, ne yet by the assent of the nobles, but only through the wile and fraud of one woman. And as he was (quoth he) thus borne and thus created king, so hath he been a partial favouier ever of the basest fort, even such as himselfe; and in hatred of the noble birth of others G hath divided amongst the vilest persons, lands taken from the chiefe men of the citie; and all such burdens and charges, as had ben in times past common to all, he hath cast upon great personges of qualitie and worth, and set up an assessing or taxing, that the state of the wealthier persons being made knowne and exposed to envie, he might bring them into disgrace with the people, and bestow their goods upon the poorett and neediest at his pleasure. Amidst this Oration of his, came Servius in place, advertised of the matter by a fearefull messenger in all hast. And presently began to crie out with a lowd voice, at the very porch or entrie of the Curia: What is here ado (quoth hee) and what meaneth this O Tarquinius? How darest thou, during my life, assemble the Senatours or sit on my seat? Whereunto he stoutly made a proud answer, that hee did but keepe his fathers throne, and being as hee was, a kings sonne, hee deemed himselfe more worthie to bee inheritor of the kingdome, than a bondslave: and as for him, hee had been suffered long ynough to play with his good Masters, and to insult over his betters. With this arose a great clamour from the parakers and complices of both sides: the people they ran from all parts to the counsell house, and like it was, that the stronger should be king. Then Tarquinius being put to his shifts, and forced to trie the utmost, seeing no other remedie, tooke Servius by the middle, as being himselfe much younger and stronger farre, carried him out of the counsell house, and threw him downe from the staires head to the foot, and so returned againe into the Senate house, to get the Senators together. The kings officers with the guard attending upon him, fled. Himselfe well neere dead, with certaine of his courtiers and traine, breathlesse also for feare, made speed, and retired towards his pallace, as farre as to the top of Cyprius street, where he was overtaken by them that were sent by Tarquinius, and so slaine outright. And it is verily thought, that this was done by the suggestion and procurement of Tullia; so little disagreeeth it from other wicked pranks of hers. But this one thing is known for certaintie, that she came riding in her coach into the common place of assemblie, & nothing dismaied or abashed at the presence of so many men, there met together, called forth hir husband out of the Senat house, & was the first that stiled him with the title of king. By whom shee being willed to depart away out of that throng and upore, as she returned homeward as far as the pitch of Cyprius street, where was of late a place consecrated unto Diana, called Dianium; the coachman that had the guiding and driving of the steeds, as he turned the chariot on the right hand up to the cliffe Virbius, for to passe up to the hill Esquiliz, suddainely staied for feare, and reined in his horses, and shewed unto his ladie and mistresse, Servius lying there murdered. And hereof followed (as the report goeth) a beastly part, and beyond all sence of humanitie, which the very place doth witnesse still at this day, called thereupon Sceleratus Vicus, i. the wicked street: wherein, the raging and frantike woman Tullia, harried with the furies, and haunted with the ghosts of her siter and husband, caused (men say) her chariot to be driven over her fathers dead corps; and being her selfe besprent and beraied with the bloudie chariot, caried home with her some part of it in token and witnesse, that her hand was in this parricide and murder of her owne father: to the end, that shee might provoke her owne domesticall gods and her husbands to wrath and displeasure: and so consequently, as they entred their raigne with mischeefe and wickednesse, they might soone after be turned out thereof with shame and infamie. Servius Tullius raigned foure and fortie yeares, in such wise carrying himselfe, as it were hard, even for a good and staied prince that should succeed him, to follow his steps. This made moreover for his glorie and fame, that together with him died all right and lawfull government of Romane kings. And even that regiment of his, so mild, so gracious, and temperate as it was: yet because it rested in the absolute power of one man, he was minded, as some doe write, to have forgone and given over, had not this wicked intestine practise from his owne familie come betweene, to prevent and cut off his good designes and intent to let his country free.

After him began to raigne Tarquinius, for his insolent acts surnamed Superbus, i. the proud.
For he would not suffer his wives father (unkind sonne in law he) to be interred: saying estoons in jibing manner, that Romulus also died, and was never buried. Moreover, the principall heads of his peeres and nobles, such (as he thought) had favoured Servius his proceedings, and tooke part with him, those he made away and slew. Afterwards, fearing upon the guilt of his owne conscience, that he had given an ill precedent for others, to take vantage against himselfe, attaining to the crown so leaudly, he retained therefore a guard of armed men about his bodie: and in very truth, setting only might aside, no other right had he to wear the diademe, as who raigned neither

A neither by peoples election nor Senatours approbation. Over and besides all this, to the end he might sit safely in his seat by servile feare and dread, who reposed no trust nor hope in the love of his subjects; therefore to strike the greater terror into them, and hold them in aw, he by himselfe alone without assistance of any counsell, sat upon all matters of life and death: by meanes wher-of he was able to kill, banish, and condemne in forfeiture of lands and goods; not those onely whom he suspected and hated, but also them, from whom he could looke for nothing else but spoil. Thus when he had decayed the number of the nobles especially, he purposed to chuse no new in their place, for to make supplie: to the end, that the fewer they were, the more contemptible the whole order might grow: and with lesse discontent, put up the indignitie, that they were not employed in the State, nor ought done by their advise. For this king was the first, that abolished the custome received and continued by all others afore him, of consulting with the Senat in all matters, and managing nothing without them. He governed the Commonweale by himselfe, and after his owne waies: with whom it pleased him he made war and peace, league and societie, even of his owne head: and would breake the same as himselfe thought good: thus he did, and undid all at his pleasure, without regard of the peoples mind, or the Senates authoritie.
Above all, he sought to win the hearts and good wils of the Latine nation, that by support of foraine power also, he might be more secure and safe among his owne people: neither entertained he with their princes, friendship and amitie only, but entred also into alliance and affi-nitie with them. For unto Ostavius Mamilius a Tusculane, he gave his daughter in marriage. This Mamilius was of all the Latines the principall and noblest person, lineally descended (if we may beleeve the common bruit and report) from Physes and Circe. By this marriage he gained many kinsfolke and friends of his new sonne in law. So that now Tarquinius was in great authoritie and reputation among the lords and Barons of the Latines. Whereupon he gave them knowledge, and proclaimed, that upon a certain day they should all meet him at the sacred grove of Feren-tina, to treat and commune together about matters concerning the common good of both States. Thither resorted they in great number betimes in the morning. And Tarquinius himselfe failed not for his part, to keep the very day appointed, but it was sunsetting welneere before he came. There, in that assemblie all day long, before his coming, was much talke and reasoning, pro & contra, touching him. Turnus Herdonius of Aricia, had inveighed spightfully against Tar- quinius in his absence (for his being away) saying it was no marvell indeed that he was at Rome D surnamed Superbus (for even then commonly they termed him so, although secretly, & in whispering wise.) For could there be (quoth he) a powder part plaid, than thus to mock, delude, & abuse the whole state of Latium, that when their princes and nobles were cited there to appeare, farre from their cities and dwelling houses, he only should be absent that summoned the assemblie?
Which verily was but a devise of his to trie their patience, that if they once tooke the yoke; he might keep them stil under as his vassails for who seeth not what he reacheth at even to command and lord it over the Latines. And in case his owne citizens have done well, in trusting him in the rule over them (if a man may say they trusted him, & not rather that he came foullie and forcibly by it, even with shameful murder) the Latins also may put themselves into his hands with se-curitie. And yet I see not why they should so doe, considering he is a meere stranger and alien.
E But how and if his owne subjects repent, and are discontented with him, being one after another by him murdered, banished, deprived, and spoiled of their goods? What better dealings may the Latines hope and looke for? Therefore if they would be ruled by him, they should depart home everie man, and not keepe the day of the Diet no more than he doth that published and proclaimed it. Whilst this seditious and dangerous person, who by these and such like factious courtes was growne to be a great man and powerable in his countrey, stood arguing thus, inforcing and following hard upon other points, tending to the same effect, in commeth Tar- quinius. Whereupon hee brake off his speech, and all was hush. Then turned every man to salute and welcome Tarquinius: Who after silence made (being advised by some of his familiaris that were next unto him, to excuse himselfe for comming at that time of the daie) F said, that hee had bene taken to bee an arbitrator or daiesman betweene the father and the sonne: and because hee was desirous and carefull to procure attonement betweene them, and to make them good friends; hee made the longer stay and came the later. Which occasion of businesse seeing it had disappointed them of that day, therefore the morrow after hee would deliver that which hee had in purpose and intended to moove unto them. But Turnus (as they say) could not hold, nor put up so much as this with silence: but brake out

and said againe, there was no speedier deciding and taking up of any matter, than betweene G the Father and the Sonne; a thing that might be dispatched in few words: for if he would not obey and giue place unto his father, he should abide the smart of it with a mischiefe. And thus the Aricine having girded as it were, and glaunched at the Romane king, departed out of the assemblie. Which thing Tarquinius taking more displeasantly a good deale then he made semblance of, forthwith deuised and practised to bring Turnus to his death, that he might strike the same terrour into the hearts of the Latines, wherwith he had kept under his owne subjects at home. And for that he had no absolut power to cause him openly to be slaine, he framed most falsly a criminall action against the guilelesse man; therby wrongfully to worke his destruction. By meanes of certaine Aricians of a contrarie faction, he wrought a bondslawe of Turnus with a summe of monie, to suffer a number of swords prively to be conveyed into his masters Inne or lodging: which being done in that one night accordingly, Tarquinius some- what before day, sent for the chiefe Lords of the Latines to come unto him; and pretending as though he were frighted by some strange accident, said that his long tarrying the day before, (by Gods speciall providence, as it were, so appointed) was for the safetie of him and them all. For he was informed that Turnus contrived to massacre both him and the heads of their nation, to the end that he alone might raigne over the Latines: That he minded yesterday to have put this plot in execution, even in the verie assemblie; but the deed was deferred, for that himselfe (the principal author of that meeting) whose life he sought for aboue all other, was not in place. And herupon it was (saith he) that he fared so as he did, and railed against him so bitterly the day before in his absence; for that he by his long tarrying had put him by his hope and the effect of his designs: and if all were true that was told him, he nothing doubted but early in the morning at break of the day, so soone as they were set in counsell together, he would come armed and well appointed with a crew of his adherents & swome confederates: for reported it is, (quoth he) that a number of swords and other weapons are brought into his lodging: which whether it be so or no, might soone be knowen. And therwith he desired them to take the paines to go with him thither. And verily, considering the proud nature and haucie spirit of Turnus, together with his yesterdaies Oration, and the long stay of Tarquinius besides, for that the pretended massacre seemed theby to have bene put off and prolonged, the matter became very suspitious and pregnant. Thus go they with minds verily somewhat enclined and disposed to beleue all, and yet so, as they would thinke all the rest but tales and lies, unless they found the swords aforesaid. Being come to the house, and Turnus awakened out of sleepe, certaine warders were set to keepe him on every side: and when they had laid hold upon his servants, who for love of their lord and master began to make resistance, the swords were brought forth out of all the blind corners of the hostellie openly to be seene: then was it a cleare case and past all peradventures: and Turnus was apprehended & yrons clapt upon him. And immediately in all hast the Latins assembled together to counsell in that great tumult and uprore: Where, upon bringing forth the swords in sight before them all, they were so incensed and deadly bent against him, that he was not suffered to answer and plead for himselfe, but was presently at the source or spring head of the Ferentine water plunged downe, & a hurdle done aloft upon him, & great stones heaped thereon, and so after a new kind of death stifled & drowned. Tarquinius then, after he had called the Latins againe to the place of counsell, & much commended them for dulle executing Turnus, who practising thus to alter and trouble the state, was detected of a manifest intended murder, made this speech unto them: I might (quoth he) if I would, by vertue of ancient rites alledge and plead, that for as much as all the Latines are descended from Alba, they are comprised within that confederacie and league, whereby in the raigne of Tullus the whole Commonweale and State of Alba, together with their inhabitants, became incorporate into the Empire of Rome. Howbeit, in regard rather of the commoditie and weale publicke of all, I iudge it requisite, that the league were renewed, and that the Latines might enjoy and be pertakers of the prosperitie and happie fortune of the people of Rome, rather than evermore to hazard and suffer the destruction and desolation of their cities, with the spoiling and wasting of their lands, which first in Anciens daies tasted, and after in my fathers time they had abidden and suffered. The Latines were hereto soone perswaded. And although in that league the preheminance and soveraintie rested in the Romans, yet they saw well enough that both the heads and rulers of the Latine Nation stood with the Romane king, and were wrought unto his hand, to side with him: and also Turnus unto them was a fresh precedent and example, to teach them what danger might betide

A betide every one that should make a part against him and crosse his intention. So the alliance was renewed and proclamation made that according as it was capitulated, that all the serviceable men of the Latins should at a day appointed repaire in good number with their armor, unto the grove of Ferentina. Who when they were there met together from all parts according to the edict of the Romane king, to the end they should have no capitaine of their owne to lead them, no privie watchwood or regiment by themselves to direct them, nor private enignes distinct from the rest to keepe them together; he shuffled or mingled the bands and companies of Latines and Romaines one with another, making one of Latins and two of Romans; and when he had thus doubled the bands, he set Centurions over them. And albeit he was in peace an unjust prince, yet was he in war no bad capitaine; nay, for martiall prowesse he had bene equall to the former kings; had he not failed and degenerated in other things, and therby stained and hurt his glorie even in that behalfe. He was the first that warred upon the Volscians, which war after his time lasted more than 200 years: and wan from them by force. Sueffa Pometia. Where having made portsaile of the pillage, and raised as much gold and siluer as amounted to 40 talents, he conceived in his mind to build so stately a Temple of Iupiter as might be seeme the soveraigne king of gods and men, become the noble Empire of Rome, and answer the majesty also of the very place where it was to stand. And for the rearing and finishing of this Temple, he laid that money apart, that came of the spoile aforesaid. But presently upon this, was he surprised with a warre that held longer than he hoped it would. For having made one assault in vaine upon Gabij, a neighbour citie to Rome, and despairing also of any good successe by beleaguering the towne, for that he was valiantly repulsed from the wals, at the last he deuised and resolved to get it by wile and deceit: a course that Romaines had not usually practised. For making as though he had given over and abandoned this warre, as being now earnestly bent and busily occupied about laying the foundations of the Temple, and following other publike works in the citie: Sextus his sonne, the yongest of three, fled for the nones to Gabij, complaining of his fathers intollerable rigor and crueltie against him: saying, That now he had turned his accustomed pride from strangers upon his owne blood, and was growne to be weary of so manie children: that as he had made good hand and cleane riddance of his nobles, and left the Senat desolate, so he might bring it to passe in his own house, to leaue behind him no issue nor inheritour of the kingdom. And for his owne person verily, he was escaped from among the pikes and swords of his father, and was perswaded fully, he might no where be sure in safety, but with the capitall enemies of L. Tarquinius. For to put them out of doubt, and that they might be no longer abused, the war continued still against them, which seemed in outward shew given over and laid away: and his father would not faile, but whensoever he could spie his vantage and fit opportunitie, come upon them at unawares. But in case there were no place of refuge and protection for poore and humble suppliants amongst them, he would wander and travaill all over Latium: and if he might not rest there, he would from thence go to the Volscians, Aequians and Hernicks, untill he came to them that knew how to save the children from the crueltie and inhumane persecution of the fathers. Perhaps he should find meanes to stirre coles and kindle warre, yea and performe himselfe good service against that most proud king, and that most stout and insolent people. And seeming withall in great anger and discontentment, (if they would not regard his complaints) readie to depart and go his waies, he was kindly entertained, and friendly intreated by the Gabians: who willed him to be of good cheere and not to meruaile at all, that Tarquinius became now at length so ill affected against his own children, like as he had tyrannised alreadie upon his subjects and confederates: for he would no doubt in the end exercise his fell stomach even upon himselfe, for want of other subject matter to worke upon. And as to him, right welcome he was to them, assuring themselves that within a while it would so come to passe, that if he wiled them, would set to his helping hand, they should remoove the warre from the gates of Gabij unto the verie wals of Rome. After this, was he admitted to sit with them in common counsaile. In which he used oftentimes to say, That in other matters he gaue place, & referred himse to be advised by the ancient Gabines, as men more practised and experienced than himselfe, but for the warre, which ever and anone he perswaded them unto, himselfe tooke upon him a speciall insight & skil therein, as he that knew the strength of both nations, and was fully perswaded in the conscience, that his kings pride must needs be odious to his subjects, which his verie owne children could not brooke and endure. Thus whiles by little and little he sollicitated the principell citizens to rebell, and went himselfe daily in person with a crew of the most forward and able yooing men, forraying, spoyling and making rodes into the Territorie of the Romanies, and that now through his words and deeds, which tended to fraud and deceit in the end, they began more and more to give credit unto him that one day would deceiue them, he was at last chosen Generall for the warre. And having made certaine small skirmishes betwene Rome and Gabes, in which for the most part the Gabines had the better (whiles the simple people, God wot, saw not his drift and how he caried the matter:) then all the Gabines from the highest to the lowest, thought verily and in good earnest, that Sextus Tarquinius was sent them by speciall grace even from God above to be their Capitaine and Protector. But with the soldiers, what with attempting painefull enterprises & performing dangerous service, and what with dealing prizes liberally amongst them; it passed how he grew into credit, & how dearly he was beloved; in so much as Tarquinius the Father was of no greater command at Rome, than Tarquinius the Sonne at Gabes. This when he saw he had gathered strength sufficient, and was fully furnished against all affaires; he dispatched unto his father at Rome, one of his trustie servants with credence, to know his will & pleasure, seeing that the gods had done him this grace, that he at Gabes was able to do all in all. To this message made the king no answer at all by word of mouth, taking the man belike, as I verily thinke, for one hardly to be trusted. But as one musing with himselfe and in a deepe studie what answer to shape, he went into a garden on the backe side of the house, and his sonnes messenger followed after. There walked he vp and downe, and said never a word: onely, with his rod or walking staffe, as it is reported, he knapt of the uttermost heads and tops of the poppies. The messenger wearie with calling for an answer, and waiting such attendance; returned to Gabes as wise as he came, and without effect of his errand: He reporteth what he had said and seene, namely how the king, whether upon anger or hatred, or pride ingrafted by nature, uttered no speech at all. But Sextus knowing by these mysticall and secret circumstances, his fathers will and direction, made no more adoe but slew the chiefe of the Citizens: some by accusations unto the people, and others by reason of disgrace they were already in, and therby exposed unto violence, were soone overthrown. Many of them were openly executed, and some whom there was little apparance or colour of justice or none at all to accuse, were secretly murdered. Divers of their owne accord fled into voluntarie exile, or else they were forced into banishment; whose goods as well as theirs that were put to death, were divided among the people. By sweetnes of this largesse of spoile, by the profit and wealth that grew to private persons; the publike wo and calamitie was nothing felt and seene: untill such time as the Gabines whole estate, disposed of counsaile, bereft of aide and succour, yielded without dint of sword unto the king of Rome.

Sextus Tarquinius to the Senators of the Gabines.

The house of Tarquinius

Tarquinius having thus gained the towne of Gabes, made peace with the nation of the Æquians, and renewed the league with the Tuscans. After this he converted his mind to the affaires of the cittie, among which this was the principall, to leave behind him the temple of Iupiter, upon the mount Tarpeius, for a monument and memorie of his raigne and name. That of two Tarquines, kings both, it might be said another day, that the father vowed it, and the son finished the same. And to the end, that the floore and plot of ground, freed and exempted from all other kind of religions, might wholly be dedicated to Iupiter and his temple, there to be built: he determined to exaugurate and to unhallow certain churches and chappels, which having been first vowed, by king Tatius, in the very extremitie of the battell against Romulus, were after by him consecrated and hallowed. In the very beginning and founding of which worke, it is said, that the divine power and soveraigne deitie, moved the gods to declare the future mightinesse of so great an Empire. For when as the birds by signes out of the Augurs learning, admitted and allowed the exauguration and unhallowing of all other cels and chappels besides, only in that of Terminus, they gave no token to confirme the unhallowing thereof: which was taken for an ominous prelage, and thus interpreted, That seeing the scar and house of Terminus was not stirred, and he the god alone that was not displaced and called forth of the limits to him consecrated; it shewed that all should remaine there firme and stable for ever. This divine token of perpetuities being received for good and currant: there followed another strange and prodigious signe, portending the greatnesse also of the Empire. For as they digged for the foundation of the temple, there appeared (as they say) a mans head, face and all whole & found: which sight imported no doubt and plainly foretold, that it should be the cheefe castle of the Empire and the capitall place of the whole world. To this effect prophesied the wisards, as well they of the cittie, as those whom they sent for out of Tuscane, to know their opinion and iudgement.

Terminus the god of bounds
and measures

A ment. Thus was the kings mind all wholly set upon sumptuous building, and spared for no cost. So that the pillage taken at Pometia, which was laid by for the accomplishment of the whole worke, would hard and scant serve for the very foundation. And therefore I would rather give credit unto Fabius Pictor (to say nothing that he is the more auncient authour of the twaine) that there were but 40 talents, and no more, than to Piso, who writeth, that there was 40000 pound weight of silver set by for that use. Which summe or masse of mony could never be looked for to arise out of the saccage of one only citie in those daies: & must needs exceed the charges of the foundation of any of these stately and magnificent buildings in this our age. The king being thus wholly minded and bent to the finishing of the temple, and sending for Carpenters, Masons, and other workemen, out of all parts of Tuscane, employed not only the citties monie and stocke thereabout, but also had the worke and labour of the common people withall. Which was no small toile of theirs, considering the travell of warfare besides: yet were they lesse agreed and discontented therewith, so long as they founded and reared with their owne hands the temples of the immortall gods. But afterwards were they employed and set to other works, which as they were lesse in shew, so were they more painfull & of greater trouble, namely the making of scaffolds or standing places in the Cirque or Theatre; and to the conuenance of a mightie great sinke or vault under the ground, for to receive and carrie away all the filth and corruption of the citie. To which two peeces of worke, scarcely is the magnificence of our new modern buildings, in any respect comparable. Having in this wise held the commons in continuall labour, because hee thought that a multitude of people would but overcharge and pester the citie, when they were not employed some way or other, and also minded by erecting Colonies, to enlarge the confines of his dominions, he therefore sent part of them to inhabite and people Signia and Circeij, two strong forts and frontier townes for the defence of the cittie by sea and land.

Tarquinius Priscus founded the temple of the Capitoll.

Whilest he was busied in these affaires, there appeared unto him a strange and fearefull sight, namely a serpent gliding downe a pillar of wood, which having put the beholders in great fright and caused them to flie into the kings pallace, did not so much amaze the kings heart with sudden and momentanie feare for the present, as fill his head with perplexed cares what the thing might portend. Whereas therefore the manner was to use the Calchars and wise men of Tuscane about publicke prodigious tokens onely: he being much troubled in spirit, and terrified at this fearefull sight, being domesticall, and as it were touching and concerning his own person: purposed to send out as far as Delphi, to the most famous and renowned Oracle in the world. And for that he durst not put any other in trust with the answers that should be delivered by the fatall lots, he addressed two of his sonnes to take a voiage through vnkown lands in those daies, and more unknown seas, into Greece. Titus and Aruns were they that went this journee, having to beare them companie all the way, L. Iunius Brutus. This Brutus was the sonne of Tarquinius the kings sister, a yooing gentleman of a farre other nature and disposition, than he seemed in outward shew and semblance. He hauing heard say that certain principall citizens, and his own brother among, had been by this his uncle put to death; to the intent that himselfe might have nothing left, eyther in the parts of his mind for the king to feare, or in his outward state for him to couet and desire: resolved under the cloake of base contempt to save himselfe, since that in right or justice he might repose small or no safegard at all. And therefore composing and framing himselfe of purpose to counterfeite a noddie and a verie innocent, as suffering himselfe and all that he had to fall into the kings hands as an escheat, he refused not to be misnamed Brutus, a name appropriat to unreasonable creatures; that under the shadow and colour of that surname, that courage of his lying close hid, which should one day set free the citie of Rome, might abide the full time and appeare in due season. This Brutus beeing by the Tarquines brought to Delphi, as their laughing stock to make them pastime by the way, rather than a meet mate to accompany them, caried with him (as men say) for to offer and present unto Apollo, a golden rod within a staffe of cornell wood, made hollow for the purpose: the very type and resemblance by secret circumstances, of his naturall disposition. Thither beeing arrived, the yong men having done their fathers commission accordingly, were very desirous and earnest to inquire and leame of the Oracle, which of them should be king of Rome. And from the bottoome of the deepe vault, this answer as men say, was deliuered in their hearing: WHICH OF YOU (O YONG MEN) SHAL FIRST KISSE YOVR MOTHER, HE SHAL BEAR CHIEFE AND SOVERAIGNE RYLE IN ROME. The Tarquines then intending that Sextus their brother

willed the matter should by all possible means be carried so secret as might be, & concealed from him. They themselves agreed upon this together, to draw lots whether of them twaine, when they were returned to Rome, should first kiss his mother. But Brutus supposing the speech of Apollo his priest, tended to another sence, made as though he stumbled forward and took a fall; and so touched the ground with his mouth and kissed the earth, thinking this with himselfe, that she was common mother of all mortall men. Then returned they to Rome. Where they found great preparation for warre against the Rutilians.

The Rutilians then were lords of Ardea. A people in those parts, and for those times, very rich and wealthie: and that was it that gave the very occasion and was the first motive of warre. The Roman king was desirous both to enrich himselfe, as having about the sumptuous building of publicke works emptied his coffers: and also by some spoile, to mollifie & win againe the hearts of his naturall subjects: being much discontented (besides their generall dislike of his pride otherwise) at his manner of government; and disdaining greatly that they were by the king made labourers, to serve carpenters and masons, and held so long to servile toile and painefull labour. The Romanes assailed at the beginning to surprize and win Ardea by assault: but when that way sped but ill, then began they to annoy and distresse the enemies by laying siege, by casting trenches, raising forts, and fabricks, about the towne. During this siege, and the standing campe lying there, as it falleth out commonly, when the warre is rather long and late than hote and cruell, there were granted large licences and passports to and fro betweene the campe and Rome, with much liberty: and yet more to the Principals of the armie than to the common soldiers. And the kings sons had otherwhile good leasure to feast and banquet one with another. Vpon a time it happened whiles they were drinking & making merry with Sextus Tarquinus in his pavilion, where Collatinus Tarquinus the sonne of Egerius sat at supper; there arose among other good table-talk, some arguing about their wives, whiles everie man highly praised and wonderously commended his owne. And growing to some heat and contention therabout: There need not many words for this matter, quoth Collatinus, for in few howeres it may be known how farre my Lucretia surpasseth all the rest. And therefore if there be any lustinesse & courage of youth in us, why mount we not on horsebacke, and in our owne persons go and see the natures and dispositions of our wives? And as they shalbe found and scene, taken of a sodaine, and not looking for their husbands coming, so let every man judge of them, and set that downe for the onely triall of this controversie. They had all taken their drinke well, and were prettily heat with wine: Marry, content say they all, and to horse they go, and away they gallop on the spur to Rome. Thither were they come by the shutting in of the evening when it grew to be darke; and so forward without any stay to Collatia they ride. Where they find dame Lucretia, not as the kings sons wives, whom they had surpris'd & seen afore, passing the time away in feasting and rioting with their minions and companions: but sitting up farre within night in the middelt of her house amongst her maidens, hard at wool-work by candle light. Whereupon, in this debate about their wives, the entire praise and commendation rested in Lucretia: Her husband and the Tarquines had a loving and courteous welcome at her hands. And hee againe for joy of the victorie, invited the kings sonnes kindly, and made them friendly cheere. There at that instant, Sextus Tarquinus was bewitched and possessed with wicked wanton lust, for to offer violence and villanie unto Lucretia: her passing beauty and her approved chastitie set him on fire and provoked him thereto. But for the present, when they had disposed themselves all night long like lustie and pleasant youths, they returned betimes in the morning to the campe. A few daies after, Sextus Tarquinus, unwitting to Collatinus, attended with one onely man came to Collatia, where he was againe in good and friendly sort received by them: in the house, that suspected nothing lesse than that whereabout he was come. And being after supper brought up into the guest chamber, when he thought all about him sure, and that every body was fast asleep, all set on fire and burning in love, hee steppeth with naked sword in hand to Lucretia, as she lay sleeping full soundly, and bearing down the womans breast with his left hand, Peace (quoth he) Lucretia, and not a word: I am Sextus Tarquinus, I have my drawne sword in hand: if thou once speake thou shalt surely die. The feely woman thus starting out of sleepe, was sore affright, as seeing no remedie but in a manner present death, in case she had cried for helpe. Then uttered Tarquinus and confessed his amorous passion, fell to intreat and intreat againe, and with his prayers intermeddled threats, and went every way about her, not ceasing by all meanes to fitt, to sound and

A and tempt the womans heart. But when he saw her obstinat and invincible, and (to die for it) not relenting one jot; then, besides the feare of death, he presented unto her dishonour and shame: pretending that after he had massacred her, he would lay by her side in naked bed, her own manservant with his throat cut; that it might be voiced abroad, that she was taken and killed in filthie adultery. For fear of this reproch and infamie, see how sinfull lust gat the victory, and conquered constant chastity and Tarquinus in great pride and jolitic, that he had by assault won the fort of a womans honor, departed thence. But wofull Lucretia, all sorrowing for so heave a mischance, dispatched a messenger to her father at Rome, and so forward to her husband at Ardea, with this errand: That they should come unto her, each of them with one faithfull and trustie friend, and hereof they must not faile, but make all the speed they could, for that there was befallen a greivous chance and horrible. So there repaired to her Sp. Lucretius her father, accompanied with P. Valerius the sonne of Volesus: and Collatinus her husband, with L. Jun. Brutus. Who both together by chance going backe to Rome, encountred in the way his wives messenger. Lucretia they found sitting alone in her bedchamber, all heave and sad: and she at the coming of these her deere friends, shed teares and wept apace. How now my deere (quoth her husband) is all well? No. God wot sir, (quoth she againe) For how can ought be well with a woman that is despoiled of her honour and womanhood? The print, Collatinus, of another man is to be seen in thy own bed. Howbeit, my bodie only is distained: my mind and heart remaineth yet unspotted: and that my death shall make good and justise. But give me first your right hands, and make faithfull promise that the adulterer shall not escape unpunished. Sex. Tarquinus is the man, he it is, who this night past, entertained as a friend, but indeed a very foe in the highest degree, hath by force & violence taken from hence with him his pleasure, a deadly pleasure, I may say, to me: & to himselfe also no lesse, if yee be men of courage. All of them one after other give their assured word, comforted the wofull hearted woman, excused her selfe that was but forced, and laid all the blame upon him that committed the shamefull act: saying, It is the mind that sinneth, and not the bodie; and where there was no will and consent, there could be no fault at all. Well (quoth she) what is his due to have, see you to that: as for me, howsoever I quit and assoile my selfe of sinne, yet I will not be freed from punishment. And never shall there by example of Lucretia, any unhoneft woman or wanton callot live a day: and thus having said, with a knife which she had close hidden under her clothes, shee stabbed her selfe to the heart, and sinking downe forward, fell upon the floor. D readie to yeld up the ghost. Our alas, cried her husband and father hereat: and whilest they two were in their plaints and mones, Brutus drew forth the knife out of the wound of Lucretia, and holding it out afore him, all embrewed and dropping with blood, Now I swear (quoth he) by this blood, by this most chaste and pure blood, before the vilanie wrought by the kings sonne, and here before the gods I protest, whom I call to witnesse, that I will by fire and sword, and with all my might and maine persecute and drive the country of L. Tarquinus the prowde, and his ingracious wife, and the whole brood of his children, and suffer neither him nor any els for his sake to raigne as king at Rome. Then gave he the knife to Collatinus, and so to Lucretius and Valerius, who greedily amased at this so strange occurrent, and wondering how it came to passe, that Brutus should of a suddaine be so changed, and become so stout of stomacke and courageous, tooke the same forme of oath that hee swar afore: and so leaving their wailing and lamentation, and wholly set upon anger and revenge, they followed Brutus as their captaine and leader, to put downe and overthrow the government of kings, and utterly to root out their race. The dead corpes of Lucretia, was had out of dores, brought into the market place, and there shewed. And thither, what with wondring (as the manner is) at so strange a sight, and what with the indignation of so unworthie a fact, they raised much people together. Everie man for his part was readie ynough to complaine of the wickednesse and violence done by the kings blood. The sorrow of Lucretia the father on the one side, the resolution of Brutus on the other side, who rebuked and blamed all vaine weeping and foolish moning, mooved and perswaded all that were present, that like men of valour, like true hearted Romanes, they would take armes against them that demeaned themselves no better, nay worse than ordinarie enemies. And presently, the bravest and tallest yong men shewed themselves forward, readie in armour, and voluntarie. The rest of the youths followed straight after. And having left at Collatia the one halfe of their forces in garrison, to ward the gates, and set certaine watches, that no man brought tidings or newes unto the king and his sons, of this rising and commotion, all the other were appointed in warlike manner, followed their leader Brutus, from thence directly to Rome. As the suddaine coming thither of this armed multitude: no marvell if all the way where as they passed and marched, there arose a feare and trouble among the people. But when they perceived the most substantiall and principall citizens in the forefront, they judged whatsoever the matter meant, it was not for naught. And verily this hainous fact disquieted the minds of men no lesse at Rome, than it had before at Collatia. Therefore from all parts of the citie there was flocking and running into the market place. And being thither come, the Bedell or common Crier, summoned the people to appeare before the tribune of the Celeres or Capitaine of the guard: which office haply Brutus bare at that time. Where he made an oration, not proceeding from that spirit, nor resembling that qualitie of nature which unto that day he had pretended and made shew of unto the world, for he inveyed against the violence and filthie lust of Sextus Tarquinius; the shamefull vilanie and not to be named, done upon the bodie of Lucretia: he discoursed of her lamentable end and piteous death, and the desolate case of Tricipitinus, bereft now of all his children: who accounted the occasion of his daughters death a greater indignitie, and more pitifull, than her verie death. Moreover he laid abroad the pride of the king himselfe, the miseries, the infinite toyle and pains of the commons, buried as it were under the ground, with cleansing and casting of ditches, voiding and ferring of the sinkes. Saying, that the men of Rome which were the conquerors of all nations about them, were now of warriors become quarriers, hewers of stone and day labourers. He reckoned vp also and put them in mind of the unworthie death and cruell murder of Servius Tullius: and how his daughter (oh abhominable act!) rode over the corps of her father in her cursed chariot: And herewith he calleth on the gods that are revengers of outrages and wrongs done to parents. Thus rehearsing these and other matters, much more grievous and horrible, (I verily beleue) according as the present indignitie at the verie time doth minister and giue utterance for, nor so easie penned and set downe by writers that come after, he so mightily inflamed the multitude, that he caused them to depose the king, to deprive him of his royall state and dignitie, yea and to decree and enact, that L. Tarquinius with his wife and children should be banished for ever. Himselfe hauing selected & armed the yonger gallants who offered their service, and willingly entered their names, set forward in person to the campe lying before Ardea, for to excite the armie there against the king: leauing the government of the Citie unto Lucretius, who had before bene appointed deputie and lieutenant there, by the king. In this time of garboile, Tullia left the pallace and fled, and all the way as she went, both men and women cursed and cried out upon her, and besought the ghostly spirits and furies of parents to be avenged. When newes hereof was brought into the camp, and that the king upon these strange tidings made haft towards Rome, to stay and suppress these broyles: Brutus hauing intelligence of his coming, turned another way because he would not meete with him. And so at one instant in a manner, by contrarie journees came Brutus to Ardea, and Tarquinius to Rome. But the gates were shut against Tarquinius, and in steed of entrance, warned he was, & commanded into exile. The whole campe receiued with joy, Brutus the redeemer of their Citie. From thence also were the kings sonnes driven: two of them followed after their father and departed into banishment unto Cere, a towne of the Tuskanes: as for Sextus Tarquinius, he retired himselfe to Gabes as it were into his owne kingdome: where he was murdered in revenge of old quarrels, upon mallice and hatred of the people which he had brought upon himselfe in times past. L. Tarquinius Superbus reigned 25 yeares. Thus continued the kings regiment at Rome, from the foundation of the Citie, unto the freedome and redemption thereof, 244 yeares.

Then in a solemne assemblie and election by the Centuries, held by the Provost of the citie, according to the ordinance of Servius Tullius in his commentaries, two Consuls were created: L. Iunius Brutus, and L. Tarquinius Collatinus.

Brutus took an oath of the people, that they should not suffer any to vaigine king at Rome. Hee compelled his fellow Consul Tarquinius Collatinus, a suspected man to take part with: he Tarquinius, by reason of the affinitie he had with them, to give over the Consulship, and to depaer the citie. The goods of the king and his sonnes he commanded to be seized upon, and vifited. A field of theirs he consecrated to Mars, which was named afterwards Campus Martius, or Mars field. Hee beheaded certaine young gentlemen of the nobilitie, together with his owne and his brothers sonnes, for conspiring to receive the king and his complices againe into the citie. Vnto the boned slave Vindictus, that betrayed the complot, he gave his freedome, of whom Vindicta took the name. Having led an armie against the king, who had assembled a power of Venitians and Tarquinius, and made waer, he died in battell together with Arms, the sonne of Superbus: and for his death the dames of Rome mourned one whole yeare. P. Valerius the Consul propounded and made a law concerning Appealing unto the people. The Capitoll was dedicated. Posena king of the Clusines, warring in the quarrell of the Tarquines, and being come to the Ianiculum, was by the valor of Cocles Horatius, encompassed that he passed not the Tyber: who alone, whiles others bewed downe the Sublician bridge, withstood the Tuscanes: and when it was broken downe, leapt armed as he was into the river, and swam over to his fellows. Another example of manhood is reported of Mutius, who being entred the campe of the enemies with full intent to kill Posena, and having slain his principall Secretarie, whom hee took for the king, was apprehended: and thrusting his hand into the fire of the altars, whereupon they had burned sacrifice, suffered it there to frye untill it was consumed: and said withall, that there were behind him three hundred more besides, that had sworne the death of the king himselfe. Who wounding at their resolution, was driven to offer conditions of peace, and upon taking of hostages to give over waer: amongst whom, one virgin Clælia, beguiled her keepers, made an escape, and swam over Tyber to her friends: and being revenged againe, was by Posena sent honorable home, and had her statue or image on horsebacke set up for a memoriall. App. Claudius abandoned the Sabines, and fled to Rome, of whom the tribe Clautia took the name, and was added to the rest. The number of tribes was encreased, to be one and twentie. Against Tarquinius Superbus, who with a power of Latines waged waer, M. Porcius the Dictator, obtained a prosperous battell at the lake Regillus. The commons rising, for being entrallied unto their creditors, retired themselves into the mount Sacer, and were by the policie and comfite of Menenius Agrippa, reclaimed from their sedition, and appeased. The same Agrippa being deceased, was by reason of his povertie, buried at the cities charges. There were created five Tribunes of the Commons. Corioli a towne of the Volsians, was taken by the valow and industrious meanes of Cn. Marcius, who thereupon was surnamed Coriolanus. T. Latinus a meane Commoner was warned in a dreame to make relation to the Senate of certaine religious ceremonies: and for neglecting the same, lost his sonne, and sell himselfe to be lame of his lims, and being brought into the Senate in a chaire, after hee had declared the same, returned sound on his feet home againe. Cn. Marcius Coriolanus after he was banished, became general of the Volsians, and with an armie of enemies approached the citie of Rome: unto whom, first Embassadors wore of pacse sent, and afterwards the Priests and whole Cleergie perswaded with him, not to make waer against his native countrey, but all in vaine. Howbeit Veturia his mother, and Volumnia his wife entreated him and obtained that hee should depaer backe againe. The law Agryia, concerning division of lands among the poore commons, was now first put up and proposed. Sp. Cassius an Alderman, after he had bene Consul, was condemned for aspiring to be king, and suffered death therefore. Oppia a Vestal Nun was sincerely buried quicke. Against the Venitians neere enemies and ill neighbors, yet indeed troublesome rather than noysome and dangerous, the house alone of the Fabii, required to be employed in service: and set out three hundred and sixe armed men to the field, who everie one were by the enemies slaine neere the river Cremera, and left but one onely at home alive of that name, under fortetene yeares of age. Ap. Claudius the Consul having fought unfortunately against the Volsians, and that, by meanes of the stubbornesse and unwillnesse of his armie, euedged everie tenth man of his souldiors. Over and besides (this booke) containeth the exploits against the Volsians, Aequians, and Venitians, and the seditions discords betwene the Nobilitie and Commons.

Now

Now will I describe from henceforth, the acts both in war and peace of the people of Rome, a free state now from this time forward: their yearly Magistrates and governours: the authoritie and rule of laws, more powerfull and mightie than that of men. Which freedome of theirs, the last kings pride made more acceptable and welcome. As for the other kings before him, they reigned so, as that they might bee counted all of them, and that worthily builders of sundrie parts of the citie one after another, according as they everie one by himselfe added still one new place or other, for the multitude by them encreased, to inhabite. Neither is it to be doubted, but that even the verie same Brutus, who deserved so great honour and glorie for expelling the proud king Tarquinius, should have done the same to the exceeding danger of the weale publick, if for desire of unripe and untimely freedome, he had wrested the roiall dignitie and government from any of the former princes. For what would have come of it, if that communitie consisting of heardmen and fugitive strangers, resorting out of their owne countries there to dwell, having under protection of a sanctuarie and priviledged place gotten libertie, or at least, wife impunitie; being now freed and past feare of a roiall majestie, had begun to be troubled and disquieted, with the rustling stormes and seditious tempests of the Tribunes? and in a new and strange citie sowed debate, and intertained variance with the Nobilitie, before that the surest pledges of wives and children, the dearest affection of the verie place and soile, which requirith long time of liking and loving, had united and knit their hearts together? Certes, the state not yet come to full growth and maturitie, had by discord faded and come to naught, which a peaceable and gracious government cherished and fostered, and by cherishing and nourishing brought to that passe, that now being come to ripeness and perfection of strength, it might be able to bring forth and beare the good and wholsome fruits of libertie.

The beginning of this freedome you must account in regard hereof, That the Consularie regiment was annuall, and from yeare to yeare, rather than that the roiall power and jurisdiction that the kings had, was any whit abated & diminished. For the first Consuls had the same absolute authoritie, held all the former roialties, and retained still the regall ensignes and ornaments of supreme dignitie. This only provided, that they should not both have the rods borne before them, for avoiding a twofold feare and dread of their majestie. Brutus with the good liking and consent of his companion in office, had the preheminence and prerogative of that honour to be done unto him alone: who had not been aforetime a greater instrument, and more forward to procure and recover the libertie, than he was afterward a sure maintainer and protector of the same. And first above all other things, whilst the people were yet greedie of this new freedome, for feare least they might any time after be won by entreatie or moved by gifts on the kings part, he caused them to swear that they would never suffer any to be king at Rome. After this, because the Senat might be of more power and greater reputation, by the frequent company of that degree and order: he encreased their number (which had ben impaired much by massacres, committed by the late king) to the full complement of three hundred: by chusing the cheefe and principall of the degree of knights or horsemen. And hereof came as they say, this custome, to admit into the Senate both them that were before time of the ancient Nobilitie, and also those that were newly chosen for the supplie: naming these that were last enrolled, the new Senat. And a wonder it was to see, how much good this did to the concord of the citie, and to the knitting of the hearts of Nobles and Commons together.

This done, they went in hand with religion and church matters: and for that there were certain publick sacrifices that had been usually executed by the kings themselves in their owne persons: least therefore they should not find the misse of kings in any respect, nor long after them again, they create of purpose a king-priest or sacrificer: which sacerdotall dignitie they ordained to be under the Arch-prelate, least that this new addition & title of honor, might prejudice their freedome any jot, wherunto they had then a special regard above all other things. And I wot not well, but I thinke verily they went beyond all measure, and were over precise in the maintenance and strengthening thereof every way, even in the smallest trifles, and toies of no moment. For when as nothing els was offensive unto them, the name forsooth of one of their Consuls became suspected and odious unto the citie, without any other scandale whatsoever. And thus they murdered and said, that the Tarquinius had reigned overlong, and too much already: that Prius first began,

A began, and when after him succeeded king Servius Tullus, Superbus Tarquinius not having in that time and space betweene, forgot the kingdome, as seeing another invested therein; by wicked practise and violence claimed and recovered the same againe, as the inheritance properly to his house belonging. And now that Superbus is driven out and gone, the rule and government is devolved unto Collatinus and there resteth. These Tarquines belike (say they) cannot skill how to live as private men: giving out among, that the verie name was dangerous to a free state, and in one word, they could not endure it. These and such like speeches at first were whispered abroad throughout all the citie, by them that underhand sounded by little & little the hearts and dispositions of men: and when these surmises & suspitions were once buzzed into the commons heads, and they thereby disquieted, Brutus called them to a generall assemblie. Where first and formost he reciteth the oath of the people, That they should suffer none to be king, nor ought els in Rome, from whence might arise any danger to their libertie. This oath is the thing (quoth hee) that with all diligence, and by all meanes possible is to be maintained, and nothing thereto appertaining is to be despised and lightly regarded. As for me, I am unwilling to speake, in respect of the person, neither would I speake at all, but that the love & affection to the C. VV. doth overrule me. The people of Rome is not thoroughly persuaded, that they have recovered their entire and perfect libertie. For as yet the kings blood, yea and the kings name, not onely remaineth still, but also beareth soveraigne rule in the citie: This is it that hurtheth, this is it I say that hindereth their true freedome. Now quoth he, L. Tarquinius willingly of your owne accord rid them of their fear. We remember well, we confesse and acknowledge, you it was that expelled the kings. Finish therefore and perfite this great benefit of yours: take away from hence the kings name also. As for your goods and substance, your citizens and countrymen, if they will be advised by me, shall not onely yeeld unto you againe, but if ought be fount and wanting, shall by my consent supplie the same to the full right liberally. Depart I say, and freindly take your leave: deliver the citie and disburden them of this their feare, that peradventure is but vain and needlesse: Howbeit, this their minds give them, that together with the stocke and house of the Tarquines, the kings rule and government will likewise void and depart for ever. The Consul at this so strange and todaine a motion, first wondred much, and was not able to open his mouth. But afterwards as he addressed himselfe and began to make a speech, the heads of the citie came about him, & with many prayers besought the same at his hands. As for all the rest, they prevailed full little with him. But after that Sp. Lucretius, a more grave and elder man than himselfe, of greater worth aforetime, and his father in law besides, took him in hand & dealt with him sundrie waies, one while by way of intreatie, otherwhiles by persuasions and reasons, that he would condescend unto that which the citie in one generall consent required: then the Consul fearing, least hereafter being once out of his place and a private man againe, hee should chance to be forced thereunto, with the losse of his goods and some disgrace perhaps besides; resigned up the office of the Consulship, and removing all that he had away to Lavinium, quit the citie and departed. Then Brutus by an act and decree of the Senat, proposed unto the people, That all the race and linage of the Tarquines should be exiled. And in a generall Session of the Centuries, he created for to be his colleague in government, P. Valerius, by whose assistance he had driven out the kings.

E No man doubted now that the Tarquines were about to take armes: yet that warre happened not so soone as men looked for: but see (a thing that no man feared) they had like by fraud and treason at home to have lost & forgone their freedome againe. There were of the flower of Rome, certaine youths, & those of no low degree nor base parentage descended, who in the kings daies had lived like yong princes more loosely and at pleasure, as companions and plaifephers with the yong Tarquines, the kings sonnes: who seeking to enjoy the same licentious life still, in this equality of estate wherin all others then lived, made mone and complained one to another, That the libertie of others turned to their servitude. The king, say they, is a man, at whose hands one might obtaine somewhat, as need required, were the cause right or were it wrong: where a man might find favour and friendship, as who could both be displeased and angrie, and also forgive and remit a fault, and knew well how to make difference betweene a friend and a foe. As for lawes, they are things deafe and inexorable: more holosome and commodious to the poore than to the rich and mightie, affourding no release nor pardon, if one chance to trespassse and transgresse. And a ticklish point it is and perilous, for a man among so many errors whereto our frailtie is subject, to beare himselfe onely upon his innocent life. Being thus of their owne accord already discontent, Brutus the Consul persuadeth Tarquinius to give over the Consulship and depart.

discontent, sodainly overlooked for, there came embassadours from the kings, who without any mention at all of returne, demaunded onely their goods againe. Vpon their message being delivered and heard in the Senate house, this debate and question held them for certaine daies in counsell, fearing least that the goods not restored might minister occasion of quarrell, and being rendered, yeeld maintenance and nourishment of warre. In the meane time the Embassadours dealt & treated with diuers persons diuersly: in open shew, claiming only their goods, but secretly and under hand, contriving how to compasse the kingdome for their maisters. And under colour of procuring friends for the accomplishment of that which they pretended, and was in question, they founded eistfoones the minds of certaine noble young gentlemen, how they stood affected to their designements. Whose words and reasons were of them gently intertained: and thereupon they delivered unto them letters from the Tarquines, and withall conferred together, and practised the receiving of the kings privily by night into the citie. The execution of this plot was principally committed to certain of the Vitellij and Aquilij, that were brethren. A sister of the Vitellij was married unto the Consul Brutus, by whom he had two sons that were young men, Titus and Tiberius, whom their vnclies by the mother side made partakers with them likewise of their counsell. Besides, there were diuerse young gentlemen (whose names long time hath borne out quite) made acquainted therewith. In this meane season, their opinion in the Senat house prevailed, who thought it best that the goods should be restored: and the embassadours upon that occasion made stay in the citie, for that they had gotten time of the Consuls to provide carriage for to have away the kings stuffe, and other moveable goods. All that time spent they in consulting with the Conspirators, and so importunately laboured them, untill they had procured their letters also unto the Tarquinijs: for otherwise (say they) how will they beleeve but that their Embassadours make wrong report of matters so important. The giving of those letters in pledge of their truth and plaine meaning, prooved to bewray and reveale their purposed enterprise. For the day before the Embassadours were to take their leave, and returne to the Tarquines, they fortunated to sup with the Vitellij: and whilst the conspirators there, were in sad and close talke together, conferring at large about this new devised practise, and no man by but onely themselves (as the manner is:) a certaine bondslave chanced to overheare them, one that before, had an incling whereabout they went, but waited the opportunitie when the letters should be given to the Embassadours, which being found upon them, might directly prove the treason. This slave after he understood the letters were delivered, gave intelligence of all unto the Consuls: who immediately departed from their houses to take the Embassadours, and the conspirators in the manner, and without any sturre or tumult light upon them unware, and dashed all. But of the letters they had a speciall care, that they should be forthcomming and not miscarie. And committing the traitors forthwith to prison, they made some pause and doubt about the Embassadours, what to doe with them. For albeit they seemed to have deserved no lesse but to be vsed as enemies, and to have no favor at all, yet had they regard to the law of Nations. Now concerning the kings goods, which they thought meet before to be restored, the matter came about wholly in question againe before the Senators: who being overcome with ire and indignation, denied staidly the rendring of them, yea and forbad they should bee confiscate and converted to the common treasure: but they were given away among the commons to make spoile & havock thereof: to the end, that they having once touched or seised on the kings goods as a bootie, might for ever after bee past all hope of any peace or favour with them. The field of the Tarquines lying betwene the citie and Tyber, was consecrated unto Mars, and after called Campus Martius, Campus Martius, i. Mars field. It happened (as men say) that there was at that time standing corne there, now ripe and readie for the harvest: which crop of the ground, because they made some scruple of conscience otherwise to consume, therefore it was cut downe, come, straw, stubble and all, and a great number of people sent thither at once to carrie it away in baskets and skeps, and poure it downe the Tyber, running then but shallow, as it useth to doe in the midst and heat of Summer. And so the heapes of corne, together with the mud slucke still and rested in the ebbe places and foulds of the river: and by little and little encreased with one thing or other that came downe the streame, untill it became an Island. Afterwards, I suppose there were dauns and piles made therunto, and by mans hand it grew so high, and so firm a peece of ground, that it was able to beare even temples and stately galleries that stood thereupon.

When the kings goods were thus spoiled, rifled, and made away, the traitors were condemned and put to death. Which suffering of theirs was the more notable, for that the father by his place

A place and vertue of his office, was bound and charged to see execution done upon his owne children: and he who otherwise ought not to have bene a spectator and looker on, euen he (such was his fortune) was forced of necessitie to be the principall actor in this tragicall execution. Then stood these most noble youths bound fast to a stake. But among all, the Consul his children, turned upon them the eyes of everie man; from all the rest, as unknowne persons and of no reputation; all men pitied them, not so much for being punished, as for deserving by their fact to be punished: That they could find in their hearts and once let enter into their thought, to betray into the hands of Tarquinius, sometimes a proud prince, and then a cruell enemie, and banished rebell, their native countrey, lately and in that verie yeare set free from captivitie: their naturall father who set it free: the Consulship sprung first out of the familie of the Iunij: the nobles, the commons, and in one word, all things whatsoever in Rome belonging either to God or man. Then came the consuls forth, tooke their places and set them downe on the tribunall seat. The Licitors were sent to doe their office, who first stripped them naked and scourged them with rods, and then with an axe chopt off their heads. All which time, the father himselfe, his countenance and visage was a wonderfull spectacle to behold, considering how a fathers affection could hold out and abide the performance of this publike & exemplarie punishment. When the offenders had once suffered, to the end there might be shewed noble examples on both sides, for to debarre wickednes, and stop the course of sinne: the informer and reveiler of treason, had for his reward a peece of monie, out of the common treasure, obtained his freedome, and was enfranchised a citizen of Rome. This was the first man as they say, that was made free by the rod Vindicta: for that the partie his name was Vindictus, from whence, as some thinke, the word Vindicta was derived: after whom, this was observed, That whosoever in that sort gat their freedome, were supposed withall enized.

When tidings hereof came to Tarquinius, with the manner of proceeding in euerie circumstance, he not onely grieved that so great hope of his was frustrate and come to nothing, but also was set on fire with hatred and indignation: and seeing the way shut up and stopped against all deceitfull courses, he thought there was no dealing now but by fine force and open warre. Whereupon he went vp and downe, solicited and made humble suit unto the cities of Etruria, and besought the Veientians especially, and the Tarquiniens, that they would not suffer him, being come of their own blood, a banished man, forlorne, poore & needie, disposedd so latelie of so goodly a realme and kingdome, together with his children (forward young men) to perish even before their eyes. Alledging that others had bene sent for and set out of forraign parts unto Rome for to be kings: and he their leige king, and such an one as advanced still the Roman empire by martiall prowesse, was by the wicked conspiracie of his neere kinsfolke and friends depose from his imperiall dignitie and expelled: and they now, because there was no one man he thought sufficient and worthie to raigne, had parted betwene them the kingdome, and given among the people his goods as a spoile; that there might not be any one, who had not his finger, and whole hand in so foule a fact. Saying moreover, that his mind and intention was, to seeke means to returne into his owne countrey, to recover his crowne, yea and to perfecture, and to be reuenged of those unthankfull subjects: and therefore praied them, to set to their helping hand, and yeeld him assistance: and not to sit downe with so many old wrongs of their owne part received, namely, their legions so often hewen in peeces, their lands and livings taken from them: but to go with him for revenge. These suggestions mooved the Veientians, and everie man for himselfe muttered and gave out in threatening wise, that now at length, having a Roman captaine especially to be their leader, they were to doe away the foule dishonours sustained, and win againe what by former warre they had lost. As for the Tarquiniens, they were soon incited in regard of name and consanguinitie, and thought it was a godly matter and an honour unto them, to haue of their owne name and house to be kings of Rome. Thus two armies of two cities banded with Tarquinius, for to restore him to his kingdome againe, and to make sharp warre upon the Romanes: who being entered the teritorie of Rome, were met with by the Roman consuls.

F The footmen marched under the conduct of Valerius, marshalled in a battailon foure square. Brutus with the horse went before to espie and discover the coasts: In like sort the men of armes of the enemies rode foremost under the leading of Aruns Tarquinius the kings sonne, and the king himselfe in person followed with the legions. Aruns espying by the Licitors, the Consul a farre off, and as he approached neerer knowing Brutus more certainly by his face, all inflamed with yre: This is the gallant (quoth he) this is he, that hath driven and banished us out of our native native countrie. Lo how bravellie he setteth forward, all gorgeously to be seene and dight in our roiall ensignes and ornaments. Now helpe ye gods that are revengers of wrongs done to kings: and therewithall set spurs to his horse, and ran amaine with full carriere upon the Consul his own person, intending certainly to speed him. Brutus perceived likewise that he made directly toward him: (Now was it a noble and worthie fight for the capitaines themselves to begin the battell.) Whereupon with resolute courage he encountereth him. And so fiercely they charged one another, and so deadly were they bent, that neither of them had regard to save himselfe, so hee might wound and mischeefe his enemy, but were both with a counterpuls that quite pierced their targets run into the sides, and thrust through, and so having one anothers launce, sticking in their bodies, fell from their horses readie to die. Herewith began on both sides the other hordemen to fight, and within a while the footmen also seconded them. And so equally were they matched, and the battell so indifferently fought, that it was verie doubtful whether side had the better. For on both parts the right wings got the upper hand, and downe went the left. The Veientians, unto whom it was no newes to be overcome of Romanes, were discomfited and put to flight. But their new enemies the Tarquiniens, not onely held their owne and stood to it, but also from their battell put backe, & forced the Romanes to give ground, and gave them the repulse. After this conflict there fell such a fear and terror upon Tarquinius, and the Tuscans, that both armies as well of the Veientians as the Tarquiniens, gave over their enterprise with doing just nothing, and by night dislodged and departed every man to his owne home. This battell was more notable by reason of certaine miracles that men report: namely, that in the dead time of the night next following, when all were at rest, there was heard a mightie voice of Sylvanus (as men thought) out of the wood Arfia, to utter these words, THAT THERE WAS SLAINE ON THE TUSCANES PART MORE BY ONE, AND THAT THE ROMANES WYAN THE FIELD. Thus verely and no otherwise departed they asunder: the Romanes as winners, and the Tuskans as having the worfe. For the next morrow, so soone as it was day, and that none of the enemies appeared in sight, P. Valerius the Consul gathered up the spoile together, and returned from thence with triumph to Rome, and performed the funerals of his brother Consul, in all sumptuous maner and solemne pompe, as possibly at that time he could devise. But, that which did him the greatest honour after his death, was the publicke sorrow and heaviness of the cittie, in this respect above all singular and memorable, for that the dames and Matrones of Rome mourned a whole yeare for him, as for their own father, in that he had ben so sharp a revenger of violence done to the chastite of women.

After this, the Consul that survived, presently upon the great liking and favour that hee was in (see how wavering and unconstant the minds are of the common people) was not onely envied, but also suspected, yea and charged with an odious and horrible crime. The voice went and bruited it was abroad, that he aspired to the crown. And why? because forsooth he had not chosen unto him a new fellow Consul in the roome of Brutus: and began to build aloft on the top of Velia, where (say they) in an high place and strongly scituate, hee may make a castle impregnable. These things commonly spoken and credited too, vexed much, and mightily grieved the Consul in his very soule, as a great indignitie offered unto him. Whereupon hee assembled the people together, and causing the rods to be held downewards to the ground, went up into the pulpit to make an Oration unto them. That sight pleased the multitude passing well, taking it for a plaine demonstration, that the markes and ensignes of rule and government submitted unto them, was a very acknowledging and confession that the people was of greater majestie and power than the Consul. Where after silence made, and commandement to hearken and give eare, the Consul began highly to extoll the fortune and good hap of his Colleague deceased, who having with great honour set his country free, ended his daies, fighting manfully in defence of the Weale publicke, even in the prime, heighth, and best time of his glorie, ere that it became subject unto envie: but he himselfe outliving it, remained alive, exposed unto criminous slanders and spightfull malice of men, and of a deliverer and redeemer of his country, was now reputed no better than the Aquillj and Vitellj. And will you never indeed (quoth hee) approove the vertuous and honest conversation of a man so well, but it shall be tainted with vnjust suspicion? What would any man thinke, that I being so fierce and fell an enemy of the kings, should ever feare to incur the jealousy of men, for seeking to bee king? What if I dwelt on the top of Tarpeie cliffe, even in the verie Capitoll, should I beleeve and thinke it possible, that my countrey men, neighbours and citizens, would stand in feare of me? and will so small a matter as this

turne the balance of your opinion and conceit of mee? Is your affiance and confidence in mee grounded so slightly, and standeth it upon so nice tearmes and ticklish points, that you force more and make greater reckoning of my dwelling place, than of the qualitie of my person. Wel, P. Valerius his house shall be no hinderance or impeachment unto your libertie, O Quirites, ye shall not need to feare any harme from Velia for me. I will remove my house not onely downe into the plaine, but even to the valley under the hill foot, that you may dwell above me, and overlook me (a suspected citizen.) Let them a gods name build in Velia, who may be better trusted with the cities freedom, than P. Valerius. Then was immediatly the timber and all carried downe beneath Velia, & where as now Vicus Publicus is, in the very bottome of the hill, was his house rectified.

After this were lawes enacted, which not onely acquit the Consul, and cleared him of all suspicion of affecting to the kingdome, but also contrariwise wrought such effect, that he became exceeding popular againe, wherupon, he was surnamed Publicola or Poplicola. And first and foremost the Statute passed as touching the appeale unto the people, against the rulers and Magistrates. Item, concerning the cursing & condemning of him both bodie and goods, that should intend or plot to usurpe princely dominion over them. These acts the commons liked well of. Which when he had alone ordained, that all the thanks and praise might bee his therefore, then assembled he a generall Session for the substituting of another Consul unto him, in the roome of his colleague departed. So, Sp. Lucretius was created Consul: who being an aged man and of great yeares, feeble withall, and not able to execute the office and function of a Consul, within few daies paid nature her debt and died. And in place of Lucretius was M. Horatius Pulvillus chosen. In some ancient writers I doe not find that Lucretius was Consul. For immediatly after Brutus they make mention of Horatius. But I thinke verily because no act of his, made his Consulship memorable, thereupon he was forgotten and left out. Now as yet was not the temple of Jupiter in the Capitoll dedicated. And when Valerius and Horatius the Consuls, cast lots whether of them twaine should performe that dutie, the charge fell unto Horatius, and Publicola went forth to the Veientian warre. But the kinsfolke and friends of Valerius tooke it more greivously and impatiently than reason was, that the honour of the dedication of so famous a temple, was given unto Horatius. Devising therefore by all means possible they could, to impeach it, and seeing they had assailed all in vain, and nothing took effect: even at the very instant, whiles the Consul was holding a post of the temple, and in his solemne praiers to the god, behold they brought unto him heave and wofull newes, that his sonne was dead, and that he might not lawfully, whiles his household mourned and was polluted with a dead corps, consecrate the temple. Whether it were, that he gave no credit to the messenger, or rather was of heart so stout, neither is it for certaine reported, nor easie for a man to divine. But for all these tidings, never a jot was he turned from his purpose, nor said ought els to the messenger, but willed that hee should bid the corps to bee had forth to buriall, and so holding the pillar or post still, said out his praier, and dedicated the temple. These were the acts done both at home and abroad, in the first yeare after the expulsion of the kings.

Then were P. Valerius the second time, and T. Lucretius created Consuls. By this time were the Tarquines fled for succour to Lartius Porfena king of Clusium: where, by many reasons & remonstrances, intermeddled with praier, one while they besought him not to suffer them, descended from the Tuscans, of the same bloud and name, to live needie & forlorn in perpetual exile; other while they advised and warned him not to put up without revenge, this new fashion of expelling kings, now comming up. Saying, that libertie in it selfe had sweetnesse ynough: and unless kings would defend and maintaine their crownes with as great might and maine, as cities desired to enjoy freedome, there would be a generall confusion, and all things turned upside downe: neither would there be in States and Commonwealths any thing aloft and eminent above other, endured: whereupon would insue a finall end of kingly regiment, a thing with God and man of all other most excellent and beautifull. Porfena supposing it would be an honourable matter unto the Tuscans, both to have a king at Rome, and a king too of the Tuscans line, came with a cruel arpie against Rome. Never was the Senat at any time afore put in such feare: so mightie in those daies was the puissance of Clusium, and the name of Porfena so renowned. Moreover, they feared not their enemies onely, but also their owne subjects at home, least peradventure the Communalitie of Rome for feare of warre, should receive the king into the cittie, and accept of peace, though it cost them their libertie. During which time the Commons were entertained of the Nobles with all kindnesse, and many favours and courtesies they had at their hands. And above all things order was taken for provision of graine and victuals. And for to purvey store of G corne, some were sent to the Volsci, others to Cumæ. Over and besides the licence of selling salt, because it was sold at an exceeding high price, was taken from private salters, and was undertaken by the citie, with all the cost and charges thereto belonging by them defraied, & salt delivered out to the people at an easie reckoning. The commons also were freed of portage, tollage, and tribute; and rich men that were able to beare the burthen, were assailed at all painments and contributions: the poore were thought to be charged enough with the bringing up of their children. This kind dealing and indulgence of the Nobles, kept the citie afterwards (notwithstanding their hard distresse of siege and famine) in such concord and unitie, that the meaneest as well as the highest abhorred and detested the name of KK. And never after was there any one private person, so popular, so devoted to the people by craftie meanes and indirect courses tending H to their particular designes, as the whole Senat was at that time, by their good government of the Commonweale. Now when the enemies approached neere at hand, everie man made shift for himselfe, forsooke the countie and came into the citie. Which they fortified with strong guards round about: so that what with wals and bulwarks on the one side, and what with the Tyber on the other side, it seemed sure enough, and sufficiently defended. The wooden bridge had like to have given the enemy entrance, had not the valour of one man beene, even Horatius Coclès (who that day by the good fortune of the Romanes was a fortresse unto the citie of Rome.) He as good hap was, appointed to ward and keepe the bridge, seeing the Ianicle by a sud-daine assault wonne, and that the enemies ran downe so furiously from thence upon him, and contrariwise, the multitude of his owne companies for feare, to forgoe their weapons, breake I their arraies, and to be gone: tooke hold of everie man, opposed himselfe against them afront: and calling God and man to witnesse, protested, shewed and declared unto them, that forsaking and abandoning thus their quarter, all their flying was but in vaine: for if they left the bridge on their backs, to yeeld passage to the enemies, there would anone be more of them in Palati-um and the Capitoll, than in the Ianicle: and therefore he willed and commanded them, yea and gave them direction to breake downe the bridge, by hewing, by firing, or by what meanes they possible could: assuring them for his owne part, so much as the bodie of one onlie man was able to doe, he would receive, and withstand the violence of the enemies. Then advanceth he himselfe K unto the first entrie or foot of the bridge, and all goodly to be seene, amongst those that would no point fight, but shewed their backs, he so bent his sword and target in their verie faces, resolute to encounter with them hand to hand, that even with his wonderfull hardines and incredible courage, he astonished & amazed his enemies. Howbeit, two there were that for verie shame taried still and stood to him, namely Sp. Largius and Tit. Herminius, brave men both, as well for noble birth as worthie deeds. Assisted for a while with these gallants, sustained he the first storme of danger and most cumbersome push of the skirmish. But as they that were hewing downe the bridge called upon them to come backe, he constrained those two also to retire and save themselves, whiles some little part of the bridge was left behind free and uncut. Then casting all about in menacing manner his fierie and terrible eyes, towards the captaines and principals of the Tuscanes, onewhile he chalenged them one by one to single fight: otherwhiles he rated them all in generall, calling them the hirelings and slaves of proud kings and tyrants; who forgetting and M making no reckoning of their owne freedome, were come to oppugne and impeach the libertie of others. The enemies stood at a baye and in suspence a good while, looking about them one upon another who should first begin to fight. At last, verie shame made the whole troupe to stirre and come forward, and so setting up a loud crie, from all sides they let flie their javelins at him, one man alone and their onlie enemy. All this while bare he off their shot which light upon his target, and there stucke, and nache lesse with full resolution kept the bridge still, walking his stations, and stalking like a giant. Then assailed they with all their force to beare the man down, and to turne him over into the water: but by this this time the cracke of the bridge broken under him, and the shout withall of the Romanes, for joy that they had finished their worke, staied with suddaine feare their violent assault. Then praised Coclès in this wise: O father Tiberinus (quoth L hee) O sacred river, with devout heart I thee beseech, receive with thy gracious and mercifull streame, this harnish, these weapons, and this thy soldier. And so all armed as he was, he leapt into the Tyber: and albeit many a dart was flung from aloft and light upon him, yet he swam over and escaped safe to his fellowes. A brave adventure for all posteritie another day to talke of, rather than to beleve. For this so great fortitude and resolution of his, the citie was thankfull,

The first fight

Coclès

A thankfull, and in token thereof his Image or Statue was set up in their common hall, named Co- mitium, and as much ground given him in compasse, as he was able with a plough to break up in one day. Amongst these publick favors and honors done unto him, the kind affections and good wills of privat persons also, wel appeared: for in that extreame want and scarcitie that then was, every man out of his house store and provision spared from himselfe, and for to give him one thing or another, defrauded his owne bellie. Thus Porfena with the repulse of this his first enterprize, changed his mind from assailing, to besieging of the citie: and after he had placed a garrison in the Ianiculum, hee planted himselfe and encamped on the plaine even upon the bankes of the Tyber. And sending for boates and craiers from all parts, both to stop the mouth and passage of Tyber, that no corne should come in and bee conveyed to Rome: and also that the fouldiors as they saw occasion, might crosse the river, and fetch booties in diverse and sundrie places at their pleasure, in short space he brought the whole country about Rome to such streights, that not onely other things were brought in, but all their cattell also was faine to be driven out, the fields into the citie, and no man durst put any creature forth out of the gates. The Tuscanes were permitted to be thus bold, not so much for feare as for a policie: for Valerius the Consull waiting for some vantage and opportunitie, suddainly to set upon many of them at once and at unawares, as they stragled abroad disorderly, making little regard to revenge small matters, kept himselfe to be revenged of them thoroughly, and to pay them home one time or other. To the end therefore he might draw forth these forragers, and toll them abroad, hee gave his men in charge and proclaimed, That the next day in great companies they should put their cattell C forth at the gate Esquilina, which was furthest from the enemies supposing that they would have intelligence thereof, by reason that in this extremitie of long siege and pinching hunger, some false knaves and disloyall rogues, would flie unto them. And so fell it out indeed. For they had knowledge thereof by a fugitive slave. Whereupon they in farre greater multitudes passe over the river, in hope to make a generall spoile and havock once for all. Then Valerius commanded T. Herminius with a sufficient companie to lie close in ambush at two miles end, in the Sabine high way, and Sp. Largius with a power of lustie tall fellows lightly armed, to keep the gate Col- lina, untill the enemy were gone by and past: with direction, then to put himselfe betweene the river and them, and so to intercept them in their returne. The other Consull T. Lucretius issued forth with certaine bands of footmen at the gate Navia: and Valerius himselfe in proper person set forth from mount Coelius certaine ensignes of his best and choice souldiors. These first D were descried and discovered by the enemy, Herminius so soon as he heard some noyse and stir, arose and ran at once out of the ambush, and whilest the Tuscanes turned to set upon Lucretius, he charged them lustily at their backs: so that on every hand from the gate Collina on the one side, & from the gate Navia on the other, the alarme was given. Thus the robbers were slain and cut in peeces in the midst of them: both for that they were overmatched in fight, & also because all the waies were stopped up, that they could not escape by way of flight. And never after durst the Tuscanes raunge about the countie so audaciously. Howbeit, the siege continued nevertheless, with great scarcitie of corne, and exceeding dearth within the citie. And Porfena had good hope by sitting still, to force it in the end, and be maister thereof. At what time one C. Mu- E tius a noble young gentleman, who thought it a dishonour and foule shame, that the people of Rome, who all the while they were in bondage under kings, were in no warre nor by any enemies beleagured, should now, being the same still, in time of their freedome, be of these Tuscanes besieged, whose armies they often had defeated: and supposing that by some hardie and adventurous preece of service this reprochfull indignitie was to be revenged, devised at first on his owne head to enter into the enemies campe: but fearing afterwards to go without commission from the Consull, and the knowledge of any other person, least peradventure he might bee taken by the watch of the Romanes, and brought backe for a traiterous runagate, at such a time especially, when the hard estate of the citie was ynough to bring him into a deepe suspicion, and to be reputed for no better: presented himselfe before the Counsell into the Senate house: I am right F willing, and I have a purpose my LL. (quoth hee) to passe over the Tyber, yea and if I can, to enter the campe of the enemies, not in qualitie of a robber, nor to bee revenged for booties from us taken, with doing the semblable. A greater exploit with the favour of the gods, I intend to performe. The Senatours gave their consent, and approved his designment. Then with a skeine hidden under his garment, he fetterth forward. Being thither come into the campe, hee presteth souldiours were receiving their pay. And the Chancellor, or kings principal Secretarie, sat together with the king in like array, much employed and busied in many matters, and the souldiours commonly had recourse unto him. Mutius fearing to enquire whether of them two were Porfena, least by not knowing the king, he should bewray himselfe who hee was, happened (see how fortune in her rashnesse directed his hand) to kill the Secretarie in stead of the king: then as he passed through the fearefull multitude, making himselfe way with his bloudie blade, there was a present outcrie, and therat the kings guard came running in, laid hold of him, and brought him backe before the king his roiall throne: and albeit he was now forlorne and without all succour, amidst those threats of frowning fortune, yet as a man more feared still than fearing: I am (quoth he) a citizen of Rome, and Caius Mutius is my name, a professed enemy, I confesse, and an enemy would I have slaine; as readie and willing am I to die my selfe, as I was to kill another. For, both to doe, and to suffer valiantly, is the part of a noble Romane. And it is not alone that carrie this mind and resolution against thee, O king, there is a long traine and crue behind, of them that seeke to win the same praise and honour: make thee readie therefore, and arme thy selfe, if thou thinke good, against this danger, and reckon everie hower to bee in hazard of thy life, and to have alwaies at the verie court gates thy enemies sword. This kind of warre doe we youths of Rome denounce openly unto thee: no battell, no fight else shalt thou need to fear. With thee alone will we all, one by one have to do, and with none other. Hereat the king incensed with wrath, and for the danger that he stood in, affrighted with all, commanded in menacing wise that he should be fried at a stake, unless he would presently unfold in plaine tearmes, what secret and dangerous practises he meant and threatened under this covert circuit of words and intricate circumstances. Lo, (quoth hee againe) how little they set by this carkasse, that aspire to great glorie, & aime at honour: and with that, thrust his right hand into the hearth on fire that was made for the sacrifice, & when he indured the roasting thereof, as if he had ben senselesse, and felt no paine, the king welneere astonished at this wonderful and miraculous sight, start up and leapt from his roiall seat and chaire of estate, commanding the young man to bee had from the altar. Goe thy waies (quoth hee) in peace, thou that hast done thine owne selfe more mischeefe, than thou hast attempted against my person. I would say God blesse thee, & worthe hadst thou been of honour for thy prowesse, if it were in my service, and in the behalfe and defence of mine owne countrey: and now by the law of armes I discharge thee freely, and give thee leave to depart without any hurt or abuse offered unto thee. Then Mutius, as it were to requite againe his courtesie and desert. Forasmuch as (quoth he) thou settest so great store by valour, and honour, rest vertue so highly; to the end it may bee scene that thou shalt get at my hands by courtesie, that which by cruel threats thou couldst not: these are therefore to let thee understand, that there are three hundred of us noble youths, even the very flower and knighthood of Rome, that have conspired & sworn thy death, and in this manner to assaile thee. My lot it was to be the first, the rest as it shall fall out, will be here shortly, and wait everie man his turne and time, untill they hit right upon thee. Mutius, surnamed afterwards Scavola, by reason of the maim of his right hand, was no sooner dismissed and gone, but there followed straight after him to Rome, Embassadors from Porfena; and so much troubled in spirit was he, both for the danger past of the first assault (from which nothing preserved him but a small error and oversight of the assailant) and also for the hazard to come, (for looke how many conspirators remained behind to give the like attempt, so often stood he in jeopardy of his life) that of his owne accord he offered the Romanes conditions of peace. And among other capitulations, he stood hard upon this article (but al in vain) of restoring the Tarquines into their kingdom. This point the king urged instantly rather because hee could not well himselfe denie the Tarquines so much, than for that hee was ignorant, that the Romanes would never yeeld thereto. But another article hee got graunted, namely, the restitution of the Veientians lands againe: and the Romanes were driven of necessity to give him hostages, in case they would have the kings garison to quit the Ianiculum. Upon these conditions peace was concluded, and Porfena withdrew his forces from the Ianiculum, dislodged & departed out of the territorie of Rome. The Senators bestowed frankly upon Mutius, as a testimoniall of his valiantnesse, a peece of ground lying beyond Tyber, which was afterwards called Mutia prata, Mutius his meddowes.

Upon this honourable regard and reward of vertue, women were likewise provoked and encouraged to enterprife worthie acts in the service of the Commonweale. For a yong damosell and virgin named Clotia, one of those hostages aforesaid, whiles the Tuskans were encamped

A (as it fell out) not farre from the banks of Tyber, deceiving her keepers and leading a company of other maydens after her, even within the shot and darts of the enemies, tooke the river, swam over with them, brought them all to Rome safe, and delivered them to their parents, kinsfolke and friends. Which being reported to the king, he at the first stormed at it, and was all in a rage, and sent unto Rome certaine Oratours to demanda againe his hostage Clotia by name: as for all the rest, he made no great account of them: but afterwards, upon further consideration he admired the enterprife, and plainly said, it surpassed farre all the adventures of the Coclitis and the Mutij: so as he pretended that if the mayde were not rendered againe, he would take the league as broken, and being yeelded, he would send her backe to her friends, undischarged and without any abuse or violence done unto her. On both parts was promise faithfully kept: For both the Romanes restored the pledge of peace according to covenant, and scene also it was, that vertue was not onely secured safe, but also highly regarded and honoured with the Tuskane king. For after he had commended and praised the damsell, he promised to give her part of the hostages, chuse whom she would. And when they were all brought forth before her, she made choise (they say) of those yong boies that were under 14 years of age: which was not onely most besitting her virginity, but also by the accord of the hostages themselves, best approved: namely, that that age especially should be delivered out of the enemies hands, which was most subject to injurie and taking wrong. The peace thus renewed and confirmed, the Romanes rewarded this rare valour in that sex, with as new and strange an honour, for, in remembrance of her, in the top of Via sacra, there was erected her statue, A MAIDEN SITTING ON HORSEBACKE.

C There remaineth yet even unto our daies amongst other solemne ceremonies, this one custome received from our ancestours, farre differing and disagreeing from this peaceable and friendly departure of the Tuskane king from before the citie of Rome, and this it is: In the port-sale of goods they use to proclaim first aloud, THE SALE OF KING PORSENNA HIS GOODS. This ceremoniall custome must needs eyther begin in time of warre, and so was not afterwards forgotten in peace: or else arose from some more gracious and gentle occasion at the first, than this title or outward forme pretendeth, of selling goods by way of hostility, & after the manner of enemies. But the likeliest conjecture and nearest to the truth of all those that are given out, is this: that Porfena dislodging from the Ianicule, gave freely unto the Romanes, (the citie at that time being after long siege distressed & in great streights) his rich campe furnished with victuall D and provision, conveyed thither out of the plentifull countiees of Heuturia, neere adjoining: which goods, for feare there should have beene some havocke & spoile made thereof in warlike wise, in case the people had beene let loose to the rifling of the tents, were after sold, and called Porfena his goods: which title signified rather their thankfull acceptation of the gift, and remembrance of the giver, than any open and overt sale of the kings goods, which were not so much as in the Romanes power, nor at their disposition.

Thus Porfena having given over the Romane warre, because he would not seeme to have brought an host of men into those parts, and performed no exploit, sent his sonne Aruns with part of his forces, to surpris and assault Aricia. At the first this suddaine and unexpected enterprife, much troubled the Aricins, but afterward when they had gotten aid both from the Latine nations and also from Cumes, they tooke such heart againe, that they durst enter into the field and bid the enemy battell. In the beginning of the conflict, the Tuskans charged them so hotly, that at the verie first encounter, they brake the arraies of the Aricines. But the troups of the Cumans setting pollicie against force, went a little aside, made way & gave some ground, and when the enemies had outstripped them, and were rashly and disorderlie passed beyond them, they turned their ensignes, and set upon their backs: so were the Tuskans being in the verie traine of their victorie, beset round about, and slaine in the mids betwene. Onely a small remnant of them after the losse of their captaine, because they had no other place of refuge neerer, were faine to trudge to Rome without weapons and disarmed, like suppliants both in deed and shew. Where they were kindly entertained and bestowed in severall lodgings. Some of them when they were cured of their wounds repaired home, reporting the hospitalitie and courteous usage they had found. Many remained still at Rome for love of their hosts and the citie: who had a place allotted them to dwell in, which after they called Tusculum vicus, the Tuskane street.

After this, were P. Lucretius and P. Valerius the third time created Coss. In that yeare, for a small end, there came embassadors from Porfenna, to treat about the restoring of the Tarquins into their realme: to whom this answer was returned: that the Senate would send embassadors to the king himselfe: wherupon their were immediatly addressed unto him in embassie the G most honourable personages of all the nobilitie, who in the name of the people of Rome delivered this speech: That the chiefe of their nobles were sent, rather than any dispatch given by word of mouth unto his embassadours at Rome; not for that they could not haue shapen them this short answere, They would no kings have: But to this end, that for ever after there should be no suite renewed of that matter, nor in so great mutuall benefites, and fauours passed between them, some discontentment arise on eyther side, whiles he might be thought to request that which was repugnant and prejudiciall to the libertie of Rome, and the Romanes againe, unlesse they would be executors of their owne wrongs, and seeke their owne mischiefance, to make deniall unto him, whom by their good wils, they would not seem to denie ought for anything in the world. But as to the substance of the matter, this was the point: namely, that the people of Rome were not under the regiment of a king, but were a free state: and fullie settled in this purpose, To set open their gates to enemies, sooner than to kings: and were all generally of this mind and resolution, That looke when the freedome of that citie had an end, then should the citie come to an end also. To conclude therefore, they were to intreat him, that if he tendered the weale and safetie of Rome, he would permit them to be free still and at their owne libertie.

The king overcome with verie modestie, and much abashed in himselfe, answered thus againe: Since you are so fully minded and listlie bent (quoth hee) neither will I importune you, nor dull your eares with harping still upon this unpleasant string, and do no good: nor beare the Tarquines any longer in hand, and deceive them of that hope of aide, which nothing at all is in my power to performe. Let them from henceforth seeke some other place of exile, either for peace or warre, as they shall thinke more expedient, that there may be nothing to let and hinder the free course of amitie, and alliance betwene mee and you. To these good and kind words he joynd better and more friendlie deeds. For all the hostages that remained in his hand, he sent home: and the Veientians lands which by the covenants indented at Ianiculum, were taken away, he restored to the Romanes againe. Thus Tarquine seeing all hope of returne cut off, remooved unto Tusculum to his sonne in law Mamilius Octavius, there to live and spend the rest of his daies in banishment. So there continued faithfull peace betwene the Romanes and king Porfena.

Then were Coss. M. Valerius and P. Posthumius. In that yeare the Romanes fought with the Sabines fortunatly, and the Consuls triumphed: But afterwards the Sabines made greater K preparation of warre: to withstand whom, as also for feare of some suddaine danger that might arise from Tusculum, from whence they suspected warre, although none was openly seene, were P. Valerius the fourth time, and T. Lucretius the second time created Coss. But among the Sabines, there grew some civile discord betwene that part that would have war, and the contrarie that sought peace: which gained the Romanes some strength even from thence. For Appius Cladius (who afterwards at Rome was surnamed Appius Claudius) a persuader himselfe of quietnes & repose, being overmatched and not able to make his part good with the aduerser faction that minded and stirred troubles, accompanied with a great power of friends & followers, from Regillum fled to Rome. Who were enfranchised citizens and possessed of those lands that lie beyond the river * Anio. And from hence came the name of the old tribe Appia: after that other new citizens were put unto them, those I meane, that descended of that race, and out of the same territorie. This Appius was admitted into the number of the Senators, and not long after advanced to be one of the chiefe men and heads of the citie. The Coss. went with a strong power into the Sabines land, where after they had first wasted the countrie, and after in battell abated the strength and puissance of the enemy; so, as for a long time after they needed not to feare anie rebellion from thence, they returned to Rome in triumph.

The yeare following, when Agrippa Menenius and P. Posthumius were Coss. P. Valerius ended his daies in great glorie, reputed the onely singular man in those times, by all mens judgement, for skill and knowledge as well in martiall feats, as in civile affaires: but so poore was his estate, that he had not wherewith to defray his funerall expences, and was therefore at the cities charge right honourable entered. And the dames of Rome mourned for him as they did for Brutus.

The same yeare two Colonies of the Latines, Pometia and Cora, revolted to the Auruncans.
The Romanes first began to warre upon the Auruncans. And after they had discomfited a great host of them, who met with the Consuls as they entered the borders, and fiercely made head against

A against them, then all the Auruncane warre was driven and translated wholly to Pometia. The carnage and execution was no lesse after the conflict, than during the fight: for whereas there were many more of them slaine outright in the place than taken prisoners, those also that were prisoners, they spared not, but murdered every where as they went: neither staid the furious rage of warre therewith, but even the very hostages whom they had received, to the number of 300, they put to the sword. In this yeare also was a triumph at Rome.

The Consuls Opiter Virginius, and Sp. Cassius, that followed the next yeare, assailed Pometia, first by fine force to skale the wals, after with pavoises, mantelets, platformes, & other fabrikes, raised against it. Vpon whom the Auruncans sallied forth, rather of a cankered & malicious hatred than for any hope or vantage given them of good exploits: the greater part of them furnished better with fireworkes than armed with sword and speare, killed and burned all afore them: and having thus fired their fabrikes aforesaid, hurt and slaine a greater number of their enemies, one of the Consuls also (but his name precisely is not by any authour set downe) was sore wounded, stricken downe from his horse, and welneere slaine. Whereupon the Romanes returned backe to Rome thus unhappily defeated, leaving the Consull behind them amongst many that were hurt, like to die. Soone after, and no longer than whilest their wounds might be healed, and a new supplie of souldiours made, they came against Pometia, in more furious manner than before, and also with a stronger power. And when by making of new mantelets and other warlike instruments of assault, they were proceeded thus forward, that the souldiours were readie to skale and get up the wall, then they within yeelded: and notwithstanding the towne was thus surrendered up, yet there was no more mercie shewed unto it, than if it had bene forced by assault. The cheefe and principall cittizens shamefully lost their heads, the rest of the inhabitants were sold at the speare in ouert market like slaves, the town sacked and rased to the ground, yea & mony made of all the lands belonging to it. The Consuls for that they had so wreaked their anger, and sharply revenged themselves, more than for any great warre they had finished, obtained triumph.

The yeare following, were Posthumius Caninius and T. Larginus Consuls. In this yeare, during the games and plaies at Rome, certaine yonkers of the Sabines, went about in a wanton jolitic to carrie away and ravish the curtizans and common strumpets of the citie. Whereupon the people ran together, and made a roior, grew to words, and from words to brawles, inso much as they went together by the eares, and made a fray in manner of a battell: upon which final occasion, there was a rebellion like to insue. Over and besides the feare of the Latines warre, (for to encrease their troubles the more) newes came, and it was certainly known, that by the solliciting and practise of Octavius Mamilius, there were already thirtie nations banded together against the Romanes. The citie thus being perplexed for the event and expectation of these so great occurrences, there arose the first occasion and mention made of creating a Dictator. But neither in what yeare, nor in what Consuls time (for that it can hardly be beleevd, that they should bee of the Tarquines faction, and yet that also is reported) nor yet who was first created Dictator, is it certainly knowne: Howbeit, in the most auncient writers I find, that T. Larginus was created the first Dictator, and Cneus Cassius generall of the horsemen: and Consular men (i. such as had bene Consuls afore) they were that elected him: for so the law provided that was enacted, concerning the creation of a Dictator. And this induceth mee the rather to beleevd, that Larginus an auncient man, and one who had been Consull before, was appointed as a controller and maister over the Consuls, and not M. Valerius the sonne of Marcus, and grandson of Voleius, who as yet had not attained to the Consuls dignitie. For if these Consular men aforesaid, had ben minded to have chosen a Dictator out of that house above all other, surely they would have made choise rather of his father M. Valerius, a noble personage, of approved prowesse and valor, and one besides that had ben Consull. When the Dictator was once chosen at Rome, and the axes were seene borne before him, the commoners stood in great awe, and took better regard to be obedient at every becke and command. For neither could they make account of any help (as they might under the Consuls, who were both in commission alike, & of equal authority, when they had recourse from the one to the other) nor yet appeale unto the people: no nor looke for succour at all, but in their own double diligence & care of obedience. The Sabines likewise were afraid of the Dictator thus created at Rome: and so much the more, because they were verily persuaded he was made of purpose for them: and thereupon, they sent embassadours to treat for peace, who beseeching the Dictator and the Senate to pardon so small a fault, and being but a tricke of youth, received this answer: That youths indeed might well be pardoned, but such old babes as they might not, who never rested to sow debate, and minister occasion of one warre after another. Howbeit, they sat in consultation about a peace, and obtained it had ben, if the Sabines could have found in their hearts and condescended, to make good and repay the expenses that the Romanes had disbursed about the warre: for that was the thing demanded at their hands. So, defiance was sent and war proclaimed. And yet for that yeare all was quiet, as it were in time of a secret truce, during the Consulship of Servius Sulpicius, and M. Manlius Tullus, in whose yeare there was nothing done worthe of remembrance.

After them were T. Ebutius, and C. Vetusius. In their time * Fidene was besieged, * Crustumaria woen, and * Prenceste revolted from the Latines unto the Romanes. And the Latine warre, which had ben a breeding and budding for certain yeares, was no longer delayed, but brake forth. A. Posthumius the Dictator, and T. Ebutius Generall of the cavallerie, with great power of foot and horse, set forward and advanced as farre as the lake Regillus, in the teritorie of Tusculum, and there encountred the armie of the enemies, in their march. And because they heard say that the Tarquines were in the host of the Latines, they could not for anger forbear any longer, but presently fell to it, and began battaile. This field was fought right fiercelie, and cost more bloodshed a good deale, than others usually before: because the Generalls and chiefe Commanders were there present, not only to give direction by their counsell & advice, but also in person themselves hazarded their own bodies, & fought bravely in the medley. And not one almost of the principall leaders, escaped out of the skirmish, eyther of one side or of the other, safe and sound, save onely the Romane Dictator. For as Posthumius was encouraging his men, and setting them in aray in the vaward, Tarquinius Superbus (albeit he was now verie aged & unwieldie, and notable to beittire himselfe) set spurs to his horse, and ran full but against him. But having caught a thrust from a side, was rescued by his men that came about him, and retired to a place of safetie. And in the other wing, Ebutius Generall of the horsemen, set upon Off. Mamilius: but he, the captain I meane of the Tusculanes, was well ware of him, and espied him comming, and ran his horse with full carriere likewise upon him, and so desperately they bare their launces one against the other, that Ebutius was run quite through the arme, and Mamilius wounded in the breast, whom the Latines succoured and received into the middle ward. As for Ebutius not able any longer to beare his blasse, with his arme fore hurt, withdrew himselfe out of the battell. The leader of the Latines, nothing dismayed for all his hurt, maintained fight still: and seeing his souldiors somewhat distressed, he lendeth for the regiment of the Romane exuls, that were under the leading of L. Tarquinius his son: who sticking more courageously unto it, for anger that their goods were spoiled, and they driven out of their owne countrey, renewed the combat afresh for a while. And as the Romanes from that quarter began to reule and give ground, M. Valerius, the brother of Publicola, espying young Tarquinius vaunting himselfe gloriously in the forefront of the exuls, inflamed also with a desire of domesticall glorie of his house: that the same familie which had the praise of expelling the kings, might likewise win the honour of killing them, spurred his horse, and with deadly speare ran against Tarquinius, who giving way to his mortall enemy, retired backe to his owne regiment. But Valerius by this time was disbanded from his companie, and rashlie ridden into the battaile of the exiles, and there a common souldior happened to charge upon him a flanke, and run him through. The horse staid not a jot for all the rider was wounded, and so the Romane knight readie to die, fell to the ground with his armor upon his bodie, and paid nature her debt. Posthumius the Dictator, after he perceived so valiant a man fallen, and the banished men advancing lustilie forward with full trot, and his owne souldiors distressed, and at point to turne their backs, gave expresse commandement unto his owne band, which he had about him of chosen tall men for to gard his person, that as manie of their fellowes as they saw to flie, they should take them for enemies, and kill them in the place. Thus by reason of a counterfeare, the Romanes made head againe and renewed the battaile. Then began the Dictators cohort to fight, and comming with fresh bodies and courageous stomackes, charged vpon the wearied exiles, and killed them on every side. Whereupon began another combat also between the Colonels & captains of qualitie & marke. The generall of the Latines seeing the battalion of the banished, well nere environed round by the Romane Dictator, speedily taketh with him into the forefront of the battaile, certaine squadrons of those that were appointed in the reergard to succour and aid: whom T. Harminius a lieutenant, espied to come marching in good order, & knowing amongst them Mamilius by his gorgeously harness, and

A and goodly cote armour, with farre greater violence than the Generall of the horsemen a little before, encountred the Colonell of his enemies so hotly, that both he ran Mamilius through his sides, and slue him outright, and also whilest he was disarming and rising his bodie, he was wounded himselfe with a short javeline, and being brought backe with victorie into the campe, at the first dressing yeelded to nature and died. Then rode the Dictator apace to the horsemen, and earnestly cried unto them, that seeing the footmen were toiled out and wearied, they would alight from their horses, and take the matter into their hands. The horsemen soone obeyed, leapt from horsebacke, and set forward as if they had flowne, to the forefront, where they opposed their targets in defence of them that fought before the ensignes. Whereat presently the Infanterie began againe to take heart, seeing the principall men of armes and noble young Gentlemen in the like kind of service, exposed to the same danger, and readie to take part with them. Then at the last were the Latines put backe, and their whole battel began to shrinke. The gentlemen had their horses brought to them againe, and they mounted on horsebacke to pursue their enemies. The footmen likewise followed after. There the Dictator omitting no helpe of God and man, vowed as men say, a temple to Castor, and openly promised and proposed rewards to that souldior that made either first or second entrie into the enemies campe. Whereupon they bestirred themselves so courageously, that the Romanes at one brunt both vanquished their enemies, and also were possessed of their tents. This was the noble field fought at the lake Regillus. The Dictator and the generall of horsemen returned into the cittie with triumph. For three yeares after, there was neither assured peace betwene them, nor yet professed war.

Consuls were Q. Cloelius, and T. Lartius. After them A. Sempronius, and M. Minutius. Whiles these two were Consuls, the temple to Saturne was dedicated, and the feast called Saturnalia instituted. After them succeeded A. Posthumius, and T. Virginius. And in this yeare and not before, I find in some authours, that the said battell was stricken nere the lake Regillus, and that A. Posthumius suspecting the fidelitie of his brother Consul, gave over his place, and so was made Dictator. The account of times doth so varie and is so intricate and confused, whiles writers diversly set downe the cheefe Magistrates, that in so great antiquitie, not of acts onely, but also of authours, a man cannot orderly and directly distinguish, according to some writers, who were Consuls, and what was done in every yeare.

Afterwards were Ap. Claudius, and P. Servilius created Consuls. This yeare was famous for the newes of Tarquinius his death. He died at Cumes, to which place after the defeature of the Latines power, he went to Arifodemus the Tyrant. At which tidings the hearts of the Nobles were wel lightened, the Commons also began to look up. But that joy in the Nobilitie was above measure too excessive and licentious. For why? the great men began now to wrong and wring the communitie, whom untill that day they had favoured and pleased to their full power. In the same yeare the Colonie Signia, which king Tarquinius had erected, was now stored againe the second time, and the number supplied with new inhabitants. And the tribes or wards at Rome were now made up 21. The temple of Mercurie was dedicated in the * Ides of May. With the Nation of the Volscians in the time of the Latine warre, neither was there peace, nor war: for both the Volscians had levied a power for aid to send unto the Latines, if the Romane Dictator had not made good speed: and also the Romane Dictator hastened the more for feare he should in one battell have to deale with Latines and Volscians both at once. Vpon this quarrell, the Consuls led forth their legions into the Volscians countrey. The Volscians fearing no revenge for their defeignement (that was intended onely, and never came in action) were much troubled with this suddaine and unlooked for occurrent. Not minding therefore to make resistance, and forgetfull of warlike prowesse, they delivered 300 of their noble mens children out of Cora and Pometia for hostages. Whereupon the Romane Legions from thence without any fight were withdrawne. But not long after the Volscians being somewhat eased & delivered of their feare, came againe to their old biace and returned to their wonted nature, and secretly under hand made preparation anew for warre, joyning with them as confederates in this quarrell, the Hernikes. They send also their embassadours all about, to moove and sollicite Latium. But the Latines, for their late overthrow at the lake Regillus, tooke such a spleen and hatred against him whosoever, that should once put into their heads and persuade them to take armes, that they could not forbear the verie embassadours, but offer them abuse. They apprehended therefore the Volscians, conveyed them to Rome, & delivered them to the Consuls: where they revealed and gave intelligence, that the Volscians & the Hernikes were out in armes, and readie to warre upon the Romanes. Which being reported unto the Senators, they were so well pleased and contented therewith, that they set at libertie 6000 Latines, prisoners, and sent them hence. And concerning a league to be concluded with them, which was like before to have beene denied for ever, they referred the consultation thereof, unto the new magistrates that should next enter. And in good sooth, blith and glad were the Latines then, for that they had done, and the authors of peace were magnified and had in great reputation. They send moreover a crowne of gold into the Capitoll, for a present to Iupiter. With these embassadours and the present, those prisoners which before were set free, came in greater number. Who repaired straight waies to everie man his house, where they had beene prisoners, yielding them great thanks for their kind usage and friendlie intertainment in time of their calamities and miseries, and promised therewith the like courtesie and mutuall hospitalitie. Never were the Latines at anie time afore, both publickely and privatelie, united more needlie to the Roman empire.

But as the Volscian warre was now at hand, so the cittie was at discord among themselves. The Senators and commons hated one another at the heart, and all this arose by occasion especially of certaine persons that were indebted, and in danger of their creditours: who murdered and gave out in murmuring wise, how that abroad they adventured themselves and fought for the libertie and dominion of the cittie, and at home by their owne neighbours they were held prisoners and oppressed: saying, that the freedome of the commons was more safe in time of warre, than of peace, among the enemies rather than their owne fellow citizens. This inward grudge and heartburning, which of it selfe still kindled more and more, the notable calamitie of one man above all others, set on a light fire. A certaine aged person chaunced to breake prison, and with the armes, badges and ornaments of all his ancestors, ran into the market place. His apparrell was all to rattered, foule and loathsome, but the habite or plight of his bodie much more filthy: so pale, so wan, so leane withall, as if he had beene over-pined and starved, his long side beard and haire of his head so overgrowne, that they made his visage and countenance wild and gafflie. Howbeit, for all he was thus disfigured by this deformitie, he was a man well knowne, and as some said, he had done good service in the wars, had beene a chiefe Centurian, and had the charge and leading of bands in the field: and the common people, as pitying his estate, and to moove compassion, recounted many worthie exploits of his, to his great credit and singular commendation. Himselfe likewise shewed the scars of wounds, which in his breast & forepart of his bodie in divers places he had received, that might testifie his valiant service. The people flocking about him as it were in a common assemblie to heare a solemne Oration, enquired of him, how he came to be in that taking, so poore, so disfigured and deformed? He answered, that whiles he served in the Sabine war, he by reason of the continual forraying, & wasting of the territorie, not onely lost the revenewes and increase of his lands, but also his Maner-house was burnt, all his goods ranfacked & spoiled, his cattell driven away: and when a levie and tribute was exacted in a time when he ill might, he was driven to take up monie & run in debt, which growing more & more by payment of interest, first he was constrained to sel his land, that his father and grandfather had left him, and to turn himselfe out of all, by making a cleane hand of the rest of his goods: until at length his bodie also began to winder away in a consumption. Complaining moreover how by his creditor he was not onely brought into bondage and thraldome, but also imprisoned, and whipped, and tormented in most cruell and butcherlike manner. With that he shewed before them all, his backe lately scourged, with the fresh waies of the lashes newly given him. At the sight and hearing hereof, there arose a great outcrie of the people, so that anon the upore kept not within the compass of the market place, but spread over all the cittie: in such sort, that as well they that were bound, as they that were loofe, came forth from all parts into the open streets, calling the Quirites and the people pittifully, to helpe. In no corner wanted any companions to take part willingly in this seditious rout, and every where in all the streets they run by companies into the common place. Those Senators who chanced to be abroad, at their no small perill light upon this multitude: and had not the Consuls P. Servilius, and App. Claudius, made the better speed, and come upon them to appease the commotion, there would have ben some knocks, for hardly could they have held their hands. At whose coming, the multitude turned unto them, shewing their yrons, and all their other shamefull mislage & miserie, saying, This is all the good we have gotten for our warfare: upbraiding every man the services they had performed, some in one place some in another, requiring them in threatening

A threatening wise, rather than by way of supplication, to call the Senate together, and they the while stood about the Curia, as if they would be judges and moderators of their publicke counsell. Very few of the Senators, such onely as by chance came that way, could be brought to repaire to the Consuls: as for the rest, they were afraid not onely to come into the Counsell house, but also to venture abroad into the market place, so that by reason of their final assemblie, there could be nothing done nor determined. Then thought the people indeed they were mocked and dallied withall, and driven off with delaies, summing, that the Senators which were away, absented themselves not by chance, nor for feare, but onely to hinder the proceeding of their cause: and that the Consuls themselves kept a haisting and finching, and without all question, made but a scorne and game at their miseries. This broile so increased, that hardly could the reverence and majestie of the Consuls restraine the peoples rage. But the Senators standing in doubtfull tearmes, whether to tarrie behind or to come forward would be more dangerous, at length they resolved to repaire into the Senate, and being now at last a full and sufficient house gathered, neither the Lords there assembled, no nor yet the Consuls, could well agree amongst themselves what to doe in this case. Appius a man of a hot spirit, was of opinion to order the matter by Consular authoritie and commandement, saying, That if one or two of them were laid hold on, the rest would be quiet. But Servilius more inclined to mild & gentle remedies, thought it a more safe and easie course too, rather to bend than to breake their angrie and fell stomackes. But amidst these troubles there happened a greater and more fearefull occurence: For certaine Latines on horsebacke rode in post, and brought news in hastie and tumultuous manner, that the Volscians were coming with a mightie and cruell armie against the cittie to assault the same. Which news being heard (see how discord had of one cittie made twaine) wrought far other effect in the Nobles, than in the Commons. The comminatie lept for joy, and said the gods were now come downe from heaven to be revenged of the Senators pride, & encouraged one another not to take prest-monie, or to enter their names in the Muster-masters book, saying that they had rather die at once with all, than perishe alone and none but they: Let the Nobles (qd. they) serve as soldiers; let them take weapon in hand, & abide the brunts and hazards of war, who receive the profits, the prizes & rewards thereof. But contrariwise the Senat penfive & surcharged with this twofold feare, as well from citizen as enemie, besought the Consull Servilius (a man by nature more affable and popular) That he would provide for the safetie of the Common-wealth, beset as it were round with so fearefull perils. Then the Consull dismissed the Senate, and came forth into the assemblie of the people, where he shewed what care the LL. of the Senat had for the good of the commons: But whiles they were (qd. he) busie in consultation for the greatest part (I confesse) of the cittie, and yet in truth no more but a part, it fell out so in the meane while, that of necessitie they must see to the whole bodie of the Common-wealth, whereof they stand in exceeding feare. Seeing therefore the enemies were almost hard at the gates, they could not possiblie doe or intend anything beforewaite. Neither (if there should be anie respite and leasure granted) were it either for the commons credite and honestie, not to fight for their countrie, unlesse they had their pay before hand; nor well beseeming the Nobles and for their reputation, to looke unto and take order hastily, to redresse the miseries and calamities of their citizens upon feare, rather than afterwards with good deliberation, for love and of willing mind. This speech of his he confirmed with an edict, by vertue wherof, he gave streight commandement: Imprimis, that no man should keepe bound or in prison, any citizen of Rome, but that he might be enrolled before the Consuls. Item, that no person should hold in possession, or sell the goods of anie soldior, so long as he abode in the campe, nor arrest his children or childrens children. This edict being once published and proclaimed, not onelie the enthralled debtors there present, were immediatly by name enrolled, but also from all parts of the cittie, they leapt out quicklie of their houses, seeing that now their creditors had no right nor power to detain and arrest them, and ran into the market place for to take a militarie oath of allegiance, to be true soldiours & faithfull to the state. A number there was of these: neither was there anie that more mansullie behaved and quit themselves or tooke more paines in the Volscian warre. Then the Consull led forth his power against the enemies, & within a litle of them incamped himselfe. The night following, the Volscians presuming upon the variance and discord of the Romanes, assailed the tents, if happily in the night season any of them might have ben wrought, to abandon the campe, & come to them, or to practise any treason. But the Sentinels descried them, and upon al arme given, the whole armie arose, and everie man made hast to his weapons. Thus came that enterprife of the Volſcians to nothing. The reſt of the night both parts reſted, and were quiet. On the morrow by breake of day, the Volſcians having filled up the trench, aſſailed the bulwarkes and rampiers. And by that time they had on everie ſide plucked up the fences, palliſadoes, and other fortifications, the Conſul, who for all he was called unto inſtantly on everie hand, but of the debtors aforeſaid eſpecially above the reſt, to give the ſignall, and to ſound the battell, made ſome ſtay on purpoſe to trie the courage of his men: and ſeeing well now their forwardneſſe and their ſtomackes, at length gave them a token to ruſh forth, and ſo letteth them looſe, as eager to fight as might be. So at the verie fiſt onſet the enemies were preſently diſcomfited and put to flight: the footmen followed hard upon them in chaſe, and as they could reach, wounded them behind on their backs, and killed them: the horſemen likewiſe purſued them even to their pavillions, who ſtill feared exceedingly what might become of them: and within a while their very campe alſo, environned about with the legions, and abandoned of the Volſcians themſelves for feare, were forced and riſed. The next day following, the legions marched to Suella Pomertia, for thither the enemies were fled: and within few daies the towne was won, and put to the ſacke, and the ſpoile and pillage given away: whereby the needie ſouldiours were ſomewhat reſtreſhed. The Conſull in great glorie and honour brought backe his victorious armie to Rome. In his way homeward the Embaſſadours of the Eretrian Volſcians diſtruſting their owne ſtate, upon the loſſe of Pomertia, came unto him. To whom after conſultation had with the Senat, and a decree paſſed, peace was granted: but they were fined to part with their lands. Immediately upon this, the Sabines alſo put the Romanes in a fright, and in very deed it might be called a tumult, rather than a war. For word was brought in the night ſeaſon, that an armie of the Sabines were come in a rode, as far as the river Anio, robbing, ſpoiling, and burning all the villages and hamlets as they went. Forthwith was ſent thither the whole power of horſes under the conduct of A. Poſthumius, who in the Latine warre had been Dictator. After him followed the Conſull Servilius with a choſen regiment of footmen. Moſt of the enemies, as they raunged abroad a forraging in ſcattering wiſe, were by the horſemen ſurpriſed and incloſed. And when the Infanterie beſides marched againſt the Sabines legion, they were not able to reſiſt: for being tired out, partly with their long journey, and partly with booting all night long, and many of them having overcharged themſelves with meat and wine within the villages, had hardly ſtrength ynough to run away. Thus the Sabine warre in one night was heard of and ended. The day following, when as now the Romanes were in good hope, that they had peace on everie ſide, behold, the Auruncane Embaſſadors came into the Senat, proclaiming warre, unleſſe they would forgoe the Volſcians lands, and reſtore them to their rightfull owners. And even at one time with the Embaſſadours was the armie alſo of the Auruncans abroad, and had taken the field. The newes whereof, and namely that they were now in ſight not farre from Aricia, raiſed up the Romanes in ſo great a broile and hurlyburly, that the Senators could neither be conſulted with, and deliver their opinions in order, nor yet give a peaceable anſwer to thoſe that came as it were with weapon in hand, being thus forced to take armes themſelves. So to Aricia directly in warlike manner they march, and not far from thence they joined battell with the Auruncans. And in one day that war had alſo an end.

Thus when the Romane ſouldiours had gotten victorie within ſo few daies in ſo many places, and had now defeated the Auruncans, they looked for the promiſe of the Conſul, and the faithfull performance of it by the Senat. At what time Appius both upon a proud ſtomacke and arrogant ſpirit of his owne by nature, and alſo, ſo diſcredit and diſanull the word of his fellow Conſul, in all actions of debt proceeded, and gave judgement with rigour, againſt the debtors. Whereupon, both they that had been before imprifoned, were delivered againe into their creditors hands, and other alſo became priſoners anew. Whereat when as a ſouldiour, whoſe caſe it was thus hardly to be dealt withall, called upon the Conſull his fellow for helpe, they ran all at once to Servilius, at his hands they claimed a promiſe: everie one upbraided and reproched him with their ſervice in warre, with the ſcars there gotten, requiring that he would propoſe the matter againe unto the Senat, and as a Conſul, ſuccour and protect his citizens; or like a General, maintaine his ſouldiours. Theſe matters no doubt, moved the Conſull: but ſo ſtood the caſe that he could neither will nor chuſe, but haſt, deale double, and temporize with them: ſo fully bent, and wholly wedded to the other part, was not onely his colleague, but alſo the whole faction of the Nobilitie. Thus by bearing himſelfe as a Neuter, and going as they ſay, betwene the barke and the tree, he neither avoided the hatred of the Commons, nor yet wooon favour with

A the Nobles: whiles the Nobles tooke him for a ſoft and baſe minded Conſull, ſeeking to pleaſe all parties, & the Commons for as craftie and falſe a diſſembler: in ſomuch as within a ſhort time, it appeared, he was as much hated of the people as Appius. For, the Conſuls happened on a time to ſtrive, whether of them twaine ſhould dedicate the temple of Mercurie. The Senat put over the deciding of this matter from themſelves vnto the people: and decreed withall, that to whether of them the dedication of the temple was by the peoples election granted, he ſhould over and beſides have the charge to purvey come and victualles, he ſhould erect and inſtitute a Colledge or fellowſhip of marchants, and he in ſteede of the high Prieſt, ſhould undertake the ſolemne feaſts, or feſtival daies. Then the people gaue the dedication of the temple to M. Leſtorius, a principall Centurion of the vanguard: which as it eaſily appeared, was done not ſo much to grace the man, as who had an higher office beſtowed upon him, than was fit for one of his degree and calling; as to diſgrace and deface the Conſuls. Hereat, one of the Conſuls yea and the Patricij ſtormed and ſared exceedingly againſt the Commons. But the Commons tooke heart vnto them more and more, and began to proceede farre otherwiſe, and to take another courſe than they purpoſed at the beginning: for, diſpairing of the Conſuls and Senats helpe, when they ſaw a debtor ſued and brought to the barre, they would run flocking from all parts together, ſo that the Conſuls ſentence and decree could not be heard for the noiſe and clamour. And decree or judge what he would, no man would obey. And ſo violentlie they went to worke, that in preſence of the Conſull, the creditours were ſingled out, evil intreated, and miſuled of the Commons, being many together. So the whole feare and hazard of the maine chaunce, even of libertie it ſelfe, was now altogether tranſlated from the debtors to the creditours. In the very necke of theſe troubles, there aroſe feare of the Sabine warre, and when it was determined, there ſhould be a muſter of ſouldiours, no man would anſwere to his name and be enrolled. All this while Appius raged and tooke on, inveying bitterly againſt the nicetie and popularitie of his brother Conſul, who with his keeping ſilence for diſpleaſing the people, by his loſt cariage of himſelfe, had betrayed the weale publique, and over and beſides that, he had not miniſtered juſtice for the loane of mony, nor dealt according to law in that behalfe, he had brought the matter ſo to paſſe, that he could take no muſters by vertue of the decree of the Senat. Howbeit (ſaith he) the common wealth is not wholly forſaken and forlorne, nor yet the Conſular authoritie vtterly caſt downe and troden vnder foot: for he would himſelfe alone, if there were no more but he, defend and maintaine both his owne place, and the Senatours dignitie. When as the multitude therefore ſtood thus malapertlie, as their daillie manner was, about the bar, he commanded one principall captaine of ſeditious to be attached and had away: and as he was haled to priſon by the ſergeants and liſtors, he appealed. Neither would the Conſul have given place to the appeale (for all he knew the people how they were bent, and what their doome would be) had not his obſtinate ſtiffneſſe with much ado bene overſwaied more through the diſcreet adviſe and authoritie of the cheefe Nobles and Lordes of the Senat, than by the clamorous noiſe and menaces of the multitude: ſo reſolute was he, and his heart ſo couragious, to undergo their ill will and heaſie diſpleaſure. Thus grew the miſchiefe more and more daillie, teſtified not with open mouth and broad ſpeeches onely, but alſo (which was more pernicious and dangerous) by conventicles, ſecret meetings, and conferences. At length theſe Conſ. ſo odious vnto the commons, went out of their office, to wit Appius, a man wonderous well affected of the Nobles, Servilius liked neither of them nor the Commons.

After whom A. Virginus, and T. Vellius entred their Conſulſhip. But then the Commons not knowing what manner of Conſuls they ſhould have, began to aſſemble together by night, ſome in Esquilie, others in the Aventine: to the end, they might not be unprovided & to ſeek upon a ſuddaine, what to doe in the common place, nor manage their buſineſſe hand over head, and at a venture. Which the Conſuls ſuppoſing (as it was indeed) a perilous example, and of ill conſequence, propounded the matter before the Senators: but when they had propoſed it, they could not orderly aſke their adviſe what was to be done: they tooke ſo on, and kept ſuch outcrie and viſas at it, on all hands ſaring and ſuming, that the Conſuls ſhould lay upon the Senat the burden and heaſie load of that, which properly they by vertue of their authoritie and office ſhould execute and performe themſelves: and ſurely, if there were any Magiſtrates in the citie (ſay they) there would not be thus ſuffered in Rome any other counſel but publicke: whereas now the ſtate is divided into a thouſand courts and conventicles: whiles ſome have their meetings and aſſemblies in Esquilie, others in Aventine: Certes, one onely man indeed (for that is more than a Conſul) ſuch a one as Appius Claudius was, would ſoone diſpatch, and in one minute of an hower scatter these their unlawfull assemblies. The Consuls upon this rebuke and checke, replied againe and demanded in this manner: And what would you have us to doe (quoth they) for we are resolved to doe nothing slackly and coldly, but with as great courage and diligence as shall be well liked of the Senatours. Whereupon an order passed, that they should take muster, and levie souldiours with all rigour and severitie: adding moreover, that the Commons with idlenesse and ease were growne over-malapert and too licentious. And when the Senate was dismissed, the Consuls went into the Tribunall and tooke their places, and summoned by name all the * younger sort to appeare: and none making answer to his name, the multitude standing about as it had been to heare some publicke Oration, said plainly, that the commons from thenceforth would be no longer deluded, and that the Consuls should never get so much, as one souldiour, unless they would stand to their word, and make good the promise that publickely before was made, and restore to everie man againe his libertie, before they caused them to take weapon in hand: to the end, they might fight for their countrie and countriemen, and not for their lordlike masters. The Consuls saw well what they had in commision from the Senate, and that of all those who within the counsell house wals spake so stoutly, and gave out so great words, there was not one present to take part of this odious mallice of the people. And like they were to have a bitter fit and cruell broile with the Commons. They thought good therefore ere they tried the worst, and dealt by extremitie, once againe to aske advise of the Senate, and to conferre with them. But then all the younger sort of the Senatours, approached by flockemeale, hard almost to the Consuls seats, willing them to give over their Consulship, and to resigne up their rule and authoritie, to the maintenance whereof they lacked courage. Now when the Consuls had sufficiently peised and tried both waies, thus at length began they and said. A great sedition and commotion is toward, my LL. To the end therefore that ye pretend not ignorance, and say another day ye were not foretold of it, there is a great sedition and commotion toward. We require therefore that they who find greatest fault with our remissions and lack of courage, assist us and sit with us while we take the multers: and since you will needs have it so, wee will execute it according to their minds, that are most earnest and severest. Then come they backe againe unto the Tribunall, and commanded for the nones, one of them that were there in sight to be cited and called by name. But he stood full and held his peace, with a crue of men gathered round about to guard him, for feare hee should have some harme or violence done unto him. The Consull then sent a Sergeant to attach him, who being repulsed off, then those Nobles which sate there on the bench to assist the Consuls, cried out upon the shamefull indignitie, and said it was intollerable, and so ran downe in hast from the Tribunall seat, for to aid the fergeant. But the violent rage of the multitude, who let the Listour alone, and onelie staid him from laying hold on the man, turned upon the Partitians. So that the Coss. were faine to step betweene, and then the fray was appeased. In which, there being no stones flying about their eares, nor weapon drawne, there was more clamour, brawling & chafing than any hurt done. Then was the Senat house called in a great hurrey: and with more confusion sat they there in counsell: whiles they that pretended how they were beaten and misused, required that commissioners should sit upon this riot and make due inquisition: and the stoutest of them gave their determination, as much by clamour and noyse, as by sentence and opinion grounded upon reason. At last, when the tempest was overblowne and their heat allaid, and that the Coss. hit them in the teeth, and reprooved them, saying there was as little discretion and gravitie in their court and counsell house, as in the common hall, they began in the end to consult orderly, and three opinions there were amongst them. P. Virginius would not have it a common and generall case (to wit, that all debtors should be released from their creditours) but his advise was, that they should onely be considered, who relying upon P. Servilius the Consull his word and faithfull promise, had served in the warres of the Volscians, Auruncians and Sabines. T. Largius, he opined and thought this, that it was not a time then to make amends onely for good deserts, and to respect them alone that had done well, and to recompence good service: but for as much as the whole commonaltie was deeplie engaged and plunged in debt, unless they were all provided for, and good order taken for them everie one, there would be no quietnes nor end of troubles: yea and (that which more is) in case they be not all alike regarded, but some debtors in better condition than others, the discord would rather be more kindled than quenched. Appius Claudius a man both of naturall disposition fierce and cruel, and also by occasion made more outrageous, nettled with the Commons hatred against him on the one side, and tickled with the praise and commendations of the Nobles on the other

A side, who ever magnified him and lift him up to the skie, spake to this effect: These so great sturres and mutinous hurlburles, my Masters (quoth he) is not long of the miserie and calamitie, but onelie of too much libertie of the commons: who rather upon faines are growne wanton and unrulie than for any want unpatient and discontent: and all this mischief no doubt is sprung of this, that they have libertie to appeale. For so long as it is in their power to flie for helpe unto those that have faulted as well as they, well may the Consull threaten and give out menacing words: as for anie rule else or command, they shall have none among them. Come on therefore, let us create a Dictatour from whom they cannot make their appeale. Then shall this furious rage, which now setteth all on a light fire, be soone hushed and quite extinguished. Let me see then, who dare bear a Listour, when he shall well know, that he alone whose honor and majestie he shall offend and abuse, hath power to scourge him and take away his life. Many men thought this sentence of Appius to be verie hard and cruell, yea and dangerous withall, in regard of the late precedent of Virginius and Vetustus. That other likewise of Largius was thought inconvenient, in taking away all keeping of credit with the creditours. The opinion and advise of Virginius was supposed as well in one respect as in another most indifferent and meane betweene both. But by reason of the faction and regard of private benefite, which alwaies hath done hurt and ever will, to publicke counsell, Appius prevailed, and he missed verie little but he himselfe had beene made Dictatour. Which if it had come to passe, it would surelie have estranged and alienated quite the hearts of the Commons, in that most buisie and dangerous time: when it happened that the Volscians, Æquians, and Sabines, were all up at once in armes. But the Consuls and elder Senatours, had great care and consideration to chuse such a one, as might by mildnesse of his owne nature alay and qualifie the exceeding rigour and sternnesse incident to soveraigne and absolute authoritie. They elect therefore to be Dictatour, Marcus Valerius the sonne of Volsus. The Commons albeit they saw well enough this Dictatour created for to curbe them, yet having got by his brothers law, the benefite of Appeale, they feared no severe and insolent proceeding from that house and name. The Edict besides, that the Dictatour set forth, which was welneere all one with that other of the Consull Servilius, much confirmed and settled their minds. For supposing now, they had more hold both of the man and also of his authoritie, and that they might with more confidence relie themselves on the one and the other, they gave over all debate, & entered their names into the muster booke: so there were enrolled full ten legions. The like armie for number was never levied afore. Of which legions, the Consuls had the conduct of three a peece, & the Dictator commanded the other foure: and high time, it was: for the war might not be deferred any longer. The Æquians had already invaded the territorie of the Latines, & their Embassadors were petitioners to the Senat, either to send succour, or to give them leave to put on armour themselves for the defence of their confines & frontiers. It was thought the safer & surer way, that the Latins without arming themselves should be defended, than to permit them again to take weapon in hand. So the Consull Vetustus was sent thither, & he staid them from further foraying & wasting. For the Æquians were departed out of the plains, & trusting rather in the vantage of the ground, than in their weapons, stood upon their guard, kept themselves safe from danger, upon the high tops of the hills & mountains.

E The other Consull who was gone against the Volscians, because he would not also loose any time, drew the enimie forth (by wasting the countrie especiallie) to encampe himselfe neerer, and so at length to fight a field. Now was there a plain in the mids betweene both camps: where each armie stood before their rampiers, embattailed, and ranged in array, with banners displayed readie to fight. The Volscians were somewhat more in number, whereupon they began battaile disorderedly and as if they set light by the enimie. But the Roman Consull neither advanced forward, nor suffered his men once to shoute and answer againe, but charged them to stand still with their javelins fast in the ground, untill the enemies were come within the reach of hand fight, and then to lay about them lustilie with their swords, all that ever they could. The Volscians out of breath with running and shouting, charged the Romanes, who seemed for feare to stand astonied: but after they once perceived that they were hotly reencountered by them againe, and saw their swords glittering in their eies, they were troubled therewith, as if they had beene entrapped and fallen into some traines laied for them, and so turned their backs. And by reason they came running before to battaile, their strength would not hold out now to run cleare away: The Romanes contrariwise, because against the beginning of the fight they had stood quiet, were fresh of body, & soon overtooke them thus overtoiled, woon their campe by force, & after they had driven the enemies out from thence, chased them into * Velitree, and entered the towne pellmell one with another in a medley, the Victor together with them that were vanquished. More bloodshed there was by execution of them one with another, of all ages and sexes, as they came in their way, than in the verie battaile. A verie few, euen such as without weapon yielded themselves, were spared and pardoned.

Whiles these things were a doing amongst the Volscians, the Dictator discomfited and put to flight the Sabines, with whom he had much cruell warre: yea, and forced them to abandon and quit their campe. For hauing sent his horsemen into the maine battaile of the enemies, which they had but slightly strengthened within forth, and bestowed the ranks there very thin, and all to stretch out the wings on both sides more at large, he brake their arraies: and when they were once disordered, the footemen came in upon them: and in the same brunt were they masters of their campe, and so the war ended. There was not in those daies a braver battaile fought and more renowned, setting aside that onely at the lake Regillus. The Dictator rode in triumph unto the citie. Over & above the accustomed honours, both he and his posteritie after him, were allowed a certaine place in the great Race or Theater, called Circus, for to behold at ease the solemne games, and there was set the yvorie chaire of estate, called Sella curulis. The Volscians thus vanquished, lost the territorie about Velitree, and new inhabitants were sent thither from the citie, to people and to till the grounds, so that it became a Colonie.

Somewhat after this, there was a field fought with the Aequians, but in truth, full against the Consull his will, for that they were to clumbe up a steep hill (to their disadvantage) for to meete with the enemy. But the Souldiours blaming him for trifling out, and making delaies, to the end that the Dictator might be out of office before they made returne to the citie, and so his word and promise, like as the Consuls before him, should come to nothing; drave him perforce to leade up his armie, rashly and at aduenture against the hills. This being an enterprise ill ordered, and an error escaped, fell out notwithstanding verie well through the cowardise of the enemy: who before they were come within shot and the darts cast, amazed at the venturoulesse of the Romanes, forooke their holdes which they had in most defensible places, and leapt downe into the vallies ouer against them. There was bootie and pillage good enough, and a bloodlesse victorie.

Hauing spent thus fortunately abroad in three severall wars, the Senatours and commons were not carelesse of home-affaires, what would be the issue thereof. The Bankers and Vsurers, what with fauor, & what with subtile and cautelous pollicie, had devised aforehand and wrought such meanes, as might frustrate and disappoint not onely the commons, but also the Dictator, and put them by their expectation. For Valerius after the returne of Vestusius the Consull, dealt first and above all other matters and causes at the Counsell table, in the behalfe of the people that had achieved such victories, and propounded to know their minds, What should be done with those endebrted, endangered, and imprisoned persons. Which motion of his being disliked and rejected: I see well (quoth he) that I cannot please you, so long as I persuaide to concord and unitie: with ye will (trust me truly) ere it be long, that the communitie of Rome had more Patrons and advocates like my selfe. As for me, I will neither beare my citizens any longer in hand to deceive them, nor be a Dictator in vaine, to effect nothing. Civile discord at home, and forraigne war abroad, caused the State to have neede of this office. Now, when peace is gotten without, behold it is crossed and hindered within: yet had I rather bee present at the sight of a mutinie & insurrection when I am a priuate person, than whiles I am a Dictator. Thus went he out of the counsell house, and yielded up his Dictatorship withall. The Commons saw plainly what the matter was, and how upon a discontentment and griefe that he tooke in their behalfe, for verie pittie and compassion of them, he gave over the place: and therefore, as if he had fully discharged himselfe of his faithfull word to them giuen, (for that there was no default in him, but it had ben performed indeed) they accompanied him along home to his house with heary affection, praising and commending him all the way they went. The Lords of the Senate began then to feare, least if the armie were broken up and discharged, there would be some secret conventicles, and new conspiracies contrived: therefore, albeit the musters were taken by the Dictator: yet because the souldiours had sworne allegiance to the Consuls, supposing they were still bounde to warfare by vertue of that oath, and pretending a colour that the Aequians renewed war, they commanded the legions to be led forth of the citie.

This hastened the sedition the sooner & set it forward. At first, as men said, they comploted and

A and laid their heads together about murdering and making awaie the Consuls, to the end they might be acquit of their oath unto them: but afterwards being better schooled and advised, that no mans conscience can be clered of scruple, & discharged of an oath once taken, by committing a sinfull act and working mischief, they withdrew themselves out of the way by the persuation of one Scinius, and without congé of the Consuls, departed as farre as mount Sacer, on the farther side of the river Anio, three miles from the citie. This is the rife report, and goeth more currant, than that whereof Piso is the author (namely, that the commons retired themselves to Auentine.) There, without anie head or captaine, they encamped and fortified themselves within a trench and rampiar, and kept quiet for certaine daies, neither taking nor doing harme; as having caried with them such things onely as were necessarie for the sustenance of their life. Great feare there was in the citie, and in this mutuall and reciprocall feare, all men were perplexed and to seeke what to doe. The commons forlorne of their fellow commoners doubted the violence of the Senatours: the Senatours againe stood in feare and jealousie of the commons that remained still behind; and were in suspence whither it were better they abode still among them, or followed after their fellows. For how long trow ye, will a multitude once disbanded, rest in quiet? Againe, in case any forraign warre should arise in the meane time, what might ensue therupon in the end? In conclusion, there was no hope behind to be looked for, but in the concord of citizens: and therefore the commons one way or other, either by reasonable conditions or unreasonable, were to be reconciled again and reduced into the citie, there was no remedie. So it was thought good and agreed upon, that one Menenius Agrippa (a faire spoken and eloquent man, gracious withall and welbeloved among the commons, for that he was from them descended) should be sent as an Orator to treat with them. Who being received into the campe, after that old and harsh kind of eloquence in those daies, spake as men faith to this effect, and told this tale and parable: Whilome (quoth he) when as in mans bodie, all the parts therof agreed not, as now they do in one, but each member had a severall intent & meaning, yea and a speech by it selfe: so it befel, that all other parts besides the belly, thought much & repined at that by their carefulnes, labor, & ministerie, all was gotten, & yet all little enough to serve it: and the bellie it selfe lying still in the mids of them, did nothing else but enioy the delightful pleasures brought unto her. Whereupon they mutined & conspired altogether in this wise, That neither the hands should reach & convey food into the mouth, nor the mouth receive it as it came, neyer the teeth grind & chew the same. In this mood & fit, whiles they were minded to famish the poore bellie, behold the other lims, yea & the whole bodie besides, pined, wasted, & fel into an extreme consumption. Then was it well seen, that even the very belly also did no small service, but fed the other parts, as it received food it selfe: seeing that by working and concocting the meat throughlie, it digested and distributeth by the veines into all parts, that fresh and perfect blood whereby we live, welike, and have our full strength. Comparing herewith, and making his application, to wit, how like this intestine and inward sedition of the bodie, was to the full stomacke of the commons, which they had taken and borne against the Senatours, he turned quite the peoples hearts. Then began some treatie of unitie and concord: and among other articles it was conditioned and granted, that the Communitie should have certaine sacred and inviolable magistrats of their owne among themselves, such as might have power to assist the Commons against the Consuls: Item, that it might not bee lawfull for any Senatour to beare that office. So there were created two Tribunes of the commons, C. Licinius and L. Albinus. And these elected three other fellow officers unto them. Of whom Scinius, the author of the sedition or insurrection was one, who were the other twaine is not for certaine knowne. Some say there were but two Tribunes created and no more in the mount Sacer, and that the sacred law was there made concerning their immunitie.

During this insurrection and revolt of the commons, Sp. Cassius & Posthumus Cominius entered their Consulships. In whose time a league was made with the people of Latium. For the establishing wherof, one of the Consuls staid behinde at Rome: the other was sent unto the Volscian warre, who discomfited and put to flight the Volscians of Antium, chasing and driving them into the towne Longula, which he wonne. And immediatlie he tooke Mucanites a towne of the Volscians, and after that with great force assaulted Corioli.

There was in campe, then among the flowre of gallant youths, one Caius Martius, a Noble yoong gentleman, right politicke of advise, active besides, and tall of his hands, who afterwards was surnamed Coriolanus. Whiles the Romane armie lay at siege before Corioli, and were amuzed whollie upon the townsmen within, whom they kept fast shut up, and feared no present danger at all from anie forraigne warre without: behold, all on a suddaine, the Volscian legions that came from Antium, assailed them: at which verie instant the enemy also sallied out of the towne. Which Martius seeing, who by good hap quartered and warded there, with a lustie band of elect men, not onely repressed and stopped the violence of those that issued and brake upon him, but also whiles the gate stood open, fiercely rushed in himselfe: and having made a foule slaughter of people thereby, at his first entrance into the citie, and caught up fire at a venture, flung it upon the houses that stood upon and about the walls. Whereupon arose a great outerie of the folke within the towne, together with lamentable weeping and wailing of women and children, as commonly is scene in such a fright. Which at the very first, both hardened the Romanes, and also troubled the Volscians: and no marvell, seeing the citie taken before their face, for which they were come to rescue. Thus were the Volscians of Antium defeated, and the town Corioli won. And Martius through his praise, so much obfured and stopped the light of the Consul his fame, that had it not been engraven in brasse for a remembrance and monument, That there was a league with the Latines, and the same made by Sp. Cassius alone (for that his companion was absent) there had been no record at all, but forgotten quite it had been, that ever Sp. Coninius warred with the Volscians.

The same yeare died Mementius Agrippa, a man all his life time before beloved indifferently of the Senators and the Commons: but after the insurrection, much more deere unto the Commons than before. This truchman, this mediator for civile attennement, this Embassadour and messenger from the Senators to the commons, this reconciler and reducer of the commons home againe into the citie, had not at his death sufficient to defray the charges of his funerals: the commons therefore made a purse and a contribution of a * Sextant by the poll, and were at the cost to interre and burie him worshipfully.

After this were made Consuls, T. Geganius, and P. Minutius. In which yeare when all was quiet abroad for any warre, and the dissention at home healed up cleane, and skinned: another calamitie farre more greivous entred the citie. First a dearth of corne, and all manner of victuals, by reason that the grounds upon the departure of the commons were forelet and untilled. Hereupon ensued famine, even such as usually is incident to men besieged. And verily the meinie of bondservants, yea and the commons too, had utterly perished for hunger, if the Consuls had not in time made the better provision: by sending purveyours all abroad to buy up corne, not only into Hetruria, by coasting along the river on the right hand from Hestia, and on the left hand by sea, (passing through the Volscians countie) even as far as Cumes: but also into Sicilie, there to lay for graine. Such was the hatred of the borderers, that Rome was enforced to have need of succour and releefe from a farre. Now when they had bought certain corne at Cumes, it was no sooner embarked, but the ships were staied and arrested there, by Aristodemus the tyrant, for the goods of the Tarquines, whose heire in remainder he was. In the Volscian countie and Pomptinum, they could buy none for money. There, the very Purveyours themselves were in danger of violence, by the men of the countie. Out of Tuscan there came come up the Tyber, wherewith the commons were sustained and refreshed. And considering the streights they were in for want of victuals, they had been fore distressed and vexed with warres besides, and that in a very ill time, and unseasonable for them: but that the Volscians, who now were in readinesse, and upon the point to make warre, had a pestilence that raigned hote among them. Which heave crosse and affliction, the enemies were so discouraged with, that when the plague began to stay, even then they continued still afraid.

The Romanes both at Velitree augmented the number of the inhabitants, and also at Norbansending a new Colonie into the mountaines, to be a fortreffe and strength for all the territorie of Pomptinum. Moreover, when M. Minutius, and A. Sempronius were Consuls, great store of corne was brought out of Sicilie: and it was debated in the Senate house, at what price the commons should be served therewith. Many thought the time was now come to wring the commons, and keep them under, and to recover againe those roialties, which by their departure were forcibly wrested and dismembred from the nobilitie. But above all others Martius Coriolanus, an utter and capitall enemy to the Tribunes power and authoritie, If they will (quoth hee) have their corne and victuals at the old price, let them restore unto the Senators their auncient right and prechenience. Why see I (as one brought under the yoke of servitude, and put as it were unto my ranfome, by robbers and thieves) these Magistrates of the Commons,

A mons? why see I Sicinius so mightie? Shall I endure these indignities longer than I needs must? I that could not beare Tarquinius to be King, shall I brooke and suffer Sicinius? Let him depart aside now, and take his commons with him: the way is open to mount Sacer and other hills: let them carrie away with them the corne out of our possessions and Lordships, as they did three yeares ago: let them enjoy, take for their use, and spend the store, which they in their foolerie and furie haue provided. I dare be bold to say, that when they are by this calamitie once tamed, they will rather till and husband the ground themselves, than with weapon in hand, and by way of insurrection, forbid and hinder the tillage thereof. I cannot so soone say, whether it had beene as meete, as I suppose it was possible and easie to effect, that the Senators by offering more gentle conditions in the prices of corne and victuals, might haue eased themselves of the Tribunes authoritie over them; and also haue beene disburdened of those impositions which maugre their heads, were laide upon them: Well, this seemed to the Senate a sharpe censure and severe sentence of Coriolanus, and for verie anger also it had like to have caused the Commons to rise up in armes: For they muttered and gave it out in these tearmes, That now they were laide at and assailed with fainine like enemies, defrauded and bereft of their meat and pittance: that the outlandish corne, the onely sustenance and food which fortune had ministred unto them beyond all hope, was snatched and plucked from their mouths, unlesse the Tribunes be delivered & yielded prisoners hand and foot bound to C. Martius, unlesse he might have his penniworths of the backe and shoulders of the commons of Rome. For he was now start up & become their tormentor and hangman, to command them either to death, or to servitude. As he went out of the counsell house, they had run upon him with violence, but that the Tribunes, as good lucke was, served him with proceffe in time, to appeare at a day, and come to his answer. Herewith, their furious anger was suppressed. For now everie man saw, that he was himselfe to be the judge and lord of his enemies life and death. Martius at the first scorned the Tribunes thundering threats, & gave the hearing, as though he made smal reckoning thereof, saying, That their authoritie had power granted by limitation, only to aid, and not to punish: that the Tribunes were Tribunes to the commons, and not to the Senators. But so spitefully were the Commons bent, and all so set upon mischief, that there was no other remedie, but one man must pay for it, to save and excuse the rest of the Nobles. Howbeit, the Senators did what they could to withstand them: by opposing hatred and displeasure againe, and making all meanes, what either privately they were able of themselves, or jointly by their whole Order and degree, to procure. And first, this course they assaied to stop and overthrow the suite commended; namely, by setting their followers and retainers in sundrie places to deale with the commons severallie one by one, and what they could to affright them from meetings and assemblies together. Afterwards, they came all forth at once into the Forum or common place. A man that had scene them would have said they had beene the parties themselves in trouble and accused, readie to hold up their hand at the barre: such praying, such a beseeching they made of the commons, in the behalfe of this one citizen, this onelic Senator; that if they would not in their love acquit him for their sakes, as innocent and unguiltie, yet they would give him unto them as an offender and faultie person. In conclusion, when his daie came, he made default and appeared not, yet continued they still in their angrie mood against him. And being condemned in his absence, for contumacie, departed into banishment to the Volscians, menacing his own countie as he went, and carying even then with him the revenging stomacke of an enemy. The Volscians at his comming received him courteously, and friendlie intreated him everie daie more than other, as they perceived his anger more and more toward his countie men, by many complaints he made of them, & threats withall that he chisoones gave out against them in their hearing. He made his abode and sojourned in the house of Accius Tullus. Who at that time was a mightie great man among the Volscians, and one that ever bare mortall mallice unto the Romanes. And whiles the one of them was provoked with an old cancred grudge, and the other set on and pricked forward upon a fresh quarrell and occasion of anger, they both laide their heads together and complotted to make warre upon the Romanes. This onelic thing stood in their waie to crosse their designs: They thought verilie their Commons would hardlie or uneth at all be brought, to rise and take armes againe, which they had so often unhappilie attempted: And besides, their courages were well cooled, and their stomacks abated, by the losse of their youth in manie and sundrie warres often times afore, and now at last, by the late pestilence and mortalitie. They were therefore to go cunninglie to worke; that for as much as the old hatred against the Romanes was growne out and worne away, their hearts upon some new anger might be chaufed and galled againe. There were by chance at that time in Rome, the great Games and Plaies in hand, to be set out a new the second time, the occasion whereof was this: A certaine ho uholder one morning betimes before the shewes and games began, had beaten with rods a poore slave of his under the forke which he caried on his shoulders, and driven him along through the mids of the Circus or Theatre: and with that began the plaies, as if there had bene no matter therein of scruple or religion. But not long after, one T. Latinus a meane commoner had a dreame or vision: In which he thought that Jupiter complained and said, that the dancer before the plaies pleased him never a whit: and unlesse those games were newlie exhibited againe, and that verie statelie and sumptuouslie, some great danger should befall the citie: willing him withall, to make relation heereof unto the Consuls. The man albeit in truth he was not without some sense and feeling of religion & the feare of God: yet made he no such great scruple at the matter, but that the reverence he had of the majestie and countenance of the magistrates surmounted and dashed it cleane: for feare least haplie he should become a talking stocke in mens mouthes, and be mocked for his labour. But this delaie and sleeping of the matter, he bought full decree. For within few daies his sonne happened to die. And because he should be out of doubt what was the cause of this his losse and iuddaine misfortune, whiles he was troubled in spirit, with anguish and sorrow, behold, the same vision appeared to him againe in his sleepe, and seemed to aske him whicher he had not yet sufficientlie paid for this disobedience and contempt of God? threatening moreover, that in case he made no greater hast to certifie the Consuls therof, there was a greater judgement and plaguetoward, and that verie neere. Now was the thing more evident than before, and past all peradventure. Howbeit he neglected & drave it off still, until he was himselfe overtaken with a grievous disease, and brought to great weaknes in all his joints. Then verilie the wrath of the gods taught him to be wiser. And being overwearied with harmes past, and in feare of more presentlie to ensue, he conferred with his kinsfolke and friends to be advised by them. When he had declared unto them what he had seene and heard, namely, how Jupiter had so often appeared unto him in his sleepe, and that the fearefull displeasure and threatnings of the heavenlie gods were shewed plainlie by sundrie mischances fallen upon him: by the full consent of all them that were about him, he was brought in a litter to the Consuls, into the Forum or common place, from whence by the Consuls commaundement he was caried into the Counsell house. Where, when he had made report unto the Senatours of the selfesame things, to the exceeding wonder and admiration of them all, see another strange miracle: He that was brought into the Senate house a lame creple of all his limbs, after he had once delivered his errand, returned home to his house (as it is recorded) found upon his feete. Herupon the Senate decreed, That the Games should be set out as magnificentlie as could be devised.

To these solemnities resorted, by the motion and persuation of Accius Tullius, a great number of Volscians. But before they were begun, Tullius according to the complot between him and Martius at home, made a step or errand unto the Consuls at Rome, saying, that he would willinglie commune and treat with them apart, of important affairs concerning the State. When avoidance was made, and everie man gone, he began in this wise: Loth I am (quoth he) if otherwise I could chuse, to speake ought but well of my countrymen and fellow citizens. Yet come I not to complaine of anie action of theirs already passed, but to give a caveat, and provide that nothing be praised hereafter. The nature and disposition (I may tell you) of our people, is too too unconstant and unstaied, more ywis than I would they were, a great deale: that have we found and felt to our great cost and manifold damage, wec I say, who verilie at this day by your long sufferance, and not by good desert of ours, do stand in good termes of peace and safene. There is now here a great multitude of Volscians, the Plaies and Games readie to be represented and celebrate. Your citie will be whollie amused in the beholding therof: I remember upon the like occasion, what was sometimes enterprised and wrought in this citie by the youth of the Sabines; and my heart doth tremble and quake for feare, least some inconsiderate, rash and foolish part be plaied by ours: thus much, O ye Consuls, I thought good in our behalfe and yours both, to give you ynking of before hand. As for me, I am minded presentlie to go from hence home, least I being heere seene, might be thought in some word or deed accessarie unto them, & so culpable. Having made this speech he departed. When the Consuls had declared in the Senate this thing so doubtfull, and yet proceeding from the mouth of so sure and certaine

to the Romanes Consuls.

A an author: behold, the credite of the man (as commonly it is seene) rather than the likelihood of the matter, caused them to be warie and circumspect, yea, although there was no such need or cause at all. Whereupon the Senate made an Act, that the Volscians should be jogging out of the citie. And divers criers or Bedles were sent out sundrie waies, to command them to avoyd & be packing before night. At the first, the Volscians were onely much affrighted, and ranne everie man to and fro into his Inne to fetch away his things. But afterwards in the way homeward, they began to thinke more and more of it, and to grow melancholic: thinking it a great indignitie, that like polluted and profaned persons, they should be driven from the Games, on festival holidays, discarded (as a man would say) and excommunicate out of the companie both of God and man. Thus as they went along all on a row, as it were in one continued and joyned traine, Tullius (who was gone afore as far as the Ferentine head) received the formost and chiefe of them, as every one came, & entertained them with complaints & words of indignation, & drew both them who willingly gave eare to his words so fitly framed & tending to stir more coles, and also by their meanes the rest of the multitude, into a plain field, lying hard vnder the high way side. Vnto whom, assembled together as it were to here a sermon, he thus began to speake: Admit (quoth he) you could forget the old wrongs and abuses offered you by the people of Rome, the losses and overthrowes of the Volscian Nation, yea and all other quarrels whatsoever; how can ye put up this daies spightfull reproch and dishonour received at their handes? who to our great dishonour and shame, have begun their solemne Games? Perceiued you not how they have triumphed ouer you to day? how as ye departed, ye were a spectacle and pageant to all men, citizens and strangers, and to so many neighbour nations adjoining? how your wives and children were brought as it were in a shew, to make them sport, and to laugh at? what conceit was in their heads (think ye) that heard the voyce of the Bedle? what thought they that beheld you as you dislodged? what imagined they that happened to meete this ignominious troupe as they marched? Even this & no other, that there was some wicked sinne among us, not to be named, whereby we should as malefactors, have stained & polluted their games if we had ben present at the sight of them, and have committed some hainous act, that would require by some satisfaction of sacrifice to be purged: & for that cause were driven from having any conversation, fellowship, and societie of good and godly men? Over and besides, how can you choose but thinke of this, That we enjoy our liues still, onely because we hastned our remoove, (if this may be called a remoove, and not rather a plaine taking of a flight and running away.) And yet you reckon this no enemy citie, where, if ye had staied but one day longer, you had died for it everie one. Defiance is giuen already, and war denounced against you; but if ye be men indeede of courage, to their great cost and mischief that have denounced it. Thus being of themselves kindled inough with indignation, and by these words enflamed and set on fire, they went everie man his way from thence home: and so effectually sollicitated each one the people where he dwelt, that in fine the whole nation of the Volscians revolted and rebelled. To mannage this war, were chosen Generall commaunders by one consent of all the citties, Accius Tullius, and Cn. Martius the banished Romane: in whome of the twaine they reposed greater hope, and this their hope failed them not. So as it soone appeared that the puissance of the state of Rome, consisted more in the dexteritie of good captaines, than in strong armies of souldiours. For first he went to  Circeios*,  Monte Cingillo*, from whence he expelled the Romane Coloners, and delivered the citie cleere and free unto the Volscians. Then by crosse waies he passed into the Latine streete, called Via Latina: and regained from the Romanes, these their townes newly gotten afore, Satricum, Longula, Pollutia & Corioli. After this he wan Lanuvium againe, & so forward he forced  Corbio*, Vitelia, Trebia, Labicos, and Pedum. And last of all from Pedum, he marched on toward the citie of Rome, and at Cluilæ Fosse, five miles off, he encamped and forraied the territorie about, sending with the forreiers certaine guides, to keepe them from spoyling and doing harme in the Noblemens lands: were it that he were more spightfull to the Commons, or that thereby some discord might arise, between the Comminaltie and the Senatours: which doubtlesse had soone growne, so mightily had the Tribunes already by their complaints and accusations, provoked the Commons forward, (who of themselves were shrewd inough) against the heads and magistrates of the citie, but that the feare of forraine dangers, the greatest bond of ciuile concord that can be, held them in and knit their hearts together, were they never so jealous, suspected, and hatefull afore one to the other. Herein onely was all their difference, that the Senate and Consuls, reposed hope in nothing else save onely in warre: the commons on the other side were were desirous of any thing whatsoever, but warre.

Now were S. Nautius and Sex. Furius Consuls: who as they were surveying and mustering the legions, and disposing of a good Corpus de guard upon the wals, and other places wherein they thought it expedient to keep a standing watch and ward: behold a mightie number called and cried hard for peace, & with their sedicious clamors, put them in exceeding feare: yea & afterwards, forced them to assemble the Senatehouse together, and to propose concerning the sending of certaine embassadors to Cn. Marius. The Lords of the Senate seeing evidently the commons hearts to faile them, accepted and granted the motion propounded. Whereupon were Oratours sent unto Marius to treat for peace. At whose hands they received this heave and stout answer: If so be the Volsciens had their lands restored to them againe; then there might be some parle and treatie of peace: but if they will needs at their pleasure still enjoy that bootie which by war they have gotten, then would he in remembrance of private wrongs done unto him by his cuntrymen, as also of the friendship and courtesie shewed him by strangers that had given him entertainment, do his best to make it knowne unto the world, that his courage and stomacke is incensed, and not abated and quailed by his banishment. Then were the same Embassadors sent againe the second time, but they might not be admitted once to set foote within the campe. It is reported moreover that the verie priests in their Pontificalibus, in their rich vestiments and goodly ornaments, went with supplication to the tents of the enemies, and turned his heart no more than the embassadors had done before them. Then the dames of the citie came flocking all about Veturia the mother, and Volumnia the wife of Coriolanus. Whether this proceeded from any publike counsell and was done in pollicie, or came onely of womens feare, I find but little in any records. But howsoever it came about, this one thing is certaine, they perswaded so effectually with them, that both Veturia an aged woman, and also Volumnia with her two little sonnes that she had by Marius, went toward the enemies campe, to see if women by their praies and teares, might save the citie, which men with speare and shield could not defend. When they were come into the camp, & word brought to Coriolanus, that there was an exceeding great traine of women thither arrived: at the first, he, as one that had relented, neither for that publike maiestie in the Embassadors, nor yet at the religious reverence, which he both conceived in mind, & saw with his eyes in the clergie, stood much more stidly bent against the teares of seely women. But afterwards one of his familiar friends, who had seen and knowne Veturia there, mourning and bewailing exceedingly above the rest, as she stood betwixt her daughter in law and her little nephewes: If mine eyes be matches (quoth hee) and deceive me not, here is your mother, your wife, and children. Whereat, Coriolanus, faring like a man well neare beside himselfe, arose from his seate, and ran to meete his mother, and to embrace her. But the woman falling in steede of praies into a fit of choller: Let me know (quoth she) before I suffer thee to embrace me, whether I am come to an enemy or to a sonne, whether I be in thy campe as a captive prisoner, or as a naturall mother. And have I lived indeede so long, and rubbed on still in this miserable old age of mine for this, to see thee first a banished man, and after that to become an enemy? Couldst thou finde in thine heart to waite and spoyle that courtrey which bred thee, which fostered thee, and brought thee up? And be it that thou hither marched with a cruell intent and full of threats, would not thine anger and fell mood flake, when thou didst set foote within the borders and marches thereof? And being come within the sight of Rome, arose not this in thy mind & thought, Within those wals yonder is my house, there are my house goods, my mother, my wife, my children? Why then, belike if I had never been a mother, and borne a child, Rome had not been assaulted. And if I had no sonne at all, I might have died well ynough in my native courtrey, whiles it remained free. But as for me, neither can I suffer ought, more for thy dishonestie and shame; nor more to mine owne calamitie and miserie than this: and most wretched cause though I be, yet long time so I cannot continue. But for these here, looke thou well to it, I advise thee, and have pittie of them, who if thou goe on as thou beginnest, are like to feele untimely death, or indure long captivitie. Then his wife and children hung about him, and clipped him: whereat the women fell a weeping on all sides, bewailing their owne case and the state of their courtrey. So as at length the man was overcome. And after he had taken them in his armes likewise, he let them goe: and himselfe dislodged and removed his campe backward from the citie. When he had withdrawn the legions out of the territorie of Rome, he garth himselfe, men said, such hatred and displeasure for this action, that it cost him his life: and murdered he was, some report one way,

A some another. But I find in Fabius a most ancient writer, that he lived untill he was an old man: who reporteth this of him: That oftentimes in his latter daies he used to utter this speech, A heave case and most wretched, for an aged man to live banisht. The men of Rome envied not those women their due deserved praies. So devoid was the world in those daies, of depraving and detracting the glorie of others. For in memoriall hereof to all posteritie, there was a temple built and dedicated to Fortuna Muliebris. i. Womens fortune.

Fortuna Muliebris.

After all this, the Volscians joined the Aequians unto them, and returned into the territorie of Rome. But the Aequians would no longer abide Accius to bee their Commander. And upon this strife between the Volscians and Aequians, whither of them should appoint a Generall over the armie raised jointly of them both, first they grew to a mutinie, and afterwards to a cruell battell. Such was the good fortune of the people of Rome, that two armies of their enemies, were thus by civile discord and contention, no lesse mortall than obstinate, overthrowne and brought to naught. Consuls then, were T. Sicinius and C. Aquilius. To Sicinius were allotted the Volscians, and to Aquilius the Hernikes (who also were out and up in armes) for their severall province. That yeare were the Hernikes vanquished, but with the Volscians they fought so, as they departed on even hand, giving and taking the like.

After them were Sp. Cassius, and Proculus Virginius made Consuls. Then was there a league concluded with the Hernikes, and two third parts of their lands were taken from them. Whereof the one moiety, Cassius the Consul was minded to distribute among the Latins, the other among the Commoners. To this donation hee laid too also a good portion of ground, which being commons by right, he found much fault, that it was in the tenure and possession of private persons. This act of his made diverse of the Senatours, namely, such as were great landed men and interested therein, to startle for feare of hazarding their estate. Over and besides, the Senatours all in generall were in great perplexitie, least that the Consull by this largesse, should rise by popular favor to such greates, as might prejudice their free hold, yea and endanger the very main chance of publick libertie. And this was the first time that the law Agraria was published: and forward unto this present lower, it was never debated of, but with exceeding great stirs and troubles of the State. The other Consull withstood this largesse, with the generall consent of the Senatours, and without contradiction of some commoners: who at the very first began to mislike, and utterly abhorre, that the donation was so commune, and from the naturall citizens, extended to their allies and confederates. Moreover, they might oftentimes heare even the Consull himselfe Virginius, openly in his solemn Orationes before the people, to deliver by way of prophesie, and as it were to prognosticate, That this was a pestilent largesse of his brother Consull, and that those grounds would in the end enthrall the takers thereof, and that it was the very high way to set up a kingdome againe. For to what other intent (I pray you) were their allies, and the nation of the Latines associate in the same? To what purpose either, was a third part of the lands won by conquest, given againe to the Hernikes professed enemies but a while before, but that these nations might have Cassius to be such another captaine of theirs, as Coriolanus was. And thus by dissuading and crossing the law Agraria, he became now to be popular and gracious with the people. Then both Consuls strived a vie, who might please & gratifie the Commons most. Virginius, by giving out that he would maintaine and suffer the lands to be divided, so they were assigned to none but to the citizens of Rome: Cassius againe, who in the largesse of the lands, seemed to court and currie favor with the allies, and thereby was of the citizens lesse regarded and reputed, to the end, that by some other benefite he might regaine the hearts of his cuntrymen, was of opinion, and made a motive, that the monie which was received for the Sicilian corne, should be repaid unto the people. But the Commons refused and abhorred that, as a verie bribe & readie bait for a scepter and crowne. So greatly were all his gifts, for the deepe rooted suspicion and jealousie of his aspiring to a kingdome, loathed in the conceits of men, as if they had flowed in wealth, and been rich ynough. And for certaine it is recorded, that so soone as he left his Office, he was condemned and put to death. Some report, that his owne father did the execution: and that upon examination privately had at home within his house, he finding him faultie, whipped him first, and so killed him, and consecrated the goods and chattels of his son, as a Deodand to Ceres, whereof a Statue or Image was made, with this inscription or title, GIVEN OUT OF THE HOUSE OF CASSIUS. I find in some records (which soundeth neerer to the truth) that he was by the * Quæstors Caso Fabius, and L. Valerius, endited of treason, and being convicted, was by a verdict of the people condemned, and his house by order from the whole citie, rased and pulled downe.

And at this day, it is the void yard that lieth before the temple of Tellus. But howsoever he had his triall and judgement, privately or openly, condemned he was when Ser. Cornelius and Q. Fabius were Consuls. Long continued not the peoples anger and spight against Cassius. So sweet was the law Agraria in it selfe, that when the author and upholder thereof was out of the world, they longed to have it on foot againe. Which desire of theirs was the rather set on fire, through the pinching niggardise of the Senatours, who having that yeare subdued the Volscians and Æquians, kept the souldiours fasting, and defrauded them of the spoile. For what prizes soever were gotten from the enemies, the Consull Fabius sold and brought into the Exchequer or chamber of the citie.

Now was the name of Fabius alreadie odious to the Communalitie, for the last Consuls sake: yet obtained the Senatours so much, and held their owne so, as Casus Fabius was created Consull with L. Æmilius. This made the Commons more malicious and bent to mischeefe. And sedition at home caused warre abroad. Foraine warre hush civile discord for a while. Both Senatours and Commons with one accord, under the conduct of Æmilius, fought fortunately with the rebellious Volscians and Æquians, and defeated them. Howbeit more enemies perished in the chase, than were slaine in the battell: so hotly the horsemen pursued them when they were once discomfited and gave not over. The same yeare was the temple of Cassus, consecrated in the Ides of Quintilis. It had been vowed aforetime in the Latines warre by Posthumius the Dictator. His sonne was created Duumvir for that purpose, and dedicated it.

This yeare also the Commons hearts were set upon the law Agraria, and longed afresh after the sweetnes therof. The Tribunes of the Communalitie graced and credited their popular authoritie, with propounding a law as popular and acceptable to the people. But the Senatours supposing verilie that the multitude was furious and outrageous enough and too much of themselves, without anie hire and reward, stood in great dread and horror of these largesses, as the verie allurements and provocations, of rash and headie attempts: and the stoutest champions of their side to withstand the lawe, were the Consuls. That part therefore and State of the citie had the better hand, not onelie this present yeare, but for the next ensuing. For they chose M. Fabius, Casus his brother for the one Consull, and L. Valerius for the other, a man of the twaine more odious in the eyes of the Commons, in regard of his late accusation of Sp. Cassius. In which yeare also there was strife and much adoe with the Tribunes. But both law and lawmakers with their glorious bragging and vaunting of their goodlie donative, which they could not effect, proved vaine and came to nothing. Upon this, the name of Fabius, who after three Consulships together one after another, by them born continuallie without intermission, were inured and tried in the broiles and contentions of Tribunes, was in great request and reputation: and in their house and familie remained still for a good while after, that dignitie, as an honour well and worthelie bestowed upon them. Then began the Veientian warre, and the Volscians likewise rebelled. But for anie warres abroad whatsoever, they had strength enough and to spare, if by jarres at home among their owne selues they had not abused the same.

Besides this disquietnes and affliction of all mens minds, occasioned by these dissensions, there hapned (to amend the matter well) prodigious, and strange tokens from heaven, daily in a manner threatening both in citie & countrie the heavichand of God. And when as the soothsayers and wizards were sent out unto, to search forth the cause of Gods wrath and indignation both in publike and private, as well by inspect of the inwards of sacrificed beasts, as by aspect of birds and fowles, they could assigne it to nothing else but this, that there was some error committed in their sacrifices and divine liturgie. Those fearefull and prodigious signes proceeded still so farre, that one Oppia a vestale Nun, convicted and condemned of incest, suffered death.

After this, followed Q. Fabius and C. Tullius Consuls. In which yeare the discord at home was nothing lesse, and the warre abroad farre greater. For the Æquians rose up in armes: the Veientians also entered the confines, and made much spoile. And whiles they were more and more careful about these warres what order to take, Casus Fabius and Sp. Furius were made Consuls. By this time the Æquians assaulted Artona a citie in Latium. And the Veientians having sped themselves with prizes and booties, made great cracks that they would give an assault upon the verie citie of Rome. These fearefull newes, which ought to have abated and taken downe the stomacks of the Commons, made them much more fierce & sel, and they returned of themselves unto their old biace of refusing warfare: but Sp. Licinius their Tribune, thinking now the time was come to enforce upon the Senatours the law Agraria, upon this exigent and extreme point

A of necessitie, had taken upon him to stop the levying and setting out of an armie. But he drew upon his owne head the whole hatred and displeasure of the Tribunes themselves and their authoritie. For the Consuls opposed themselves against him no more bitterlie than his owne companions in office: by whose assistance the Consuls went through with the muster. And for two warres at once, there were enrolled two armies. The one under the leading of Fabius, against the Æquians, the other, against the Veientians commaunded by Furius. Against whom there was nothing done worthe of remembrance. As for Fabius, he had somewhat more to doe with his owne men than with his enemies. That man himselfe alone was he, that being Consull upheld the Common-weale, which his armie for hatred of their Consull, had as much as in them lay, utterly betrayed. For when as he (above many other warlike feats and parts of a right worthie Generall, wherof he shewed singular prooffe, both in preparation, and also in managing of the warre) had to marshalled and ranged his battaile, that with sending out the horsemen onelie, he disordered and brake the ranks of his enemies host: behold, the footmen would not follow on after that disparay: neither, when the exhortation of their leader whom they hated, prevailed not, could their owne shame at leastwise, and the publicke dishonour for the present, no nor yet the imminent danger like to ensue (in case the enemy had taken heart againe and made head) force them to amend their pace one jot, and make more speed. Neither could he possibly make them (if to doe nothing else) so much as to march still in battaile array: but full against his commaundement they retire with their ensignes: and as men forie in their hearts and ill appaid; (he that had seene them would have said they had lost the field) cursing their Generall one while, and the valiant service of the horsemen another while, they returne to their Tents. Neither wist the Generall what way to remedie this so pestilent an example and dangerous precedent. Thus we may see, that brave men, of singular and excellent wits, have bene more to seeke and taile in their skill, how to governe a subject than to vanquish an enemy. The Consull returneth to Rome, having purchased more hatred of his froward and stubborne soldiours, than won honour by his martiall prowesse. Nevertheless, the Senatours prevailed so much that the Consulship kept residence still in the name of the Fabij. So, they created M. Fabius Consull, and joine with him Cn. Manlius for his colleague.

This yeare likewise, had one patrone and maintainer of the law Agraria, to wit, Tiberius Pontificius a Tribune. He taking the same toturfe, and following the steps of Sp. Licinius, hindered the musters for a while. And when the Senatours were herewith disquieted againe, then Ap. Claudius arose up and said, That the yeare before, the Tribunes power was overmatched, and the neck of it broken in prooffe, only for that present, but in example for ever hereafter: for as much as it was well seen then by experience, that of it selfe even among their own selves it fell a peeces and never will there want any time one good Tribune or other, that would be glad to get the start and victorie of his fellow, yea and the favour also of the better part, for to purchase the good of the weale-publike. And that there would be more Tribunes, if more were needfull, readie to assist the Consuls: and if there were but one, even that one were sufficient to stand against all the rest. So that, the Consuls and LL. of the Counsell would but do their indeavour, to win unto the State and Senate, some certaine of the Tribunes, if they might not compasse all. The Senatours being thus schooled and taught their lessons by Appius, both all in generall would courteously salute and friendly intreat the Tribunes, and also in particular as manie of them as had bene Consuls, according to that interest that each man had in any one of them privatelie, partlie by favour and friendship, and partlie by countenance and authoritie, prevailed so with them, that they were willing and well content to employ the Tribunes authoritie to the good and safetie of the Commonweale. So by the helpe of foure Tribunes, against one that hindered the good of all, the Consuls tooke muster of the soldiours. Then set they forward on their voiage to warre with the Veientians: unto whom from all parts of Hetruria they came to aide and succour; not so much for anie love that they bare to the Veientians, as in hope that the puissance of Rome through intestine and civile dissention, would decay and come to nought. For in all the Dietes and assemblies of the States of Hetruria, the Princes and Peeres gave it out and said, That the power and greatnes of the Romanes was everlasting, if through mutuall discord they warred not so among themselves: which hath bene found the onely bane of welthie & flourishing cities, wherby mightie Empires became mortal & subject to a final end. Which mischiefe (say they) this long time hath bene prevented and delaied, partly through the sage advise and prudent government of the Senate, partlie by the patience and long sufferance of the Commons: but now they are come to a great extremitie. Devided they are, and of one citie become twaine: each part have their severall Magistrats and lawes by themselves. At the first, how ever they were wont to be at odds, and to fall out at the mustering of souldiours, yet in warre they would hold together, and obey their captaines. Howsoever they fared at home in the citie, were the State never so farre out of order, yet so long as martial discipline was on foot and tooke place, they might be reclaimed, and all troubles stayed. But now, the former use & custome of disobeying Magistrats within the citie, is taken up by the Romane souldiours, in the verie campe. For no longer since than the last warre of all, in the time of battell and conflict, their whole armie agreed of their owne accord, not forced by any extremitie that they were put unto, for to give the Veientians, as much as in them lay, even after they had lost the field, the entire victorie and honour of the day. For they abandoned their ensignes, left their Generall alone in the skirmish, and against his will, retired themselves into the campe. And surely, if they hold on still this course, Rome may be won by meanes of her owne souldiours: there needs no more to doe, but to proclaime and make a shew of warre: For even the verie deities and gods themselves would performe all the rest. Upon these hopes and deepe persuasions, the Tuscans, who afore were wont otherwhiles to have the better, and sometimes to take the worse in their warres, put themselves in armes. The Romane Consuls likewise were in feare of nothing els so much, as of their owne power, their owne force and weapons: being affrighted at the remembrance of that foule and shamefull example, and that lewd part played in the last warre: least peradventure, they should put it upon this point of hazard, as to be in danger of two battels at once. And therefore in so doubtfull and perillous a case, they held off fight, and kept themselves within their campe, if haply time and space would assuage their anger, bring them into the right way again, and reclaime them to good and reasonable order. The enemies herat, as well Veientians as the other Tuscans, made the greater halt, and were more sharpe set, and provoked them to the field: first by riding up and down before their campe, hard at the gates thereof, braving and challenging them forth, at the last, seeing they could not prevaile, they fell to rating and railing, one while upon the Consuls themselves, another while upon the whole armie, in these and such like tearmes: A gay matter indeed, and a proper devise to salve their cowardise, and under a colour of civile dissention to cloke their fearefulness: and the Consuls forsooth mistrust more the faithfulness and loialtie of their souldiours in service, than they doubted their valor and sufficiency of service. Marie, here is indeede a newkind of mutinie. What? Armed men to hold their peace, and sit still? Hitting them in their teeth besides, with their newstart-up rising, and late sprong base beginning, letting flie against them lies and truths, one with another, and spared not. For all this foule stirre they kept, flourishing and reviling them under their very trench, and hard at their gates, the Consuls themselves were not one jot troubled. But the foolish and ignorant multitude what with anger, and what for shame of these reprochfull tearmes, was much distempered: and one while wholly gave over to regard and thinke upon home troubles and dissentions, and had rather than their lives be revenged of their enemies: Anon againe, they would not in any case gratifie the Nobles and Consuls, nor wish them good successe. Thus the hatred both against the enemies without, and the Consuls within strove together in their hearts: untill at length, forrain occasions gat the masteire over them: so proudly, so insolently, the enemies scorned and made a game of them. Whereupon they came thicke by troups to the Generals pavilion, calling upon them for to fight, requiring to put forth the banner and signall of battell. The Consuls laid their heads together, and as taking good advisement, conferred on the matter a good while. To fight they were most willing and desirous: but this desire was to be kept back and dissimuled, and thereby augmented: to the end, that by holding off, by opposing themselves, and making some stay, they might set the souldiours on, & being once set on it, they might make them follow more eagerly at once. In conclusion, this answer was returned unto them: That they made too much hast: it was not yet full ripe, nor the time come, to give battell: they must hold themselves contented, and keepe within their tents: proclaiming moreover, that no man be so hardie as to fight: and whosoever attempted it, without their warrant and commission, they would proceed against him with all rigour, as a professed enemy. Thus were they dismissed: And the lesse willing they thought the Consuls were, the more eager were they, and set upon a batell. The enemies besides, when they had intelligence, that the Consuls were not disposed to fight, and had taken order to the contrarie, were inkindled and inflamed so much the more. For now they supposed they might brave it, and insult upon them safely without danger. For why? The Consuls durst not

A trust the souldiours with weapon in hand: now were their mutinies come to the height, and to break forth in extremities: now and never before the Romane Empire and Dominion was at an end. Prefuming confidently upon this ground, they run together unto the gates, redoubling a thousand villanous & opprobrious termes, and much ado they had to forbear assaulting the camp. Now could the Romans on the other side hold no longer, & endure this contumelie & indignitie, but came running from all parts of the camp unto the Consuls. And now not leasurably as before, make they request, and by mediation of their chiefe centurians, but all on once on every side plied them with outcries & clamors. Now was the matter come to ripenes, yet haist the Consuls and hold off. Then Fabius, seeing the tumult increased, & that for feare of a mutinie, his brother Consul had yielded already, caused silence to be made by sound of trumpet, & thus he spake: I know full well O Manlius, that these fellows are able to win the victorie: but that they will so do I know not, and they themselves have caused me to doubt. I have therefore set down my rest, & fully resolved not to give the signal of battaile, unlesse they sweare to returne out of the field with victorie. Once did the souldiours in battaile deceive a Cos. of Rome: but the gods in heaven shall they never deceive. Then M. Flavoleius a Centurion, one of the formost that called for battaile so instantlie, Returne will I (quoth hee) O M. Fabius, victor out of the field: and if I faile then I beseech father Jupiter, Mars Gradivus and other gods to make me a fearefull example, and shew their wrathfull displeasure upon me. The same oth after him tooke the whole armie, everie man against himselfe. Thus when they had sworne, the trumpet sounded. Then buckle they themselves toward battaile, full of anger, full of hope. Now they bid the Tuscans revile and raile their fill: now being at all points armed, they wished they had afore them man to man their enemies, those that were so livelie and lustie with their tongues. Right valiantly bare themselves that daie, as well the Commons as the Nobles. But the name of the Fabij, the Fabij I say, passed all the rest and wan the spurs. Who in this peece of service purposed to gaine againe the hearts of the Commons, which in many civile contentions were set against them. And so they embattailed themselves. The enemies likewise, both the Veientians & also the Tuscane legions were nothing behind, as making almost sure reckoning that they should be fought withall no more than the Aequians had beene. Nay, they were in hope of some greater disorder amongst them, and that, considering they were so malecontent, and the occasion so doubtfull, they would play a more shamefull part, and shew their leaders a beastlie cast. But it fell out farre otherwise. For never in any other warre afore, gave the Romanes a hotter charge upon the enemies: so much had they of the one side with spitefull taunts and reproaches needled them, and the Consuls on the other side with their long delays what them on. Scarce had the Tuscans any time to put themselves in battaile array, but at the verie first encounter and shooke, casting their javelins careleslie from them (I know not how) rather than levelling and launcing them against the enemy, they came presently pell-mell to hand strokes, and to deale with their swords, which is the cruelllest fight of all other. The Fabij among the formost in the forefront fought valiantlie, shewing their countymen a brave sight, and a noble example to follow. Where, Q. Fabius who had beene Consul the third yeare before, the leader and forwardest of them all, whiles he advanced himselfe and rushed amongst the thickest of the Veientians, and scuffled with many of them together, was not ware of his deadlie enemy so neere: but behold a certaine Tuscane a mightie man of strength and skilfull at his weapon, ran him through the breast with his sword. Which was not so soone drawne forth of his bodie, but Fabius fell downe headlong upon his wound and died. Both armies felt the fall of that one man: and therewith the Romanes recoiled. With that M. Fabius the Consul, stepped over his bodie as it lay along, and holding forth his target betwene: Why, souldiours (quoth he) is the oth ye tooke, to run away and retire thus into the campe? And are ye more afraid in deed, of these most dastardlie enemies, than of Jupiter and Mars, by whom ye sware? But I, who was not sworne at all, will either make returne with victorie, or else O Q. Fabius, fighting here by thee, I will live and die by thy side. To whom, Casus Fabius, who the yeare afore was Consul, replied againe: Thinke you brother, with these words to make them to fight? Nay, the gods are they that must doe it, by whom they have sworne. And let us like Noble knights, and for the honour of the Fabian house, stirre up and animate our souldiours by fighting rather than by exhorting. Thus rode the two Fabij with lance in rest into the forefront, and drew the whole battaile with them. The fight of one side being thus renewed, Cn. Manlius the Consul in the other wing, bestirred himselfe, and did for his part as valiantly: Where hapned almost the like fortune. For as in the

Fabius to his

one wing the souldiours followed Q. Fabius, so in this they cheerefully went with the Consull G. Asinius, chasing the enemies afore him as discomfited. And when he was fore wounded, and thereupon gone out of the battaile, his men supposing him to be slaine, drew backe, and had indeede lost ground and given way to the enemy, but that the other Consull with certaine corners of horsemen, galloped amaine into that quarter, and cried aloud that his fellow Consull was living: and that himselfe who had defeated the other poynt, was readie with victorie to assist them, and so upheld the medley, that now began to shrink. Manlius also to encourage his men, shewed himselfe againe in open fight. Thus the knowledge and preience of the two Consuls, made the souldiours take heart afresh. Herewithall besides, were the enemies battalions the thinner and weaker, because they trusting upon their exceeding number, had drawn out those that were to serve for succour and supply, and sent them away to assaile the campe. In the surprising whereof, finding no great adoe and small resistance, whiles they had more mind to rife for pillage, than to fight for the victorie, they lost time. In the meane space the Romanes Triarii, who were not able to hold out the first assault and entrance, having dispatched to the Consuls certaine messengers, to give knowledge in what termes they stood, cast themselves round into a ring, and retired themselves to the Prætorium or Generals lodging, and of themselves alone, made head and renewed the fight. Likewise Manlius the Consull being ridden back to the campe, at everie gate set certaine souldiours in guard: and so enclosed them within, that they could not get forth. The Tuskanes being in this desperate case, fared more like mad men than hardie souldiours. For when as they ranne here and there everie way, according as they had any hope to find issue & to escape, and had made sundrie offers & attempts in vain: behold one troupe of tall fellows in a plumpe, made no more ado, but knowing the Consull, who by reason of brave & goodly armor was a faire mark, charged upon his own person. The first volley of their shot, was received by those that stood about him, but their violence afterwards could not be endured. The Consull himselfe was wounded to death, and fell down in the place, & at the rest were discomfited. Whereupon the Tuskanes tooke more hart unto them, but the Romanes were so masked, that they ran all about the campe in great feare. And in extreame jeopardie had they been, but that the Lieutenants caught up the Consull his bodie, and made passage at one gate for the enemy. Through which they rushed forth, and dismarched disorderly, untill they light vpon the other Consull presently after his victorie: where they either fell againe upon the edge of the sword, or were scattered and put to flight. This brave victorie thus achieved, was heavey yet and sorrowfull for the death of two so noble personages. And therefore when the Senate had decreed a triumph, the Consull returned this answer, That willingly he could allow thereof in regard of the passing good service performed in that warre, in case an armie might triumph without a General. But as for himselfe, seeing that his house griued and mourned for the death of his brother Q. Fabius, and that the commonwealth was halfe fatherlesse as it were, for the losse of a Consull, he would not accept the lawrell so deformed and foully blemished, both with publike and private sorrow. This triumph thus by him refused, was more honourable than all the triumph in the world. By which wee may see that glorie despised in due time returneth otherwhiles in greater measure. Then solemnized he with great honour the obsequies one after another, first of his fellow Consull, and then of his owne brother. And he himselfe made the funerall orations for them both. But so as in yielding unto them their due commendations, he went himselfe away with the greater part. And not unmindefull of that rule which he had learned in the beginning of the Consullship, namely to win againe the harts & love of the Commons, he diuided the cure of his hurt and wounded souldiours among the Senators. With most of them the Fabij were charged, and of none were they better tended and looked unto, than of them. Whereupon the Fabij now waxed popular, and that, for no other policie and intent, but onely to do the common-wealth good: and therefore with the favour and good will of the commons, as well as of the Nobles, Cæso Fabius was created Consull, with T. Virginiius. Whose principall care above all was this, even before war, before musters, before all things els, that seeing now in some measure, there was good hope of concord begun already, and hearts of the Commons might be perfectly linked and united together with the Nobles, and that, with all speed possible. In the beginning therefore of this year, before that any Tribune of the Commons should prefer the law Agraria, he thought good and gave his advice, that the Nobles should prevent all, & go in hand first themselves to perform their part, and shew their bounty: namely in parting the lands gotten by conquest, and freely bestowing the same as equally

As might be, among the Commons. For it was meete & requisite that they should be possessed thereof, whose sweat of brows, nay, whose blood had paid for the purchase. But the Senators could not heare of that care, but misliked of the motion: yea, and some of them complained & said, that the lively spirit, & courageous disposition of Cæso, which sometimes he had, was now by reason of excessive glorie, grown to be toyish & full of vanities. And there an end of civile factions for a time.

But the Latines were much troubled with the reises and rodes of the Aequians. Thither was Cæso with an armie sent, who invaded and overran the verie cuntry of the Aequians, forraying and spoyling as he went. The Aequians thereupon retired, and put themselves into their townes, and kept close within the walles, whereby there was no memorable field fought. But at their enemies the Veientians hand, they received an overthrow, and that through the rashnesse of the other Consull: and had not Cæso Fabius come to the rescue in good time, the whole armie had bene utterly lost. From that time there was neither war nor peace with the Veientians: but their dealing was much what after the manner of robbing. For when the Romanes legions were abroad, they would leave the field, & take to their cities: when they perceived the legions were remooved and gone, they would make excursions and waste the cuntry. Thus plaid they mockholiday, and dalled with them, shifting off war with quietnesse, and quietnes againe with war, by turnes. So as, the Romanes could neither all wholly rest carelesse and secure for them, nor yet go through stich, and make an end once for all with them. Besides, other wars were either presently at hand, to wit, from the Aequians and the Volscians, who could no longer sit still, than untill their fresh grieffe, and paine of the last defeate was overpast; or else the Sabines, never other but enemies, yea and all Hetruria, were like shortly to rise and take armes. But the Veientian a continuall enemy, rather than dangerous, provoked them to anger with reprochfull taunts, oftener than with any great perill or hurt. And yet as little as it was, it might no time be neglected, nor gave them leave to be employed in the meanwhile, otherwhere. Then came the whole house and kindred of the Fabij unto the Senat, and in the name of them all spake the Consull in this wise: My Lords of the Senate, the Veientian warre had neede rather of a resident garrison, as ye know well enough, to keepe the frontiers, than great forces for expedition. As for you, see ye to other warres. Let the Fabij alone to deale as private enemies with the Veientians. We dare undertake and warrant, that the State of Rome shall receive no dishonour nor danger there. We are fully minded and resolved at our owne proper cost and charges, to maintaine and mannage that war, as appropriate and peculiar to our name and familie: the citie shall be charged neither with men nor money there. Great thanks were given them for this their forwardnesse. The Consull being come out of the Senat house, was attended home with the whole generation of the Fabij who stood at the porch of the Counsell Court, expecting the Senates decree. And being commanded to be readie in armour well appointed the next day, and to give attendance at the Consuls doore, they departed from thence home to their owne houses. The bruit hereof spread all over the citie. All men extoll the Fabij up to the skie, saying, That one familie had taken upon them the whole burden of the citie. The Veientian war now, is become (say they) a private charge, and requireth the power and force onely that private persons could make. O that there were two such families more in Rome of that stomacke and valor: that one of them might take the Volscians in hand, and another the Aequians. Surely all the nations bordering hereabout might soone be subdued, and the people of Rome sit still the while and rest in peace. The day following, the Fabij armed themselves, mounted on horseback, and repaired to the Rendex-vous aforesaid, as they were commaunded. Then came the Consull forth, clad in a rich cote of armes, and standing in his porch, beheld his whole blood and lineage armed and marshalled in order, and being received in the mids of them, caused the guidon and Cornets to be advanced. Never marched there along the citie, an armie either lesse in number, or more renowned for their fame and the admiration of men. Three hundred men of armes they were and fixe, all nobly descended, of one stocke, of one race and name all. And of all them there was not one, that a sage and prudent Senate would have refused at any time as insufficient, to be a leader and commaunder in the field. Thus furnished with the force and strength that one onelie familie could make, they advanced forward, threatening and menacing the ruine and destruction of the Veientians. There followed a number and multitude of citizens: one private companie by themselves of kinsfolke, allies, friends, and feres, casting in their mindes no meane matters, neither of hope nor feare, but all exceeding measure and surpassing: another, of the common people, mooved with a carefull regard, and astonied againe in a favourable applause and admiration of their enterprife, crying with one voice, G Hold on right valiant knights, On forth a Gods name in happie houre; God graunt luckie speed, answerable to your magnanimous attempts and designements: and looke for, at our hands from henceforth, Confullshps, triumphs, all rewards and honorable dignities whatsoever.

And all the way as they passed along the Capitoll, the castle, & other temples, they besought the gods, as many as were presented to their eie, as many as they could conceive in their minds, to vouchsafe that Squadron to be attended upon with good successe and fortunate felicitie, and soone to returne home againe in safetie, to their native countrie and loving parents. But, alas the while, in vaine were all these praiers made. Then set they forward on their journey, leaving Ianus church on the right hand, taking the ungracious and unluckie way, from the gate Carmentaris, untill at length they came to the river Cremera*. That was thought a convenient place to forti- H fie in, and there to plant a garrison. After this were L. Aemilius and C. Servilius made Consuls.
And so long as they adventured no farther than forraying the countrey, the Fabij were good ynough, not onely to defend their hold and fort; but all the frontier parts and marches where the Tuscane territorie adjoyneth to the Romane, they so scoured and traversed, betwene the one confine & the other, that they kept all their owne in safetie, and mightily endamaged the enemies. Then surceased they a while, but it was not long, from waisting and spoiling. By which time both the Veientians had gathered a power out of Hetruria, and assaulted the fort of Cremera, and also the Romane legions, under the conduct of the Consull L. Aemilius, encountered the Tuscans in open field. And yet the Veientians had hardly time ynough to put themselves in order of battell: so suddainly at the very first busking, while the files were entering into array under their colours in the vauntgard, and the succours and supplies a placing and dispo- I sing in the rereward, a corner of Romane horse, charged them so hotely on the flankes, that un-neath had they roome and space, either to begin fight, or to keepe their standing sure. Thus were they discomfited, and chased backe as farre as Saxa rubra, i. Red rockes, (for there they were encamped) where they humbly craved peace. Which when they had obtained (see their inbred inconstancie so naturally engrafted) they were wearie of it, and repented thereof, before the Ro-mane garrison could be withdrawn from Cremera. And so the Fabij once againe skirmished with the Veientian nation, without preparation of greater warre. Neither made they inrodes only, and suddaine violent incursions into the territories, but sundrie times they encountred with banners displayed, and joined battell in plaine field. And that one house and kindred of the Ro- K mane people, carried oftentimes the victorie away, from that most mightie and rich citie (in those daies) or all the Tuscans. This, tooke the Veientians at the first, for a foule disgrace and indignitie. But afterwards they devised to lay traines, as occasion should serve, & entrap their fierce and hardie enemy: and well apaid they were and rejoiced, that the Fabij upon the good successe that still followed them, were become more bold and venturous. And therefore diverse times when the Romanes were abroad a boothalling, they would drive cattell in their way, but yet so, as they might seeme to light upon them by chance. The rusticall pezants made shew as if they fled out of the countrey, and left the fields wast: yea and the companies of souldiours sent out to restrain and stay their spoiling, made semblant of running away, pretending oftener they were afraid, than they had cause in deed. So as now the Fabij by this time, set so light by their enemies, and thought so well of themselves, that they beleaved verily their power was invincible, and might not be withstood in any ground, or at any time whatsoever. This conceit & hope of theirs set them so aslope, and made them so bold, that espying upon a time cattell, farre from Cremera, (for there was a large plaine betwene) although here and there they might descrie armed souldiours of their enemies, yet from their fort they ran downe, with bridle in their horse necke.
And when unadvisedly without foresight, they were past the ambush, which was laid covertly about the very way that they were to passe, and were stragling here and there disorderly, driving the cattell away, which gadded in and out, as their manner is when they be scared and affrighted, then suddainly start the enemies all at once out of the ambushment: so as, both before and behind, and on everie side they were beset and environned with enemies. At the first the very howling and outcrie they made round about, terrified them: afterwards flew their shot from all sides.
And as the Tuscans gathered themselves together, the Fabij were soone hemmed within a round battaillon of enemies, standing armed thicke and close one to another: and the needer the enemies approached about them, in so much lesse roome were they enforced also to cast themselves into a ring. Which, considering their arraies were thrust so thicke together in so

A so straight a compassse, made their small number appeare the lesse, and the multitude of the Tuscans to carrie a greater shew. Then, forbearing to fight as they first intended, on everie hand alike and with all at once, they made head to one onely place. Thereto they ende-vour with might and maine, bodie and armour; and with a pointed battaile wedgewise pierced through and made themselves passage. And they tooke the way that led to a little hill, rising up with an easie ascent. From whence at first, they made resistance only and kept their ground: but soone after, when by reason of the vantage of the hill, they had some time to breath themselves, and to take heart againe after so great a fright, they forced the enemies also to give backe that were mounting up the hill. And as few in number as they were, yet by the benefit of the ground, they had gotten the better, if the Veientians had not set a compassse about the hill side, and gained the verie top and pitch thereof. Thus became the enemy againe to have the upper hand. And so were the Fabij slaine everie man, and not one of them escaped, yea and their Fort overthrowne and rased. Three hundred and six there were that died as all writers doe agree. One onelic of the name was left behind at home, well neere 14 years of age, for to renew and increase as out of a stocke, the name of the Fabij; and to prove in time to come, the greatest prop and pillar that the people of Rome should have, in their dangers and extremities many a time both at home and abroad.

But ere this heavey losse and overthrow happened, C. Horatius and T. Menenius were Consuls. Menenius was sent forthwith against the Tuscans, puffed now up with pride for this their victorie: with whom then also, he fought unfortunately and sped but ill. For the enemies surprised C and got the Ianiculum, and the citie had surely bene besieged, considering that besides warre they were greatlie distressed for want of victuals, (for the Tuscans were passed over the Tyber) but that Horatius the Consull was called home from the Volscians. And so neere approached the enemies in this warre, and preassed to the veriewals that first there was a skirmish on even hand at the temple of * Spes: and another againe at the gate Collina. Where, albeit the Romanes * Ho. 2. got but verie small ods of the enemy, yet did that conflict upon a little recoverie of wonted courage, prepare the souldiors to better service in the battailes ensuing.

Now were A. Virginus and Sp. Servilius created Consuls. The Veientians after this late dif-feature, came no more into the field, yet they robbed and wasted still. And from the Ianiculum as from a fortresse and place of safe retreat, they would make excursions out into the territorie of Rome all about, and neither cattell nor countrey people could any where be in safetie for them.
D But afterwards, they were overtaken themselves in the same wile that they had caught the Fabij with. For as they followed after certaine cattell, which were driven forth here and there of purpose to draw and traine them abroad, they were plunged themselves headlong into an Amboiscado laid for them. And the more they were, the greater was their slaughter. Upon this foile, their cruell and fell anger, gave the occasion and ouverture of a greater overthrow. For having crossed the Tyber in the night season, they gave the attempt to make an assault upon the campe of the Consull Servilius. But being discomfited, and many of them slaine, the rest retired themselves from thence, and with much a doe recovered the Ianicle. Streight after this, the Consull also passed over Tyber, and encampeth himselfe stronglie hard under the Ianiculum. The mor-E row morning by sunne rising, (so venturous he was by reason of his fortunate fight the day before, and more for the scarcetie of corne and victuals, which drave him to take, he cared not how rash and dangerous courses, so they tended to more quicke and speedie expedition) full fond-lic he advanced forward and marched up the steepe hill of the Ianicle, and charged the enemies hold: but being set backe himselfe from thence more shamefullie, than he had the day before repelled the enemies; yet by occasion that his fellow Consull came in the while to reskue, he and his armie both were saved: and the Tuscans enclosed betwene both hostes, were forced to turne their backs both to one and the other, and were killed everie mothers sonne. Thus by a rash enterprife which (as good luke was) sped well, the Veientian warre came to an end. The citie then, as it enjoyed peace, so it came againe to be better stored of corne and victuall: both F for that there was some graine brought out of Campania, and also because the old store that was hoorded up came abroad, by reason that no man now stood in feare of dearth to ensue, Afterwards upon plentie and ease, they began to be busie againe, and their heads to worke, seeking to broach old troubles at home, since they had none to occupie them abroad. The Tribunes they fell to sollicite and infect the Commons, with their venome and poison, the law Agraria: inciting them against the Nobles that gainesaid it: not in generall tearmes onely, but

but also by touching particular persons. For, Q. Cincinnatus and T. Genutius, who were for the law Agraria, framed an inditement, and sued T. Menenius. And this was laid to his charge, to wit, the losse of the fort and garrison at Cremera: for that, he being Consull lay encamped not far from thence. But of this danger he soone stopped the course, both because the Nobles laboured and tooke his part, no lesse than they had done afore for Coriolanus: and also the affection and fauour that men bare to his father Agrippa, was not worne out, and cleane forgot. The Tribunes used moderation therefore in the penaltie, for having commensed a capitall action against him, and convicted him thereof, they set a fine on his head of *2000 Asses. Howbeit this cost him his life: for he grew, men say, into such a melancholike fit for shame of this disgrace, that he fel ther-upon from greefe of heart unto a pining sicknesse, which followed him to his dying day. Then, was there another accused and brought into trouble, to wit, Sp. Servilius, so soone as he was out of his Consullship, at what time as C. Nautius and P. Valerius were Consuls. In the beginning of whose year the Tribunes L. Cadius and T. Statius, called him straightwaies to his answer. Who sustained the violence of the Tribunes, not as Menenius did, by his owne intreatie and the prayers of the Nobles, but bare himselfe confidently upon his owne innocencie, and the good grace wherein he stood. Blamed he was likewise and charged, for the battell with the Tuscans at Laniculum. But being a man of an hot spirit and stout courage, as he caried himselfe before in the publicke danger, so now in his owne private perill, by refusing in a bold and stout speech that he made, not onely the Tribunes, but also the Communalitie, and casting in their teeth and reprooving them, for the condemnation and death of T. Menenius, by whose fathers meanes the Commons being in times past restored, had obtained first those very Magistrates and lawes, whereby at this day they exercise such rigour: he went through all his troubles, and with much boldnesse avoided the present jeopardie he stood in. The testimonie of his colleague Virginus, stood him in great stead, who produced forth as a witness, made him partener with himselfe, in all his worthe acts. But that processe of judgement which passed against Menenius (so altered were they now, and repented therefore) did him much more good, and stricke it dead sure.

When this broile and contention was ended at home, the Veientians warre began abroad; to whom the Sabines also had joined their power. Whereupon, the Consul P. Valerius, with the aid of the Latines and Hernikes, was sent out with an armie to Veij: & incontinently he fet upon the tents of the Sabines, as they lay encamped under the wals of their confederats, and put such a terror amongst them, that whiles they ran forth scattering by bands and companies, some at one gate, some at another, to repell the violent assault of the enemies, it happened that the gate which he first advanced his ensignes against, was woen. And within the trench, small fight there was, but more manslaughter. The tumult & noise hereof was heard from out of the campe into the citie. And the Veientians in great feare ran hastily to their weapons, as if Veij had been surprised. Some make speed to succour the Sabines: others do what they can to assaile the Romans, who were wholly busied about the pillage of the campe. For a prettie while they were put to some trouble, disordered, and withdrawne from their purpose: but afterwards, they themselves advanced their banners, & made head against the one side and the other. The horsemen withall, sent in by the Cossibroke the Tuscans array, & put them to flight. And thus in one houre two armies were defeated, two most puissant nations, & neere neighbors to the Romans, vanquished.

Sabines and Ventians vanquished.

While these exploits were performed about Veij, the Volscians and Equians, had encamped themselves in the countrey of Latium, and harried the marches thereof. Whom the Latins of themselves, with the helpe onely of the Hernikes, and without any leader or aid at all from the Romans, forced to abandon their tents: and besides the recoverie of their own goods again, atcheeved a great and rich bootie. Notwithstanding all this, the Consull Nautius was sent from Rome against the Volscians. They were not well pleased, I beleeve, with the manner of it, that their allies should wage war at all, with their owne power and direction, without the armie & conduct of the Romanes. Helpared not to worke all the mischeefe he could, all abuse and spight possible against the Volscians: yet could not they be brought to fight a set field. Then succeeded L. Furius, and C. Manlius, Consuls. To Manlius fell the charge of the Veientian province. Howbeit, war there was none at all. But at their owne sute, a truce was graunted unto them of fortie yeares. And they were enjoined to find corn and souldiours pay. Peace was not so soon procured abroad, but presently ensued discord at home. For at the intigation of the Tribunes, by occasion of the law Agraria, the Commons were set amadding. But the Consuls skared neither with the condemnation of Menenius, nor yet with the perill wherein Servilius stood, resisted all they could.

And

A And when the Consuls were once out of their office, Genutius a Tribune laid hold upon them, and arrested them: & L. Aemilius with Opiter Virginus enter their Consullship. In some Annales or yearely records I find Vopiscus Iulius Consull in steed of Virginus. But in this yeare, whoeuer then were Consuls, Furius & Manlius being indited before the people, went about araied in vile apparrell and mournfull weed to the younger sort of Senators, as well as to the Commons, perswading, advising, and warning them, to forbeare and refuse all dignities and offices of state, yea, and al charge of common-weale. And as for the Consuls rods borne afore them, their put-fled robes with purple, and chaire of estate, they should esteeme no otherwise of them, than of the pageants carried in a funerall pompe. And that with these gorgeous ornaments and en-signes, they were but delisted to death: much like to beasts adorned with sacred white ribbands and labels, appointed to sacrifice. But if the sweetenes of a Consullship were such, let them consider now withall, and perswade themselves, that it is become captivate and overswaied with the power of the Tribunes: and that the Consull, as if he were the Tribunes sergeant, must do all at his beck & command. For if he quetched never so little, if he seemed to regard the Senatours, or make account of any thing else in the whole State but of the communalitie, let him set before his eies the exile of Cn. Martius, the judgement & death of Menenius. The Nobles incen-ced with these speeches, from thenceforth began to consult and confer together, not openly and in publicke counsell, but privately, and apart from the privitie of many. And when they were resolved once upon this point, that those accused parties now in trouble, should be enlarged one way or other, by hooke or crook: then the cruellest advise, & hardest course that could be deliuc-C red, best pleased them: & for to put in execution the most audacious designements whatsoeuer, there wanted not one or other to give counsell. Well, the law day of triall came, and when as the Commons gave attendance devoutly in the Forum, in great expectations of the sequel & issue, they began at first to marvel much, that the Tribun Genutius came not down in place: & suspecting somewhat because of his long tarrying & delay, they imagined that he durst not for the great men and chiefe magistrats of the citie: & so they complained, that the common cause was for-lorne & betrayed. At the last, they that kept about the doore & porch of the Tribune his house, brought word that he was found at home stark dead. Which news being once noised through the assemblie, mark how an armie is disparkled & scattered, when their general is slain, even so in al the world, the Commons sunke aside every one, some one way, some another. But above all o-thers, the Tribunes were in bodily feare, being thus by their fellow taught, how little help or none at all, their sacred and redoubted lawes afforded. The nobles could not dissemble this their joy, nor use it with moderation, but shewed it excessively: and so little repented any one of them of the fact committed, that they avowed it and tooke it upon them, and would not seeme culpable in the action; but gaue it out in plaine termes, that the Tribunes by foule means were to be tamed, and their wings to be clipped in a mischiefe. Vpon this their victorie, so shamefull a precedent in time to come, there went out an edict for the publishing of a muster: and whiles the Tribunes were in this feare daunted, the Consuls without any contradiction, went through with it cleare. But then, were the Commons much more offended at their Tribunes silence and sitting still, than at the Consuls rule & imperious government: saying, Farewell freedome now, E farewell liberties and all: now is the old world come againe, and the Tribunes authoritie is both dead and buried together with Genutius. Now they were to go in hand and bethinke themselves of some other course, how they might withstand the Senatours proceedings: and seeing they were destitute of all other helpe to relie themselves upon, the onely way was for the Commons to trust to themselves, & stand upon their own guard. Whereas therefore, there gave atten-dance upon the Consuls 24. Lictors or Vergers, commoners all and no better, none more con-temptible and base minded, if they met with those that would set them at naught: they might thank themselves onely, & their own timorous conceits & imaginations, that such things were so dread & terrible. Thus having animated & provoked one another with these speeches: there wasa Sergeant sent from the Consuls to one Volero Publilius a commoner, who because he had ben a leader in the field of certain bands, pleaded his immunitie for being a common souldier againe. Volero calleth for helpe to the Tribunes: but there being no man to rescue him, the Consuls commaunded the man to be stript out of his cloths, & the rods to be made readie for to scourge him. Then quoth Volero, I appeale vnto the people, seeing the Tribunes had rather have a citizen and freeman of Rome beaten with rods in their pretence, than be murdered themselves by you in their beddes. But the more fiercely he cryed on still, the more cruelle fell the the Licitor to cut and skice his apparell for to uncase him. Then Volero being himselfe the stronger man, and assisted withall by some whome he called unto him, thrust the Sergeant from him: and where he perceived the mainest outcrie and loudest noise of his adherents, that fumed and chafed in his behalfe, thither retired he, to shroud himselfe among the thickest, crying: I appeale and beseech the Commons of their protection and succour. Helpe citizens, helpe fellowsouldiours. Never stay and waite for the Tribunes, untill they come, who have themselves neede of your assistance. Hereat folke were raised & gathered together, and addressed themselves as to a Battaille. A foule peece of worke was toward, full of exceeding danger, & like it was, that no man would have had regard either of common law or private honestie. When the Consuls in this so great a broile and storme of outrage came in, to prevent further mischief, they knew soone by experience how slenderly guarded against danger, the majestie of Rulers is, where force is wanting. For their Licitors were beaten, misused, and ill intreated, their rods broken all a peece, themselves driven out of the Common place, and forced to take the Senate house, doubting how farre forth Volero would proceede in the traine of his victorie. But when the riot was well appeased, they assembled the Senatours together, and complained there of their injuries received, the violence of the Commons, & the audacious presumption of Volero. After many opinions and sharpe censures delivered among them, the Ancients and Elders prevailed at length, who thought it not good to set the anger of the Nobles against the head-strong rashnes of the Commons. And the Commons so highly favoured and embraced Volero, that in their next election, they made him their Tribune for that yeare, wherein L. Pinarius and P. Furius were Consuls. Who contrarie to all mens expectation, that thought verily he would have exercised his tribuneship in molesting and vexing the Consuls of the former yeare, preferred the public cause before his owne private greivance, and gave nor the Consuls so much as one foule word. Onely he preferred a law unto the people, That the magistrats of the Comminaltie might be created in a ward-Leete, or assembly of the Tribes & wards. Thus under a title, which at the first sight seemed nothing hainous, passed a matter of no smal consequence, but such as abridged the Nobles of al power & authoritie, to create Tribunes whom they would, by the suffrages and voyces of their vassales and favorites. But when the Senatours resisted with all their might, the going forward of this Act most pleasing & plaussible to the Commons, and yet none might be found of the brotherhood of Tribunes, that by the authoritie either of Consuls or of Senatours could be brought to trumpe in his way by their negative voyce, which was indeede, the onely meanes to crosse it: the businesse, notwithstanding in itselfe so weightie to weeld, and so hard to be compassed, held out with much debating, the yeare through. The Commons then made Volero Tribune againe. The Senatours on the other side, suppling the matter would now come to a finall trial once for all, created for their Consull Ap. Claudius, the sonne of Appius: who even for the old contentions maintained by his father, was both hated of the Commons, and also hated them againe: and hee had for his compaign in government T. Quintius. At the verie beginning, no matter was treated of before that law. But as Volero was the first deviser and brocher of it, so his fellow Leclorius was the more earnest and hore maintainer thereof, as he came more fresh unto it. The stouter he was besides, by reason of his great militarie glorie, for that in those daies there was not a taller man of hands, nor more active than he. Now, when as Volero went straight to the substance of the law in hand, without any circumstance of words, and forbore to inveigh against the Consuls person, Leclorius beganne his speech with chalenging Appius and his house, as most proude, and cruelly affected to the Comminaltie of Rome: avouching earnestly, that the Nobles had made, not a Consull, but a butcherly tormentor, to afflict and mangle the Commons: but being a rough hewen souldiour, and not used to make Orations, his tongue could not frame to expresse his minde as freely as he would: And so his utterance failing him: Since that (quoth hee) O Quirites, I cannot so readilie deliver that in my speech, as I can make that good in deede which I have spoken: Be you heere to morrow, and in this verie place I will either get this law enacted, or I will lie in the dust and die for it before you all. The next day the Tribunes were gotten into the Temple or Hall first. The Consuls & Nobilitie abode still in the assemblee of the people, for to hinder the passing of the Lawe. Then commaunded Leclorius all the rest to avoid and depart, but those onely, that were to give their voyces. The yong Gentlemen of the Nobilitie stood still, and gave no place to the Tribunes officer. Then willed Leclorius some of them to be attached. But the Consull Appius replied again, That a Tribune had authoritie over none but Commoners: for as much as he, was a Magistrat,

A not of the people, but of the Commons. Neither could himselfe, of his absolute power (Consull though he was) observing the custome of his ancestors, command any man to avoid: for that the usual form of words ran thus, May it please you my maisters, O Quirites, if you thinke good, to depart. Soone was hee able, thus laying the law unto him, by way of scorne and contempt, to outface Leclorius, and put him downe. Whereupon the Tribune chafed, and set into an heat, sendeth an officer to the Consull: the Consull likewise, a Licitor to the Tribune, crying eftsoones aloud, that he was but a privar person without command, without magistracie. And doubtlesse the Tribune had been hardly used, but that both the whole assemblee rose up in a rage, and tooke part with the Tribune against the Consull: and also there was a concourse of the multitude, raised out of all parts of the citie into the common hall. Appius notwithstanding stood stiffely to it still, and abid the brunt of this tempestuous storme: neither had this broile staied without some bloodshed, in case Quintius the other Consull, had not set some of the Aldermen that had been Consuls, to get his brother Consull by force (if otherwise it might not bee) out of the hall, whiles himselfe was in hand, one while with the Commons, to appease their furie, by way of intreatie and with faire words, otherwhiles besought the Tribunes to breake up the assemblee, persuading with them to take more leisure in this their heat and anger: for that time and space would abridge nothing of their power, but would joine counsell and advise therto: concluding withall, that both Nobles should be ruled by the people, and the Consull ordered by the Nobles. Hardly and with much ado were the Commons quiered by Quintius, but farre more trouble had the Nobles to still the other Consull. At the length, when the assemblee of the people was dismissed, the Consuls called the Senat together. Where after much varietie of opinions, proceeding from feare and anger, according as the one or the other swaied among them: looke how much longer time they had to reclaime their mind from violent courses, and sagely with deliberation to consider of the matter: so much the more their hearts went against all contention, and farther strife: insomuch, as they yielded Quintius heartie thankes, that by his travaile betwene parties, the discord was well alliaied. And to Appius they were petitioners, that he would bee content, that the majestie of the Consull might bee no greater than would stand with the unitie and concord of the citizens. For whiles the Tribunes for their part would needes have all, and the Consuls on the other side draw all to them: betwene this plucking and haling, there was no strength left in the midst: and to conclude, the Commonweale was rent, tome, and dismembred betwene the rulers thereof: who strove rather for the managing and rule, than for the safetie and preservation of the State. Against whom Appius replied with a solemne protestation before God and man, and said, That the weale publicke was abandoned, forlorne, and betrayed by nothing els but foolish feare: that the Senate wanted not a Consull, but the Consull wanted Senatours: who now yielded to harder conditions, than they had before time in mount Sacer. Howbeit overweighed at length by the and generall consent and accord of all the Nobles, he was content: and so the law passed quietly, was by roiall consent authorised. Then and never before, were the Tribunes created in a congregation of the tribes, and by their voyces. Piso writeth, that there were three more made to the other, as if there had been but twaine before: and he nameth also the Tribunes, to wit, Cn. Siccius, L. Numitorius, M. Duellius, Sp. Icilius, and L. Mucius. Then had the Volscians and Aequians, betwene the civile sedition of the Romanes, and the beginning of warre, harried and wasted the cuntry: that in case the Commons had made an insurrection, they might have retired to them, as to a sure place of receit and refuge. But when all was hushed, and matters compovinded between the Nobles and Commons, they removed their campe backward. Appius Claudius was sent against the Volscians: and to Quintius fell the province of the Aequians. The same rigorous severitie continued Appius still in warfare, that he used at home in the citie: but so much more freely, for that he was not curbed nor held in by the Tribunes. The Commons he hated, more than his father had done afore, seeing he was overwaied, and had taken the foile at their hands: and being the onely Consull, opposed against the Tribunes power, yet mangle his head, the law passed cleare away, which the former Consuls his predecessors, with lesse ado, nor with so great hope and expectation of the Nobilitie, had ever hindered and staied. This his ire and indignation, gave an edge to that fell stomacke of his by kind, for to plague and punish his souldiours with imperious and lordly command. But so set they were to spume againe and disobey, that by no forcible meanes they could bee tamed, doing all things that they did, litherly, slowly, rekelesly and stubbornly. Neither bashed they for thame, nor stood in awe for feare. If his will was they should march on a pace, they would for the nonce go faire and softlie: If he encouraged them in proper person to plie their busines, they would all of them slacke their former service, wherunto they were entred of themselves: whiles he was in place, they would hang downe their heads and looke on the ground, as he passed by they would secretly curse him in their hearts. So as, that invincible stomacke of his against all hatred of the Commons, would now and then grieve heereat. And when he saw that all the shrewdnes and rigour that he used was in vaine, and that now he could do no good with his soldiours, he fell to checking the captains and centurions, saying, They had spoiled and marred the armie, terming them Tribunes of the Commons, and otherwhiles in taunting wise nicknaming them Voleiros. All this geere were the Volscians ware of, and therefore were they more eager and forward, hoping that Appius should finde the Romane armie as froward and disobedient, as they had beene against Fabius. And to say truth, they were more crooked and unrulie with Appius than with Fabius a great deale. For they were not onelie unwilling to have the victorie as Fabius his armie was, but also desirous to loose the victorie and be overcome. Being brought forth and set in battaile array, they shamefullieooke their heeles and fled into their tents: and never made head and resistance, before they saw the Volscians with banners displaid, advancing against the munitions of their campe, and a foule carnage committed upon the taile of their rereward. Then were they driven perforce to fight for verie necessitie, that the enemy thus farre forth victour, might be kept from the mure and trench: and yet so, as it was verie apparant, that the soldiours passed for nothing else, but only to save the campe for being won: for some of them rejoiced at their own losse and defeature. Wherat, the stout stomacke of Appius was nothing daunted, nor his heart broken: but he minded to deale cruelly with them, and therupon summoned a generall assemblee. Then the Lieutenants, Marshals and Colonels, came running unto him, advertising him in no case to trie maistries, and to enforce his authoritie, The verie ground and strength wherof resteth whollie in the accord of obedient people: adding moreover, that the soldiours commonlie gave out, that they would not go to the assemblee: but rather they might be heard everie where, calling upon them aloud, to dislodge and remoove out of the territorie of the Volscians: moreover that the enemy now Maister of the field, was but a while since advanced to the gates and rampier, and well neere possessed of them: whereby, they were not onelie to suspect, but might evidentlie see before their eyes, some great matter toward of dangerous consequence. Wherupon at last he was overruled, and (for as much as his soldiours therby should gaine nothing but delay of their punishment) remitted the assemblee for that time: and after proclamation made, to set forward in their journey the next day, and to depart in the morning verie earlie, he caused the trumpet to sound the remoove, and to march away. The armie being gone out of campe, and readie to be set in order of a march at length, the Volscians who wer gotten up by the same sound of the trumpet, played upon the taile of the rereward: the noise wherof passed from thence to the vaward, and so disorderd the ensignes, so troubled the ranks by reason of that fright, that neither could the direction and commandement of the captaines be heard, nor the armie be brought into battaile array. No man minded any thing at all but to run away: and disorderlie in plumpes, they fled backe over the dead carcasses and armours that lay on heapes, and so escaped. And never stay they their sight, untill the enemy gave over the chase. At the last, the Consull having called his soldiours together that were run away so scattering, (for with all the speed that he made after to call them backe, he could not reclaime them) encamped without his enemies ground in a place of securitie. Then he called them all together to an assemblee, and inveighed bitterlie, and not without iust cause, against the whole armie, as having betrayed the discipline of warre, & forsaken their colours: asking everie one of them what was become of their banners? And what they had done with their weapons? And as many soldiours as were unarmed, as many ensignebearers as had not their ensignes, the Centurions also and those that received double allowance, and forooke their bands and companies, he caused to be scourged with rods and to loose their heads. The whole number besides, were by lot tithed, and everie tenth man as it fell out, executed. But contrariwise, in the expedition against the Aequians, the Consull and his soldiours, strove to exceed one another in courtesie and kindnesses. Quintus was by nature mild and debonaire, and the crueltie of his brother Consull, that never sped well, made him take more joy in that his gentle disposition. Whiles the Generall and his armie comforted thus together, the Aequians durst not confront them, but suffered their enemies to range all abroad and forray the country: so as, in no former wars gat they greater booties from thence: and all was bestowed among the soldiours. Over and besides these gratuities, they had their due praises and solempne

- A commendations, wherein soldiours take no lesse delight than in rewards and gifts. So, that armie returned home better affected to their Generall, and also to the Nobles for their Generals sake: reporting that the Senate had given to them a loving father, but to the other armie a lordly maister. This yeare thus spent with variable fortune abroad in war: with greivous discord as well at home as abroad, was above all most memorable and famous for the Tribe-Liet. A matter of more note, in respect of their victorie that entered into the action, than of consequence, in regard of commoditie that grew thereof. For the very Liet it selfe lost more credite by voiding the Nobles out of that assemblee, than either the Commons gat strength, or the Nobles did forgoe thereby. But more troublesome was the year following, whiles L. Valerius and T. Aemilius were Consuls, both for the variance of the three States about the law Agraria, and also for the arraignment of Appius Claudius. Whom, being a most bitter adversarie of that law, and a great maintainer and upholder of those that possessed & held the common lands, as if he had ben ever a third Consull, M. Duellius, and Cn. Siccius arrested & endited. Never before that day came to the bar, a person to be tried before the people, so odious unto the Commons: charged with so many wrongs done of his owne, so many of his fathers afore him, in regard whereof they were highly displeased and offended with him. The Nobles likewise had not lightly laboured so earnestly not strained themselves so much for any one, as for him. Who being the patron and protector of the Senate, the maintainer and upholder of their port and dignitie; a man ever opposed against all the troublesome broiles of Tribunes & Commons, was now delivered as a prey to the commons in their anger, and only for that he had overshot, & passed himselfe in heat of contention.
- C But of all the Senatours that ever were, Appius Claudius of himselfe alone was here, that cared not a rush, either for Tribune or Commoner, nor yet for his owne arraignment. No menacing threats of the Commons, no earnest praiers of the Senatours could once make him, I say not to change his apparrell, and in humble manner to seeke and crouch unto men for to bee good unto him: no nor so much, as when he came to answer for himselfe before the people, one whit to mollifie and let fall (as it were) that rough and sharpe kind of speech, that he was wont ordinarily to use. He kept the same sower countenance still, the very same frowardnesse and crabbednes of visage, the same spirit of boldnesse in his appologie and defence. Inso much, as many of the Commons were no lesse afraid of Appius standing prisoner, there arraigned at the barre, than they had ben of him, sitting as Consull in his yvorie chaire of estate. In pleading of his cause, he spake breefely & at once to the point, with the same accusatorie spirit, that he had ever used in all his pleas and actions. With his boldnes and resolute constancie, he so amased both Tribunes and Commons, that they themselves deferred the day of giving sentence, and suffered afterward the suite to hang and depend still undetermined. But not long after, even before the law day appointed was come, he sickened and died. Whose funerall praises when as the Tribunes went about to hinder, the Commons would not suffer, that the death of so worthie a man, should bee defrauded of the due honour and solempne obsequies, and gave audience as quietly and attentively to the commendation of the man now dead, as they did afore to his accusation while he was alive: and with a goodly traine attended his corpes to the grave.
- E The same yeare Valerius the Consull made a voiage with an armie against the Aequians, and seeing he could not traine the enemy forth to fight, he made a bravado to assaile the campe: but there fell such a terrible storme and tempest from heaven, with haile and thunderclaps, that hee was disappointed of his enterprize. And, that which made it more strange and wonderfull, hee had no sooner founded the retrait, but the weather proved so faire and calme againe, that hee made some scruple and matter of conscience, to give a second assault unto the trench, as if it had been defended by the speciall power and providence of God. So, all the heat of warre turned to the wasting onely of the countrey. The other Consull Aemilius warred with the Sabines. And even there also, because the enemies kept within their walled townes, the territories were spoiled: But afterwards, the Sabines raised with the firing, not onely of their villages and hamlets, but also of the good townes and burroughes, whereof in those partes there were many, and those well peopled, encountered the forraiers: and after a doubtfull skirmish, they departed asunder, and the morrow after raised their campe, & retired themselves backe into a place of more securitie: which the Consull taking for a sufficient argument and proove, that the enemies were defeated, left them so, and dislodged likewise, without any end of the warre.
- F During these warres, and whiles discord continued in the cite at home, were T. Numitius Priscus and A. Virginus created Consuls. Now seemed it that the Commons would no longer abide abide the deferring of the law Agraria. And as they were about to put it to a jumpe and to trie the utmost by extremitie, they took knowledge partlie by the smoke & flame of the villages on fire, and partly by the running away of the villagiers, that the Volscians were neere at hand. Which occurrent repressed and kept downe the sedition which was now come to ripenes, and readie to breake forth. For the Consuls forced by the Senate immediately to the war, by taking the serviceable youth with them out of the citie, reduced the rest of the Commons to more quietnesse. And the enemies verilie made no further attempt, but after they had given a false alarme and set the Romanes in a foolish feare, dismarched away as pedelic as they could. Then Numitius went to Antium against the Volscians, and Virginius against the Æquians: where having welner received a great losse & defeature by a train laid for him: such was the prowesse and manhood of the soldiours, that they recovered all againe, which by the negligence of the Consull had like to be lost. But better was the conduct and government of the armie against the Volscians. For there, at the first skirmish the enemies were disaraid, put to flight, and chased as far as to Antium, a citie (for that time) of right great puillance & importance. The Consull durst not assault it, but wan from the Antiates Cenon, another towne, but nothing so wealthy. Whiles the Æquians and Volscians thus amused the Romane armies and kept them occupied, the Sabines were come robbing and spoiling to the gates of the citie of Rome. But within few daies after, they themselves received more damage than they brought, by occasion that both Consuls with two armies were entred in great anger into their confines. In the end of the yeare some peace there was, but disquieted, as at all times before, with the variance betweene the Nobles and Commons. The Commons in a peevishe and angrie fit, would not be at the Election of the Consuls. So, by the Senatours onelic and their followers, there were elected Consuls, T. Quinius and Q. Servilius. The like yeare to the former these Consuls had, seditious and troublesome in the beginning: but afterwards upon forraine warre, quiet and still. For the Sabines with a running campe having passed over the plaines of Crustumium, and put all to fire and sword about the river Anio, were chased backe, well neere from the gate Collina and the wals: howbeit they drave away with them exceeding great booties both of people and cattel. Whom the Consull Servilius followed hard with a power readie to bid battaile, but could not overtake their maine armie in anie even ground meet to pitch a field in. Howbeit he harried and wasted the countrie all about, so as he left no corner cleere that felt not his fingers, and returned with purchase of many rich prizes of all sorts.

Likewise among the Volscians they sped wel & had a luckie hand by the good devoure both of captaine and souldier. First, they joined battaile upon a plaine, and fought with verie great slaughter, and exceeding much bloodshed on both sides. And the Romanes (who for their small number were more apt to feeble the losse) had lost ground and dismarched, if that the Consull by making a lie for a vantage, and crying that the enemies fled from the other wing, had not encouraged them and renewed the battel afresh. And so by giving a new charge, whiles they thought they had the better, they got the better in very deed. The Consull fearing again, by preasing too hard upon the armie, to enforce them to turne & make head, founded the retreat. Few daies passed between, wherein they rested quiet, as though there had been a secret truce agreed betweene them. In which mean space, a great sort of people from all parts of the Volscians and Æquians repaired to the camp, thinking verily, that if the Romanes were ware of them, they would depart in the night season. Whereupon, at the third watch they came to make an assault upon their campe. Quinius after he had quieted the tumult, which upon this suddaine alarme arose, and given commandement that the soldiours should keep themselves within their pavilions, brought forth a companie of Hernicks to guard the gates, and caused certaine cornetiers and trumpeters on horsebacke to wind and found before the trench and counterscarpe, and so to hold the enemy in suspense and expectation untill day light. The rest of the night, all was so quiet within the campe, that the Romanes had time enough and good opportunitie to take their repose and sleep. This shew of footmen in their harness, whom the Volscians imagined to be more than they were, and all Romanes: the neighing besides, and noise that the horses made by reason of their strange riders that they were not used unto, and the sound also of their trumpets and hornes that made them to set up their eares, and to stamp and fere outrageously, amused the enemies waiting ever when they would charge upon them. When it was day, the Romanes being in heart and fresh as having slept their fill, came forth and embattailed themselves, and at the first shooke, discomfited the Volscians, wearied with long standing and overwatched withall. And yet the enemies

A enemies rather gave ground and retired themselves, than seemed to be driven from their standings, because they had at their backs certaine hils, whereunto they might retire behind the Principia, and not breake their ranks, and so save themselves. The Consull seeing hee was come to a place of disadvantage, made a stand. The footmen hardly would be staied, calling and crying to the Consull to follow upon them seeing they were discomfited. The horsemen were more eager, riding all about the Consull, and with open mouth cried out, that they would advance before the ensignes. Whiles the Consull held off, in a manner what to do, for as he was assured of the valour of his souldiours, so hee finally trusted the ground; they all at once set up a shout, that they would set forward, come what would: and as they cried, so did they in good earnest. And pitching their javelins fast in the ground, that they might more nimble get up the steepe place, they tooke their full teefe, and ran up the hill. The Volscians having in their first brunt spent all their darts, and other shot which they had let flie, and made no spare, tooke up stones that lay under their feet, let drive at the Romanes as they clamb up, and so thicke and threefold they belowed them, that they annoied them sore, and beat them downe the hill. Thus the left wing of the Romanes was welneere overcharged, had not the Consull at the point, when as they were readie to recule, blamed them first for their rashnesse, and then for their cowardise, and made them for very shame to shake off all fear. First they stood to it stoutly, & kept their ground, and after, as their strength served them, considering the vantage of the place which the enemies had gotten, they adventured to set foot forward, and won ground with a fresh shout and outcrie. And taking their beire againe the second time, they straine all they can, and at length overcame the disadvantage of the place. Now when they were almost at the point to win the very pitch and ridge of the hill, the enemies turned backe. Whiles they ran on heapes in disaray, both they that fled, and they that followed, happened both at once in one companie into the enemies campe, which in that fright was won. The Volscians, as many of them as could escape, ran as fast as their legs would carie them to Antium. And to Antium likewise was the Roman armie conducted: and after a few daies siege, was surrendred upon no fresh & new force of assault, but for that presently upon their unfortunate conflict and losse of the campe, their harts were done, and utterly quailed.

THE THIRD BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS

Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the third Booke.

Editions about the lawes Agraria. The Capitoll taken and held by banished persons and slaves. They were slain, & recovered. A survey and Censment was taken twice. In the former there were found of Roman citizens 124214, besides orphan children, and such as had no children at all, as well men as women. In the other following there were 132419. Upon a great overthrow received in the war against the Æquians, L. Quintus Cincinnatus was made Dictator: & being in the country at his farme busie about his husbandrie, was sent for to the conduct of that war. He vanquished and subdued the enemies. The number of the Tribunes of the Commons, arose to ten, thirtie fixe yeares after their first institution. The lawes of Athens were set from thence by Embassadors, sent for that purpose: to the establishing and publishing whereof, there were ten personages elected in the roome of Consuls, which were called Decemvirs, without any other Magistrates: and this happened in the three hundred and second yeare after the foundation of Rome. And as the government of the State was translated from kings to Consuls: so was it now from the Consuls to the Decemvirs. They having proposed ten tables of lawes, and borne themselves modestly in that high dignitie, were therefore by the consent of the people, permitted to remaine still in office the second yeare. But after they had committed many insolent parts, they would not give over their roome of Magistracie, but held it still the third yeare: untill such time as their obstinate and intolerable rule came to an end, occasioned by the silitie lust of Appius Claudius: who being inamourved upon a virgine, suborned one to make claime unto her as his bondslave: whereupon her father Virginius was driven of necessitie to catch up a knife from a butchers stall next by, and to kill his daughter: as having no other meanes to save G her from the hands of him that purposed to abuse her bodie unlawfully. The Commons upon this foule example of filthie lecherie, made an insurrection, and tooke the mount Aventine for their hold, and compelled the Decemvirs to leave their place, and give over their government. Of whom Appius and one of his colleagues (which two had principally deserved punishment) were committed to prison, and there kept, the rest were driven into banishment. This booke containeth besides the victorious warres against the Sabines, Volscians, and Equians. And the unholiest arbitrement or award of the people of Rome, who being chosen Arbitrators betwene the Ardeates and the Aricines, awarded to themselves the land whereabout the strife and controversy was.

FTER the winning of Antium, T. Aemilius and Q. Fabius were created Consuls. This was that Fabius that onely remained alive of all the name that perished at Cremera. Now had Aemilius in his former Consulship persuaded to distribute certaine lands among the Commons. And therefore in this second likewise, both the favorers of the law Agroaria were in good hope of the foresaid law: and also the Tribunes supposing verelie that now by the helpe of a Consull, that might be brought about and obtained, which oftentimes had bene enterprised against the pleasure of the Consuls; tooke the matter in hand and gave the attempt: and withall, the Consull still continued in the same mind. But the great landed men and many of the Nobles, finding themselves grieved, and complaining that the chiefe and head magistrate of the citie busied himselfe with the Tribunes suits, & was by large giving away of other mens possessions, become popular and gracious with the people, turned the whole burthen and odious heaivy load of this action, from the Tribunes upon the Consull his head. And a cruell broile was toward, had not Fabius, by a device and pollicie to neither partie offensive, made an end of the matter with expedition. For whereas, there was certaine lands gotten by conquest from the Volscians the yeare afore, under the conduct of T. Quintius: There might (said he) a colonie be brought to Antium, a citie neere adjoyning, very commodious, and seated by the sea side: so should the Commons without any grudging or complaints of the possessors or landlords, be seized of land, and the citie rest in quiet and unitie. This opinion of his was accepted of all hands. And they created three especiall officers or Triumvirs for the division of the said lands, to wit, T. Quintius, Aul.
Virginius, and P. Furius. Then proclamation was made, That whosoever would hold any of the land, should give up their names in writing. But plentie, as the manner is, soone caused lothing: for there were so few that presented themselves, that to make up the full number of the inhabitants, they were faine to adjoine unto them certaine Volscians. The rest of the multitude had rather (as it seemed) to keepe a calling for land at Rome, than be possessed of land elsewhere.
The Equians craved peace of Q. Fabius, who was come against them with an armie: and they themselves by making a sodaine inrode into the territories of Latium, cancelled the same and made it void. But the yeare next following, Q. Servilius (for he was Consull with Sp. Posthumus) being sent against the Equians, kept a standing campe in the countrie about Latium. But by the reason of a contagious disease or a plague, that rained in his armie, they were of necessitie forced to keepe quiet within their tents. So their warre was differed unto the third yeare, when as Q. Fabius and T. Quintius were Consuls. And for as much as Q. Fabius, had upon his vi-ctorie before granted peace to the Equians, hee had an extraordinarie commission directed unto him for the rule of that province. Who being thither gone with full assured hope, that the verie fame of him, and noise of his armie, would quiet the Equians, sent Embassadors to the Counsell of that nation, with this message: Q. Fabius the Consull, saith, that as he carried before peace from the Equians unto Rome, so he bringeth now warre to the Equians from Rome; having now his sword in the verie same hand, which he gave unto them before in friend-lie manner unarmed. Whose trecherie it is and perjurie, that is the cause of this, the gods can witness now, and in some measure will revenge hereafter. Nevertheless, he for his part, however the case standeth, desireth that the Equians would yet bethinke themselves of their owne accord and repent, rather than stand to the extremitie and abide those calamities and mi-series that follow warres. If they would come in therefore and be sorie for that they have done, their submission should be received, and they taken into the safe protection of his clemencie, whereof already they had experience. But in case they persist stil in their disloyaltie, and take pleasure in being forsworne; be they well assured, that they should have the yre and wrath of the gods more than their enemies to fight against them. These words so little or nothing at all moved ved any men there, that the verie Embassadors had like to have bene verie hardlie used and evil entreated, yea & an armie withall was sent forth as farre as Algidum against the Romanes. When these tidings were brought to Rome, the indignitie of the thing and the shamefull maner thereof, rather than any fearful perill otherwise, raised the other Consull out of the citie. So two Consular or royall armies approched the enemy in order of battaile, readie to trie it out presently by the dint of sword. But the day being (as it fell out) welneere spent, there cried one aloud from out of the place where the enemy kept ward: This is to make a shew of war only (ye Romanes) and not to warre indeede: yee set your battailons in array against night forsooth, that now draweth hard on: we had need of more daiglhty wyis, for the businesse in hand, and to trie this quarrell. To morrow therefore at sun rising, see you come again into the field, ye shall have fighting feare not, your hands full. The souldiours nedled and gauled at these words, retired back into the campe untill the next day, thinking the night was long, that kept them from battaile: and so for that time they refreshed their bodies with tooode and sleepe. On the morrow so soone as it was day, the Ro-mane host being stirring somewhat more earlie, stood readie arranged in array: and at length the Equians likewise shewed themselves in field. A sharpe fight there was on both sides, by reason that both the Romane souldiours fought in anger and deadly hatred; and also the Equians upon prickt conscience, that bare them witness how they embarked themselves into this danger, and were out of all hope ever to be trusted againe, were forced to hazard all upon a cast, and venture the utmost. Yet were not the Equians able to endure long, the violent fight of the Romanes, but were discomfited and put to flight. And being returned within their owne Frontiers, the unrulie multitude for all this, were never the more inclined to peace, but reprooved and blamed their Captaines, That they put the triall of the issue to a later field, in which kind of fight the Romanes had singular skill, and surpassed them. As for the Equians, they were better at robbing, spoyling, and hurrying, in making reises and inrodes: and a better and safer kinde of service it was, here and there in sundrie places, to skirmish with forces divided, than reduce all into one grosse armie, & to pitch a field. Leaving therefore a guard to defend the camp, they went forth, and with such a tumult invaded the confines of Rome, that the verie terror thereof reached unto the citie. This stirre, especially comming so sodainely and unlooked for, made the Ro-manes feare the more. For who would ever have doubted and suspected, that their enemies so lately vanquished, and in manner besieged within their owne campe, could possibly thinke upon entering into the lands of others, and to drive booties. Besides, the rustical peazants came in at the gates, crying, and saying, That they were not pettie companies, & small handfuls of thieves and robbers, but (such was their foolish feare, augmenting and making everie thing greater) whole armies and legions of enemies were at hand, and marched apace with banners displayed full against the Citie. From their mouths, they that were next made report unto others, and as they heard newes from they knew not whom, so they set them abroad they cared not how, but ever in the carriage they added somewhat of their owne, and coined lies good store. Here was running, there was crying al arme, and generally such a confusion everie where, as if the ci-tie had bene quite lost. By good happe Quintius the Consull was returned from Algidum to Rome. That remedie cured all and staid the feare. When the tumult was appeased, he rebuked the people for fearing those enemies whome heretofore they had vanquished, and placed good guards over the gates. Then he assembled the Senat, and by the authoritie & assent of the Nobles, proclaimed Iustitium, or a generall cessation or vacation in all courts of law: and went himselfe forth in person with a power, to defend the marches, leaving Quintus Servilius Provost of the citie: but the enemy he found not in the territorie all about. The other Consull performed his affaires passing well: who having certaine intelligence, which way the enemies would come, set upon them laden with prey, and (by that meanes marching more heavilie in disorder) made it a deere bootie unto them, even as much as their lives were worth. For few of them escaped the Ambush, and all the pillage was recovered. So the returne of Quintius into the Citie, made an end of the publike Lawfeed, or above said vacation, which lasted but foure daies. Then was a Cense or Assesment set of mens goods, and a muster or view taken of the number of Citizens, together with a solemne purging of the people, called Lustrum, celebrat by Quintius. And there were numbered of citizens 124214 polles, over and above men and women that lived single, or had no children, and all orphans beside. And among the Aequians afterward nothing was done worth remembrance: for they betooke them to their strong townes, suffering their territorie and villages to be consumed with fire, and spoyled. Thus the Consull, after hee had divers times overturne the countrie of his enemies, with a cruell armie wasting and spoyling as he went, returned home to Rome with great honor and a huge bootie. Then were Coss. Aulus Posthumius Albus, and Sp. Furius. Some have written them Fusij, who indeede are rightly named Furij. Which I note, least any man should thinke they were sundrie men, whereas the varietie is onely in the name. No doubt there was, but that one of the Coss. would warre with the Aequians: and therefore the Aequians sought for aide of the Ecetrane Volscians. Which being gladly graunted and sent with speed, (such a perpetuall hatred bare these Cities alwaies against the Romanes) there was great preparation for warre in most forcible manner. The Hernikes having an inckling and knowledge thereof, certified the Romanes afore hand, that the Ecetrans were revolted and banded with the Aequians. The Colonie Antium likewise was had in jealousie, for that when the towne was lost, many people fled from thence to the Aequians, who all the time of the Aequian warre, served in the field, and proved the most hardie souldiours and fiercest of all others. And now when the Aequians were driven into their townes, that multitude being slipt away and retired to Antium, withdrew from the Romanes the allegiance of the Coloners and inhabitants there, who were already of their owne inclination unfound and not to be trusted. But before the matter was come to ripenesse, and they entred into any action, the Senate upon intelligence given that they intended onely, and were upon the poynt to revolt, gave the Coss. in charge to fend for the chiefe men and head persons of that colonie to Rome, and to enquire and learne of them in what tearmes Antium stood: who being come willingly inough, without any great intreatie, and convented by the Consuls before the Senate, made answer to their interrogatories in such maner, that they were sent away more suspected, than at their first comming: whereupon they resolved fully of warre. Spurius Furius one of the Coss. to whom that province by lot fell, having taken his voyage against the Aequians, found the enemy spoyling and wasting in the territorie of the Herniks: and being ignorant what number they were (for that in no one place they were all discovered together) he rashly joynd battaile, and hazarded his power, being in number and force inferior to the other. And at the first encounter he was driven backe, and retired into the campe: and yet was he not past all danger and in securitie there: for both the night following, and the next day after, the campe was so streightly beset, and so hotly assaulted, that he could not dispatch so much as a messenger from thence to Rome. The Herniks sent word both of the unfortunate fight, and also how the Consull and his armie were besieged. With which newes they so terrified the LL. of the Consull, that they granted Posthumius the other Consull the solemne commission, To SEE K

TO THE STATE, THAT IT SUSTAINED NO DANGER AND DAMAGE. The forme of which order and decree, hath bene alwaies accounted to signifie some great extremitie of the Commonwealth. And thought best it was, that the Consull himselfe in proper person, should abide at home to enroll in the muster booke, all those that were able to beare arms: that T. Quintius should be sent as Pro-consull or vice-consull, with a power of confederat Allies to raise the siege and rescue the campe: and for the furnishing of this armie, the Latines, the Herniks, and the Colonie Antium, were commaunded to send unto Quintius, Subitarie souldiers (for so they termed at that time, the aides and supplies taken up in haste and on a sodaine.) Many attempts were made, much skirmishing, & sundrie assaults for certain daies on each side were enterprised. For the enemies being more in number, assailed in divers places and sundrie waies to cut off and diminish the power of the Romanes, as not sufficient and able to make head at all turnes. For at one time they both made an assault upon the campe, and withall sent out certaine of their forces to wait the territorie of Rome, yea, and to give the venture upon the verie cittie, if they could espie any good oportunitie to offer it selfe. L. Valerius was left behind to defend the Cittie, and Posthumius the Consull was sent out to restraine and withstand the wasting of the marches. No poynt of care or trauaile on any hand was slaked, watch and ward both night and day was set in the Cittie, a good Corps de guard appointed afore the gates, and souldiers bestowed upon the walles: and (that which was needfull in so great an hurleburlie) for certain daies it was no Terme, or interdiction of Law was observed. In this meane while, Furius the Cos. who at the first had quietly endured the siege and made no resistance, suddenly and at unawares sallied out at the broad gate called Decumana, upon the enemies: and whereas he might have chased them, he made some stay of that, for feare lest on some other side, they would have given assault upon the campe. But Furius the Lieutenant (who also was the Consull his brother) engaged himselfe too farre, and upon a hot desire of pursuit and following the chase, neither sawe he his fellowes

A fellowes as they retired, ne yet the enemies as they came to charge him on the backe. Thus being shut out from all the rescue, after many assaies made (but all in vaine) to make way through vnto the campe, manfully fighting he was slaine. The Consull likewise hearing that his brother was environed all about with enemies, returned againe to fight; but as he ran more rashly than warily into the midst of the skirmish, hee was sore wounded, and being hardly and with much adoe saved by those that were about him, hee both disquieted and daunted the hearts of his owne men, and made his enemies more fierce, lustie, and courageous. Who were so animated and set on fire, both with the hurt of the Consull, and also with the death of his Lieutenant, that nothing afterwards could stand in their way: no force was able to slay them, but that they beat the Romanes againe into their campe: where they were besieged a fresh, being nowe both in hope, and also for strength worse than they were before. So that their maine State thus lying a bleeding, had vtterly perisht, but that T. Quintius with a supplie of strangers, namely, a power of Latines and Hernikes, came to the rescue in time: who charging the Aequians behind, whiles they were wholly busied in assailing the campe, shewing them within the Lieutenants head in a great braverie and pride, at the same instant caused a sallie out of the campe, by a signall that he gave them a far off, & so inclosed round about a great number of the enemies. Smal was the slaughter, but great was the flight & scattering of the Aequians in the territorie of Rome: upon whom (stragling here & there, and driving their booties afore them) Posthumius, who in divers convenient places had bestowed certaine companies and bands of souldiers, ran violentlie. And as they fled everie way in disaray, they lighted upon Quintius C as he with the hurt Consull returned with victorie. Then the Consull armie bravelie did their devoir, and had a goodly day of them; and was revenged both for their Consull wound, and also for the death of the lieutenant and the squadrons with him. Many losses and overthrowes were given and taken on each side for certaine daies. But in so ancient a matter as this was, hard it is for a man vpon his credit, to set downe precisely the certaine number, either how many fought, or how many were slaine. Howbeit Valerius Antias boldly reckoneth the exact numbers, namelic that there died of the Romanes in the Herniks countrie 5300: and of the Aequian robbers, who went up and downe spoyling and pilling in the territorie of Rome; there killed by A. Posthumius the Cos. 2400. The rest of the multitude, which laden with spoile fell into the hands of Quintius, were not so quit, nor escaped with the losse of so few mens lives: for of them the sword devoured 4000, and to account the number exactlie, 200 (quoth he) and 30 just. Then returned they on all hands to Rome, and the foresaid vacation or law-sterd ended. The skie was seene much on a light fire, and other strange wonders either appeared indeed, or presented to the fearfull people vaine apparitions, and fantastical illusions. How ever it was, for to avert the dangers by these prodigious and terrible tokens prefiged, there were proclaimed festivall holydaies for three daies together. During which time all the Churches were replenished with men and women, making supplications and praiers for the favour and mercie of the gods. The bands and squadrons of the Latines and Herniks, after great thanks given them by the Senate for their good service in this warre, were discharged and sent home. But the Antiate souldiers, 1000 in number, who after the battaile was fought came tardie, and too late for to succour, were dismissed in manner with ignominie and shame.

E Then was the great Liete or assemblie held, for the election of Magistrates: wherein L. Ebutius and P. Servilius were created Consuls: and on the * Calends of Sexilis (for on that day) began the year then, they entred their Consulship. A grievous & heavey time it was, and as it fortunied, a yeare of plague and great mortallitie, both in the citie and countrie, as well among brute beasts as men. And the receiving of the countrie peazants with their cattell into the citie, for feare of robbing and spoiling, encreased the contagiousnesse of the sicknesse so much the more. For, that confused medle of all sorts of beafts, both anioied and empoisoned the citizens with the uncouth and unusuall stinke, and also stifled with sultrie heat and overmuch watching the rusticall people, lying pestered together, and thrust up into close rowmes and straight lodgings. Then mutual recourse one to helpe and minister unto another, and the verie catching of the disease, set it all abroad. Thus whiles they had much ado to endure these present calamities, behold to mend the matter, all of a suddaine, the Hernicke Embassadors bring word, that the Aequians and Volscians having levied a power jointly together, were encamped within their limits: and from thence with a mightie armie wasted & harried their territorie. Now, besides that the small assemblie in the Senate house, was to these their allies an evident token

that the citie was sore visited with the pestilence, they received also an heave answer from them, namely, That the Herniks themselves together with the helpe of the Latines, should defend their owne: as for the citie of Rome, it was with the heave hand and visitation of the gods, dispeopled by the plague: but in case the sicknesse decreased in some measure and tooke up in any time, they would willingly aid their confederates, as they did the yeare before, and as they had done at all times besides. Thus departed these allies, and for their ill news they brought thither, they carried with them home again a worse answer and message, to wit, That they should by themselves sustaine that war alone which hardly they were able to support, if they had the power of the Romans to assist them. Long staid not the enemy in the Hernikes countrey, but went forward from thence into the territorie of Rome, desolate already (God wot) without the injurie of war, and little need there was of calamitie that waies where meeting with no man at all, no not so much as any one unarmed, & passing over all the countrey, disarmed not only of garrisons to resist, but also of people for husbandrie & tillage, at length they came to the third stone, within three miles of Rome, to the broad port high way, called Gabina, leading to Gabes. The Romane Cos. Ebutius, was now departed this life, and his brother Cos. Servilius, lay lingering on at the point of death, in small hope of recoverie. Most of the peeres and principall ancients were infected, and sick in bed, so was the greater part of the Nobles, & welneere all the serviceable men of war: so as they were not able to set forth an expedition or voyage abroad, as meet was in so great a tumult, no nor scarce to keep any ordinarie set guard at home for the defence of the citie. The Senators, such as age & sicknes would permit, tooke the charge in proper persons of watch and ward. The Ediles of the Commons went the round, and had the charge to see all well & in good order: so that upon them now rested the whole government of the state, and the majestie of the Consuls regiment. Thus when all was forlorne, no head to direct, no strength of man to execute; the Tutelar gods, protectors of the citie, and the good fortune alone that ever waited upon her, preserved the maine chance. This made the Volscians and Aequians to carrie with them a mind and intent, rather to deale by way of robbings & spoilings, than to deale in any hostile manner like professed warriors: for so small hope had they, or none at all, of winning the citie; so little heart, so much as to approach the wals, that even the very roofes of houses, which they desired a far off, & the sight of the tombs and graves so neer at hand, turned their minds clean, and daunted their courages. So as over all the campe they began to mutter with themselves, What they meant to spend time idlie, and sit still without preading, in a wast and desert countrey; within the mortalitie and putrifaction of aire and corruption, both of people and cattell; when as they might as well invade those parts that stood cleare and sound, and namely the rich, plentifull, and fat fields of Tusculum: and therewith suddainly at once they plucked up their ensignes, and by crosse waies passed through the Lavican countries, even to the mountains of Tusculum: and thither turned they the whole force and tempest of the war. In the meane season the Hernikes and Latines moved not with pitie and compassion onely, but also for very shame, in case they had neither withstood their common enemies, marching to Rome with a cruel armie, nor relieved their besieged friends; joined their powers together, and set forward to Rome: where not finding the enemies, and following the bruit that went of them, and tracing their fresh trackes and footing, they encountered them as they came downe from the hillie country of Tusculum, into the vale of Alba: Where they made no saving bargain of it, but fought to their losse, so as their fidelitie unto their allies, had but bad successe for that present. And in Rome there was no lesse mortalitie of citizens by the sicknes, than there were massacres abroad of their allies by the edge of the sword. For the other Consull, who alone survived hitherto, now died. There left this life also, other noble personages, M. Valerius, Titus Virginus, Augurs; and Ser. Sulpitius the Camio maximus. But among the base and common sort, the violence of the disease raged and spread, I know not how farre. The Senate now destitute of all helpe and comfort of man, moved the people to devotion, to their beads, and praiers unto the gods. And commandement was given to all men with their wives and children, to goe in profession, to poure out their supplications, & crave mercie at gods hands. Thus being by publike authoritie called forth to performe that which every man was forced unto by his owne proper calamities, they filled all the temples and chappels. The dames and ancient matrons, lying groveling and sweeping the church stores and pavement with their haire and tresses, hanging lole downe, humble besought pardon of the gods, and an end once of the pestilence. Whereupon, were it that they had obtained the mercie of God, or that the more dangerous and contagious season of the yeare, was now well overpast, their bodies by little and little,

having

A having escaped the daunger of disease, began to recover and waxe more healthie.

Then set they their mindes about the care of the Common-weale, and after certaine interregines determined or ended, P. Valerius Poplicola, the third day of his Interregie or Regencie for the time, createth Consuls L. Lucretius Tricipitinus, and T. Veturius Geminus, or Ventusius whether yee will: who * three daies before the Ides of Sextilis, began their Consulship. By which time the citie was growne so strong againe, that it was able not onely to maintaine a defensive warre, but also to enter the field and assaile others. When the Herniks therefore gave them advertisements that the enemies were passed over into their borders: they made no delay, but readily and willingly promised their aide; and levied two Consular armies: Veturius was sent against the Volscians, to beginne with them, and to waite within their owne countrey. Tricipitinus was opposed in the Frontiers of their confederates, to keepe them from invasion and wasting; and went no further forward than to the Hernikes. Veturius at his first encounter and confronting of his enemies, discomfited and put them to flight. But Tricipitinus while hee lay still encamped in the marches of the Hernikes, missed of the armie of the robbers: which was conducted over the mountaines of Preneeste, from whence they came downe into the champaigne, and spoiled the territories of Preneeste and Gabes: and from thence they fetched a compass about unto the mountaines of Tusculum. The Citie of Rome likewise was put in great feare, rather upon the sodaine occurrent of this alarme, than for any want of power to resist their violence. Quintus Fabius at that time was Prouost or President of the Citie, who put the youth in armour, disposed guards in places convenient, and made all safe and in good securitie. The enemies therefore who had raised a bootie out of the parts adjoyning, durst approach no neerer, but cast about with their armie and retired: and the further they went from their enemies citie, so much the more carelesse they were, untill they light upon the Cos. Lucretius, who by his espials and scouts, was afore that time acquainted what waies they would take, and was readie also to trie battaile. So with resolute and prepared hearts, they set upon them, that with the sodaine feare were amazed. And albeit they were in number fewer, yet they discomfited and put to flight a mightie multitude of them, and drave them within the hollow vallies, where because they had no readie way to get out, they kept them inclosed on everie side. In such sort, that the whole name and nation welneere of the Volscians, there utterly perished. In some Chronicles I find that there were 13470 slaine in the fight and chase, and 1250 taken prisoners alive, and 27 ensignes or banners brought away. It may well be that the number perhaps doth somewhat exceed the truth, yet a great slaughter certainly there was. The Consull having achieved this victorie, and gotten a mightie great prey, returned into the same standing campe againe. Then pitched both Consuls together, and the Volscians ioynly with the Aequians, rallied their forces thus decayed and weakened, into one place, and made one entire armie. This was the third field fought, in that one yeare, and by the same good fortune the Romanes won the victorie: and having vanquished the enemies, they were maisters also of the campe. Thus the citie of Rome recovered her selfe, and returned to her ancient good estate. But this happie successe in war, immediately stirred vp civile troubles at home. C. Terentillus Arsa, for that yeare a Tribune of the Commons, supposing in the absence of the Consuls, good opportunitie was offered to secon foote the Tribunes actions, and their proceedings: for certaine daies together gave not over before the Commons, to accuse the great pride and insolencie of the Nobles: but especially he inveighed against the Consuls regiment, as being too absolute, and in a free state intolerable. For in name only (quoth he) lesse odious and hatefull it is than that of the KK. but in fact in very deed, more grievous and cruell. For why? In steed of one lord, the citie hath received twaine, and those having authoritie beyond all measure, unlimited and infinite: who being themselves at their owne libertie and vnbrideled, turned the edge of all streight and dreadfull lawes, yea, and the rigor of all punishment, against the Commons. But least this their licentiousnesse should continue for ever, he was minded to preferre and publish a law, by vertue whereof there should be five men created, who should set downe certaine conditions, to limite and gage the authoritie of the Consuls: and looke what authoritie and comission the people graunted out over them, the same should the Consull exercise, and no more, and not rule of themselves, and vse their owne will and licentious lust in steede of law. This act being once published, and the Nobles fearing, least whiles the Consuls were away, they should be taken downe and yoked. Quintus Fabius President of the Citie, assembled the Senate, who so bitterly and sharply inveighed against the law and the law-giuer himselfe, that if both the Consuls themselves had stood about the Tribune of purpose to contradict and crosse his proceedings, there had been no threats nor terrible menaces left for them, to have thundred out. For he laid fore vnto his charge, that he had lien in waite, and now having spied the time to fit his purpose, had given the venture to assaile the C. VV. and the State. And in case the gods in their wrathfull displeasure had sent among them such a Tribune as hee the yeare before, together with warre and pestilence, there had ben no remedie then, but he must have had his way, and then they had bene all undone. For when the Consuls both were dead, and the cittie lay bedrid as it were, in a miserable confusion of all things, he would have made lawes then: indeede, to the utter abolishing of the Consuls authoritie out of the Commonwealth, and bene a ringleader to Volscians and Aequians both, for to have assaulted the cittie. For what might not hee have lawfully done by vertue of his place? If the Consuls had either proudly or cruelly proceeded against any one Cittizen, hee might have entered an Action against them, and convented them forsooth before those verie iudges, of whome peradventure some one had bene by them hardlie dealt withall. This would have bene the course and ende of it. And hee that thus did, should not cause the Consuls authoritie and rule, but the Tribunes power to become odious and intollerable: which having bene of late well quieted and reconciled unto the Nobles, began now afresh to come unto the old biace, and to be troublesome againe. Neither intreated hee him not to goe on still as he had begun. But ye my masters (qd. Fabius) that are the rest of the Tribunes, we would request you to consider well this one point especially: That this power you have, was brought in for the succour and releefe of everie particular person, and not to the generall prejudice and undoing of all. Againe, that ye are created Tribunes of the Commons, not enemies of the Nobles. A hevie and lamentable case it is to us, odious and hatefull unto you, and will breed you much ill will and displeasure, in case the C. VV. now forlorne, should thus be invaded & assailed. Yee shall see nothing of your owne right, I assure you, nay you shall avoid much milke and hatred of men, in case ye be in hand and deale with your brother Tribune, to put off this matter and deferre it wholly untill the Consuls comming. Why, the verie Aequians and Volscians themselves the last yeare, when both our Consuls were dead of the plague, pressed not hardlie upon us, to prosecute any proud & cruell war against us. So, the Tribunes communed and persuaded with Terentillus: and this his commended suit or action being adjourned in outward shew, but in verie truth let fall quite and disanulled, the Consuls forthwith were sent for home. Lucretius returned enriched with a right great bootie, but with far greater honor and renowne. Who at his verie first comming wan himselfe more glorie, by laying abroad in Mars field all the prizes, that everie man for three daies space might know his owne and have it away. All the rest, that had no owners to come forth and make claime, was sold in port-sale. By all mens consent, the Consull was thought worthy of triumph: howbeit that matter was put off, by reason that the Tribune had not yet done with his law: which was the thing that the Consull thought meet should be first regarded. The matter was debated and treated for certaine daies, both in the Senate and also before the people. At last the Tribune yielded to the majestic of the Consull, and gave it over. Then was due honor rendred both to the Generall and also to the armie accordingly. He triumphed over the Volscians and Aequians: and in his triumph his owne legions followed after him. To the other Consull granted it was that he should in a kind of triumph called Ovatio, ride into the cittie, but without his soldiours. The yeare next ensuing, the law Terentilla was by the whole college or fellowship of the Tribunes revived and propounded againe: which put the new Consuls P. Volumnius and Ser. Sulpitius to some trouble. And in the same yeare the skie seemed to be on a light fire, and there was an exceeding earthquake. And that which the yeare afore was no credit given unto, was now for truth beleevd, to wit, That a cow did speake. Among other strange wonders it rained flesh: during which shewre, a huge number of foules flew among, and were reported to have snatcht it and caried it away as it was in falling. But that which fell downe and escaped their talions, lay scattered here and there for certaine daies in such sort, as the sent changed not at all, nor the flesh one jot taken and corrupted. Then the bookes (of Sibylla) were perused by the Duumvirs deputed over matters of religion: who foretold of some dangers to ensue by a companie of strangers, and gave warning to look least happily some assault should be made upon the highest places of the cittie, and therof a slaughter & massacre ensue. Amongst the rest, warning was given to abstaine from civile discord and mutinies: which the Tribunes found fault with, as a devised matter to hinder the law. Whereupon great debate and contention was like presentlie to grow. But behold, (that the revolution and course of troubles might

A turne about everie yeare to the same point.) The Herniks bring newes that the Volscians and Aequians for all their wings were well clipped, and their forces greatly decayed, began to gather and leavie new armies: Item, That in Antium lay the whole weight and importance of the affairs, & all depended upon it: That the Antiat coloners held their counsels and had their meetings in open shew, at Ecetra, but Antium was the principall seat of the warre, and from thence came all preparations and forces whatsoever. As soone as these newes were reported in the Senate, order was given to muster soldiours: and that the Consuls should part betweene them the administration and managing of this warre, so as the one should have the charge against the Volscians, and the other against the Aequians. But the Tribunes rung it out openly in the common hall before the people, That this was but a made matter of the Volscian warre, and a tale devised by the Herniks, who were suborned and framed to play their parts in the Pageant, and to serve the turne of the Nobles. And that now verilie the freedome of the people of Rome was not oppressed or endangered by plaine prowess and vertue, but finely shifted off and dallied cunningly withall, by flie and craftie inventions. And for as much as now it was an unlikely thing and incredible, that the Volscians and Aequians after so great carnage committed upon them, whereby they were all in a manner killed up, should be able of themselves to wage warre, there were, forsooth, new enemies sought out: A faithfull Colonie neer adioyning, was now slandered and diffamed: warre was pretended for a shew against the guiltlesse and innocent Antiats, but in truth, intended with the verie commons of Rome, whom they ment to drive out of the cittie in all haste headlong, surcharged with hevie armour, and so (by turning out their poore fellow citizens into banishment, & sending them away, God knowes whether) to be avenged at length of the Tribunes. And thus the Law (say the Tribunes, for they must thinke their drift is to this end and to none other) should be troden vnder foote, vnlesse whiles all is entire and whole, and nothing done, whiles they remaine at home in their houses, whiles they be in their gownes, they take heede and looke well about them, that they be not dispossessed of the cittie, and take the yoke of servitude vpon their necks: assuring them that if their hearts onely served, they should want for no helpe: and that all the Tribunes agreed and were of one mind, that there was no cause of feare abroad, no forraigne warre to trouble them: last of all, that the very providence of the gods the yeare before assured them, that their libertie might with safetie be defended. These and such like remonstrances gave the Tribunes out. On the other part, the Consuls causing their chaires of estate to be set, even in their sight and presence, began to mulier. Thither ran the Tribunes downe in all hast, and drew the whole assemblie of people with them. And, to make as it were a prooffe and triall, some few by name were called, and straightwaies began a stir. For whomsoever the Sergeant by the Consull his commandement arrested, the Tribunes charged againe that hee should bee let goe. And neither side contained within the limits and compasse of their commission and rightfull authoritie: but presumed of their might and strong hand, to attaine unto their desired purpose. For even as the Tribunes had demeaned themselves in forbidding the muster, semblable the Senatours bestirred themselves to stop the law for going forward: which was propounded everie court day, and when the people might assemblie. And evermore the brawle began, when the Tribunes commanded the people to avoid the hall, for that the Patritijs would not endure thus to bee set out and excluded. Few or none of the auncients would bee present at these troublesome sturres, being such as were not to bee managed and ordered by sage counsell, but wholly left to the rashnes and boldnes of young and greene heads. The Consuls also were much absent, and forbore to be in place, for feare least in such a confused hurlyburly their majestic and dignitie, might have ben subject to some shamefull contumely and disgrace. But there was among them one Ceso Quintius, a lustie young gentleman and a stout, in regard both of his noble parentage, as also of the goodly tall personage and strength of his bodie. Besides these good parts that God had bestowed upon him, he had woon himselfe many ornaments by sundrie exploits atcheevd in wars: He had withall an eloquent speech and a good grace at the bar, so as, in one word, throughout the whole cittie, there was not one thought to bee more readie in tongue, or taller of his hands. This Ceso standing in the midst of the Nobles, higher to be seen above all the rest, as one that in his speech and strength, carried afore him the countenance and authoritie of all Dictators and Consuls, was the only man that bare off the brunts of Tribunes, and stormes of the common people. Many a time were the Tribunes driven out of common hall, the Communalitie defeated and put to flight by the conduct of this Captaine. Whosoever came within his reach, was sure to go away throughly beaten, & cleane stripped. So

as it evidently appeared, if this course might have been allowed, the law had soone ben checked G and overthrowne. Now when all the other Tribunes besides, were herewith dismayed and well-neere daunted, Aulus Virginius alone, being one of their fellowship, was so bold, as to enter an action against Cæso, of a capitall crime. By which deed of his, he rather fired, than feared his hot and furious nature. For so much the more eagerly withstood he the law, coursed and troubled the Commons, and persecuted the Tribunes as it were with open warre. The plaintiffe in the meane time, suffered the defendant to run on still, and with many outrages to kindle more coales of ill will, and hatred upon his owne head, and to minister further matter of crimes to bee charged with. And all the while he ceased not to preferre the law aforesaid, nor so much of any hope to bring it to passe, as to provoke and set on worke, the giddie head and humourous vaine of Cæso. Whereby it came to passe, that many follies oftentimes were committed both in word & deed, H by the yonger sort: and evermore the blame light upon poore Cæso: he alone was alwaies charged, because he had been once suspected. But nevertheless hee gaine said and crossed the law. And Aulus Virginius ever and anone would entertaine the Commons with these and such like speeches. See ye not alreadie (quoth he) O Quirites, that yee may not now have Cæso your Citizen, and the law which you desire both together. But what meane I to speak of the law? It is your libertie that hee infringeth and setteth himselfe against, and in pride and arrogance hee exceedeth all the Tarquines that ever were. But wait, ye were best, until he be made a Consull or Dictator, whom yee see alreadie being but a private person, to beare himselfe so greatly of his strength and boldnesse, as to lord it over you, and rule as a king. Many footed the Tribune and said the like, adding moreover, how they had ben well knocked & beaten at his hands: and were forward I ynough of themselves to set the Tribune on, to proceed in his commended action against him.

Now was the law day of iudiciall triall come: and it seemed abroad, that all men verily thought that the very foundation of their libertie consisted in the condemnation of Cæso. In conclusion, driven he was with much indignitie and shame, to creepe and crouch unto every man, submissely craving their favor one after another. There seconded him his kinsfolke and nearest friends, the best men of the citie. Titus Quintius Capitolinus, who had been thrice Consull, spake in his behalfe: and after he had reckoned up many honours and dignities, both of his owne, and also of his familie, affirmed, that neither in the house and race of Quintij, nor yet throughout the citie of Rome, was ever scene so great towardnesse, no such shew and likelihood of ripe and perfect vertue and prowess as in Cæso: saying, that hee had been first his souldiour, and served under him, and that with his owne eyes hee had scene him oftentimes fight valiantly hand to hand with his enemies in the field. Again, Sp. Fufius made this good report of him, That upon a time, when himselfe was in great distresse & extremitie, Cæso was sent unto him from Quintius Capitolinus, to helpe at a pinch: and that there was no one man, by whose good service, as hee thought, the Weale publicke at that time was more releved and restored, than by his. L. Lucretius the Consull last yeare before, glittering in his bright glorie so fresh and new, joined with the rest, avowing Cæso partaker with him in his praise-worthy acts, he recounted his brave combats, referred his noble exploits, both in his rodes and voiajes, and also in the pight field: advising and counselling them, that in any hand they would retaine still for to be a citizen of their owne citie, rather than of any other, this excellent young gentleman, furnished with all good gifts of nature and fortune, like to prove a singular stay of the publicke affaires, into what citie and state soever he should come. As for that heat and hastinesse (quoth he) which was in him misliked and offensive, age and time would daily diminish, and bereave him of it: grave and sage counsell, which now was wanting, would come on a pace everie day more than other. Seeing therefore his faults waxed old and faded, his vertues now were in their growth, flourishd, and grew ripe unto perfection; they should permit so brave, so rare a person, to live still among them, and be a good old man in this their citie. His father among the rest, L. Quintius, surnamed Cincinnatus, went another way to worke: who not by iterating still his praises, for feare of heaping more matter of envie and repine, but craving pardon for his wildnesse and youthfull demeanor; besought them for his sake at leastwise, to give the sonne as a present to his father, who neither in word M nor deede had ever offended any person. Some tooke no heede and gave a deafe care to his prayers, either for modesty and reverence, or for feare. Others complaining how they and theirs had ben beaten and hardly used at his hands, bewraied and shewed plainly by their shrewd and churlish answers what their judgment was. Beside, the common dislike and malice conceived against the defendant, there was one perilous matter and crime above all, that touched him

A very neere. And that was this: M. Volscius Fictor, who certaine yeares before had been Tribune of the Commons, came in against him as a witness, and deposed, how that not long after the plague was in the citie, he happened upon a company of youtnes as they made a riot and robbery in the Suburra: where there arose a braule and a fray, in which his elder brother, a man well in yeares, and not throughly recovered of his sicknesse, was by a buffet with Cæso his fist felled to the ground, and laie there for dead: so as he was faine to be had home betwene mens armes; & as he deemed, of that blow he died: yet might not he, as haynous as the fact was, bring his action and prosecute the law, for feare of the Consuls of these last yeares. As Volscius thus informed, the whole court was moved therewith, in so much that Cæso escaped hardly, from being murdered, in that rage and fury of the people. Then Virginius commanded to lay hold

B on the man, and to have him away to prison. The Patritij againe by force resisted force. T. Quintius cried out, That he who was under arrest for to make his appearance, and answer at a day for his life, and who shortly should come to his triall and be judged, ought not before sentence of condemnation, and before he had pleaded for himselfe, thus violently be misused. The Tribune replied againe, That his meaning was not to punish him before he were condemned: howbeit, by his leaue he would be so bold as keepe him fast in prison, to be forth comming at the law daie; that he who had killed a man, might suffer therefore, according as the people of Rome should award. Then were the Tribunes called unto for their helpe, who by the meanes of an indifferent decree then made, shewed their lawfull favours with speede. By vertue whereof they forbade expressely, that he should not be imprisoned, but pronounced that it was their will and pleasure, that the defendant should personally appeare, and a piece of money be promised unto the people, in case he made default and failed of his appearance. Much question there was what summe of money should be thought reasonable to be promised. And the matter was put over to the Senate to be decided: and whilst the Senators sate thereupon, the defendant was kept still in ward within the common Haul. At length they thought good and set it downe, that he should put in sureties. And they bound each suretie in 3000 Asics. But how many of these

C should put in band, was left to the will and discretion of the Tribunes, who assigned and determined ten & no more. With so many sureties the plaintiffe bound the defendant personally and peremptorily to appeare at his daie. This man was the first Roman that went under speciall baile and put in good pledges to make his publike answer. Thus being enlarged out of the common

D hall and dismissed, the next night following, unawares to the Consull, he departed to the Tufcanes into exile. When the daie of this judgment was come, and that it was alleadged for his excuse, That he was out of the towne, and gone into banishment: yet nevertheless Virginius assembled the people about this matter: but his fellow Tribunes being called unto for their helpe, dismissed the court and licensed every man to depart. But the foresaid money was cruelly exacted at his fathers hands, so that he was driven to sell up all that ever he had, and for a long time to live apart as a person confined, on the other side of Tyber, in a poore blinde cottage out of the way. This processe of judgment, and the preferring of the law aforesaid together, busied the citie and kept it occupied. Quiet they were for any wars abroad. At what time the Tribunes like conquerors, seeing the Nobles appauled at the banishment of Cæso, supposed now their law was

E in manner fully established and enacted. And for as much as the more ancient Senators had dispossessed themselves as it were, of the Common weale, and medled not for their owne parts with the state: the younger sort and such especially as were of Cæso his crue and acquaintance, were kindled the more against the Commons, and abated not their courage: marry, this good thereby was done upon them, that in some measure they tempered and ruled their furious affections and violent outrage. The first time after the exile of Cæso, that the law began againe to be proposed, they being well appointed and banded together, backed also with a mighty company of their friends and favorites, set upon the Tribunes: taking the occasion when they charged them to depart out of the hall, in such manner, that no one of them above his fellows was singular, nor carried home with him any speciall praise or blame more than another: but the

F Commons complained that for one Cæso, there were now start up a thousand. All the daies betwene, wherein the Tribunes medled not with their law, none more quiet, none more peaceable than even they themselves. Courteously they would salute and speake unto the Commons, at all other times they would invite them home to their houses and make them good cheere, assist them and be present with them in the common hall, suffer the Tribunes themselves without any interruption or impeachment to keepe their courts and hold their assemblies whatsoever:

shewing themselves at no time to any of them either publicly or privately fierce and cruell, but G onely when they went in hand with the law, for otherwise the young Gentlemen were popular enough. And not onely in other causes made the Tribunes good dispatch, and went quietly through all their businesse: but also the same men were chosen againe for the next year following without any one foule & crosse word: so far were they from being offered any forcible violence: and thus by soft handling and gentle dealing, they had now by little & little won the Commons, and made them as it were come to hand. And so by these fine fetches and devises, for one whole yeare the law was shifted off, and pretily avoided. The citie being now in more quiet state, C. Claudius the sonne of Appius and P. Valerius Poplicola, came to be Consuls. And no news this new yeare: for the same care still, either about preferring or admitting the law, held the city occupied. As much as the punic Nobles insinuated themselves more into the favour and familia- H rity of the Commons: so much more eagerly againe on the other side, did the Tribunes labour and endeavour with complaints and slanders, to bring them into suspicion and jealousie with the Commons. Saying, that there was a conspiracie intended & contrived: that Cato was in Rome: that there were plots laid to murder the Tribunes, and to massacre the Commons: that they were set on worke by some great ones, even the Auncients of the Nobles, utterly to abolish the Tribunes authority out of the C.W. and to bring and reduce the city to the same passe againe, as it had been before the taking and keeping hold in the Mount Sacer. Besides all this, war was feared from the Volscians and Equians (so ordinary it was, and so duly once every yeare it came about:) yea and withall, another mischief newly sprong, and unlooked for.

A rabble of banished persons, Outlawes and Bondslaves, to the number of 4500. having to their Capitaine one Ap. Herdonius a Sabine, surprisid in the night the Capitoll and Cattle, and were masters thereof. Who immediatly killed in the castle as many as would not be of their conspiracie and take armour with them. The rest, amid this hurlyburly ran headlong downe into the Market place for feare. The al' arme was given on all hands: and no crye heard, but Arme, Arme, the enemies are in towne. The Consuls were affraid to put the Commons in armes, and they doubted also to let them be unarmed, not knowing what suddaine occurrent this should be, that thus had entered and possessed the city: whether it were forraigne or domesticall, arising from the malice and hatred of the people, or from the treacherie and falshood of their servants.
Yet they devised to appease the uprore: and as they were busie to repress it, the more other-while they stirred up new: for the frightened and amased multitude, could not be ordered by any commandement. Howbeit at length they resolved to suffer them to take armes, and not all in generall, but onely (for that they knewe not what their enemies were) to have a sufficient and trusty guard about them, ready at all affaires and dangers whatsoever. In this carefull suspence and doubt, who were their enemies, and what their number was, they passed the rest of the night, disposing strong watch and warde in all meete and convenient places of the city. But the day light disclosed the warre and the Capitaine thereof. Appius Herdonius from out of the Capitoll proclaimed freedom to all bondmen that would come and follow him: taking upon him forsooth to defend the cause of most miserable caitifs: namely, to restore home againe unto their native countrie all such exiled persons, as had bene wrongfully expelled, and also to take away the heave yoke of slavery and bondage. Which thing he could wish it might be effected and brought about with the good will & helping hand of the people of Rome. But in case there were no hope and comfort there, then he would assay the Volscians and Equians, yea and procure what meanes he could, by all hard courses and extremities whatsoever. Now the Nobles and Coff, began to see more into the matter: and besides those dangers that were in view, & presently threatened, they feared some practise from the Veientians or the Sabines: and least, there being already so many enemies in the citie, the legions of the Sabines & Tuscanes should combine together, and come upon them. Over and besides, least their old enemies and perpetual, the Vols-cians and Aeq. should now at once, not, as aforetime, invade their borders and drive booties, but give an attempt upon the very city, which was already in some part, taken and possessed by enemies.
Many & sundry were their feares. But of all other the dread and jealousie of their own bondslaves presented unto them most imminent & present danger: for feare, least every man harboured his enemy at home in his own house, whom neither he could trust securely, nor yet mistrust without some jeopardy: fearing least being once discredited, he might proove the more malicious and bent to doe a mischief. And to such streightes they were driven, that with all their concord and agreement, they hardly were able to remedy the matter, and to stop the extremitie. So

A greatly the future troubles like to ensue, exceeded those that presently appeared and were in sight, that no man feared either Tribunes or Commons. That milde and gentle kinde of mala-die, in comparison of others, and rising alwaies by occasion of rest from all other, seemed then by reason of a forreine terrour, stilled cleane and brought asleepe. And yet see, that was the only thing in a manner that lay hardest upon them, ready to beare downe to the ground their state, which now began already to shrinke and reele. For so furiously and madly were the Tribunes bent, that they stily would stand to it, and beare men in hand, That it was no warre, but a vaine illusion, and colour of war, and no other, that had seized on the Capitoll: for nothing els but to withdraw the mindes of the Commons from intending and following their law: and that a sort of clients, followers, and favorites of the Nobility and Gentrie were gathered together, who if they might once perceive that the law were passed, and that all the sturre they had made, tooke no effect, would slip away soone & be gone, in more silence y wis, than they thither came. Whereupon they called the people away from their armour and weapons, and summoned them to an assembly, to go through with their law and enact it now or never. In the meane time the Coss. held a counsell, fearing a greater mischief like to ensue from the Tribunes, than the enemies had wrought in the night season. And when word was brought that armes were laid away, and that the people had abandoned their quarters where they were set in guard, then P. Valer., leaving his colleague to keep the Senat together, departed hastily out of the court & went straight into the temple to the Tribunes. What worke is here my Maisters (qd, he) you that are Tribunes? Are ye about to overthrow the State indeed, under the conduct of Ap. Herdonius? and who was not able to solicit & do any thing with your bondslaves and servants, was his hap so good as to corrupt and inveigle your selves? Is this your pleasure and to your good liking, while the enemy is over our heads, to have our armour laid aside, and lawes preferred? Then turning his speech to the whole multitude: If ye take no regard nor care (o Quirites) of the citie, if ye passe not for your selves, yet have some reverence, and stand in feare of the gods of your native cuntry, which by your enemies are now taken prisoners and captivate: Imp. Opt. Max. that most bountiful and almighty god, Quene Juno and Minerva, with all the rest of gods goddesses (and heavenly hallows) are besieged: Outlawes and bondslaves are encamped about your Tutelar gods, and have in possession the protectours and patrones of your city. Is this, thinke ye, the forme of a wise and well governed citie? is it in good case in deepe, and as it ought to be? So many enemies not onely within the walls, but also aloft upon the cliffe within the Cattle, overlooking and commanding both Hall and Court: and all the while, the people assemble in the hall, Senatours sit in Court, like as when we enjoyed peace and were at rest, the Senatour he delivereth his opinion at the counsell boord: the citizens of Rome besides, are busie in their scrutinies and giving their voices. And had it not been more meet and decent that both Nobility and Cominallty, Consuls and Tribunes, God and Man, all armed together, should set to their helping hand, should run up into the Capitoll to deliver, save, and set in quiet that most stately and sacred house of Imp. Opt. Max.? O Father Romulus, vouchsafe, I beseech thee, that minde and that courage unto thy successours and posterity, whereby sometime thou didst recover and win againe this forresse from these same Sabines, betrayed and lost by corruption, & for a summe of gold: command them to enter even that way, which thou first leddest, and thy valorous armie followed after. Lo, I the Consull, so far forth as a mortall man possibly may, will follow thee an immortal god, and thy footesteps. The conclusion of his speech was this,
That as he put himselfe in armes, so all the Romans shall doe the like. And in case any man went about to hinder this, he would without regard of Consuls rule and dignity, or Tribunes authority and might, pause for no sacred or inviolable lawes: but what or wheresoever he were, in Capitoll, in market place, all as one, take him for an enemy, and deale accordingly. Let the Tribunes (for as much as they forbad to take armes against Ap. Herdonius) commaunde hardly, and spare not, to arme against P. Valerius the Consull: It should be well seene that he would dare and doe that by the Tribunes, which the first of his house and name sometime had done by the KK. A great broile was toward, and no other like, but that they would have gone together by the eares, and that the mutinie of the Romanes, would have been a goodly spectacle to the enemies for to beholde. But all this while, neither could the lawe be preferred, nor the Consull go up into the Capitoll. The night at length staied these braules begun, and hushtr all, The Tribunes fearing the armed forces of the Consuls, yielded to the darknesse of the night, and gave over. Now when the principall authours of the discord were once gone out of the way, the Nobles went about to the Commons; intruding themselves into their companies as they were met in knots together: where they would enter into talk and discourse with them, according to the present occasions and the time; admonishing them to take heed into what danger they brought the State. For as much as now (quoth they) it is not a matter of debate between the Senators and Commons: but both Senators and Commoners, the castle and strongest hold of the citie, the temples of the gods, their houses both publicke and private, were readie to be yeelded unto the enemies. Whiles these things were practising in the common place, for to appeale the diffention: the Consuls for feare, least the Sabines or the Veientians, enemies both, should stirre and rise, were gone to the gates, and all about the wals. The same night came tidings also to Tusculum of the taking of the castle, the surprising of the Capitoll, and likewise of the troublesome state wherein the citie stood. At that time was L. Mamilius, Dictator of Tusculum: he forthwith called a Senate together, brought in the messengers of the foresaid newes, and thought it very expedient and needfull not to wait untill there came Embassadors from Rome to crave their aid: for that the present perill it selfe alone, the urgent necessitie, their social gods, and the faithfull bond of league, required no lesse at their hands, than to send succor: adding moreover, that the gods would never give them the like occasion and oportunitie again; to graunt the Romanes; to bind and oblige unto them by a sound benefite and pleasure done; so mightie a citie, and so neere a neighbour. Whereupon it was decreed, to rescue them with all speed. The able men of service were taken up and enrolled; munition and armour given them in their hands: who advancing toward Rome by break of day, seemed a farre off to be enemies, and were taken for the Acquians or Volscians. But afterwards, when this foolish feare was overcome, they were received into the citie: and marched downe in order of battell to the market place. Where, at the very same time Pub. Valerius having left his fellow Consul to guard and fortifie the gates, was setting his men in array. The authoritie of the man had prevailed with the people, for he promised & assured them, that if the Capitoll were once recovered, and the citie set in quiet, if they would suffer him to be informed what fatterous and secret mischeefe was underhand practised by the Tribunes under colour of this law, he would in remembrance of his ancestors, & of his * surname (which in regard of the affectionat love unto the people, by a speciall care, as it were by inheritance from his forefathers, was recommended unto him) not hinder & trouble the meetings and assemblies of the Commons, nor crosse and thwart their proceedings. They followed him therefore as their cheefetaine, gaue say the Tribunes what they could (for all would not serve) advanced forward, and marched up against the rising of the Capitoll hill. The Tusculane legion stucke close unto them, and followed after. Citizens and Associates both, did their best, and strove who should regaine the Capitoll first, and have the honour of that day. Each captaine exhorted and encouraged his men. Then began the enemies to feare, and wist not well what to trust unto, but onely the situation of the place. The Romanes and their allies seeing their feare, came forward and advanced their standards against them. Now by this time were they broken into the porch of the temple. Where P. Valerius fighting manfully among the foremost in the vaward, was slaine. P. Volumnius a Consular man, saw him when he fell: who gave his men in charge to cover his bodie, and stept himselfe into the Consuls roome, and fought in his stead. The souldiours for heat and eagernesie of fight, tooke no regard, and came to no knowledge of this so great mischance, but got the victorie, ere they knew that they fought without their captaine. Many of the outlawes were there slaine, and polluted the temple with their blood. Many taken alive prisoners, and Herdonius himselfe was slaine outright. So the Capitoll was againe recovered. The captives, as they were either bond or free, were executed every one according to their condition and place. The Tusculanes had thanks given them. The Capitoll was cleansed, purged, and hallowed anew. The Commons, as it is reported, cast * Quadrants or mites into the Consull his house, that hee might with greater pompe of funerals be brought to the ground.

When all was appeased and in quiet, the Tribunes were earnest with the Nobles to performe the promise of P. Valerius: they were instant also with Claudius, to assoile the soule, and keepe it from blame of his fellow Consull late deceased: and to permit the law to be set on foot, and goe forward. The Consull flatly denied to suffer them to meddle with the law, before he had substituted a fellow in his place. And these contentions held unto the time of the grand Election, for the substituting of a new Consull. And in the moneth December, after much suit, and labouring of the Nobles, was L. Quintus Cincinnatus, the father of Casus, created Consull, and presently to enter

A enter into his office. The Commons herewith were much troubled and stricken dead, now that they were to have an angrie Consull, and mightie withall: considering the favour of the Nobles wherein he stood, and his owne vertue and prowess besides: by reason also of his three sonnes, of whom there was not one, that for hautesse of mind came behind Casus, and for wisdom, discretion, and moderation (when time and occasion served) went farre beyond him. Who being once entered into his office, in all his publicke speeches and orations, continually ceased not as well to bridle, restraine and keepe in the Communalitie, as also to chastise sharply the Senate, through the remissenesse of which degree, and want of courage, it was come to passe, that the Tribunes became now to continue still in office, and not as in the Commonwealth of the people of Rome, but as in some unrulie and disordered house, with their lavish tongue rained as it were, and ruled the roff: saying, That together with his sonne Casus all vertue and constancie, all commendable qualities that graced young gentlemen both in warre and peace, were chafed and utterly banished out of the citie of Rome. In lieu whereof, bablers, mutinous persons, & sowers of sedition and diffention, are become Tribunes the second, yea, and the third time: who by indirect courses and leaud practises live losely in the citie, like princes and kings. That same Aulus Virginius there, (quoth he) hath he deserved lesse punishment than Ap. Herdonius, because he was not in the Capitoll with the rable of other rebels? Nay much more a good deale, if a man will weigh the matter aright and truly. Herdonius, (if there were nothing else) yet by professing himselfe to be an enemy, advertised you, and gave you warning in a manner to arme your selves. But he, by bearing you downe so confidently, that there was no warre, what did he els but disarme you, and as it were, take your weapons from you, and offer you naked to the devotion and mercie of your bondmen and outlawes? And have yee (under correction bee it spoken, and saving the reverence and honor of C. Claudius here, and P. Valerius that dead) advanced your engines up the Capitoll hill, before you had rid the market place and common hall of these enemies? It is a shame (before God and man I speake it) when our enemies were in the castle and Capitoll, when the captaine and ringleader of outlawes and slaves, abode and lodged within the chappels and sanctuaries of Iup. Opti. Max. to the prophonation and polluting of all, that they at Tusculum should take them to their weapons before us of Rome, and that it should be doubted, whether L. Mamilius the Tusculane General, or P. Valerius, and C. Claudius, the Roman Consuls, should save the fortresse of Rome: and that wee, who heretofore would not suffer the Latines in their owne defence, when they had their enemies in their borders, so much as once to take weapon in hand, should now our selves have ben surprised and destroyed, had not they, the verie same Latines of their owne accord, put themselves into armour for our sakes. Is this your succoring and helping the Commons, (O yee Tribunes) for to expose and cast them unarmed before the enemy, to have their throats cut? Ywis, if the meanest or basest person of your communalitie, which you have dismembred from the whole bodie of the people besides, and made it, as it were the native cuntry of your owne, and a Commonwealth peculiar onely to your selves; If any one of them I say, should bring you word, that his house were beset round about, with a meinie of servants and slaves in armour, you would thinke it meet that hee were aided and succoured: And when Iup. Opti. Max. was besieged with a power of armed outlawes and bondslaves, was he not worthe of mans helpe? And yet these men would be counted and held for Sacresancti, i. Sacred and inviolable, with whom the very gods themselves are not sacred and inviolate. And notwithstanding, that yee are thus overcharged and stained with sins both against God and man, yee goe up and downe, and say, That this yeare you will get your law to passe, and make it sure. Pardie, if ye prefer it againe, then I must needs say the Commonweale is ill bested, and had a shrewd turne that day whereon I was created Consull, yea and worse a good deale, than at what time P. Valerius the Consull was slaine. But now first and foremost (quoth he) O Quirites, my colleague and I both, are minded to lead forth our legions immediatly against the Volscians and the Acquians; how the divine providence of God hath appointed it, I know not, but surely we find the gods more gracious and favorable unto us in our wars ordinarily, than in time of peace. And in what danger we had stood of those nations, in case they had known that the Capitoll was in the hands and possession of outlawes, better it is to guesse by that which is past, than to trie indeed by present experience. The Consull his oration moved & galled the Commons. The Nobles took hart, & were in a good beleef, that the world was well mended, and the state better reformed. The other Cos. more hartly to follow than to lead, and who was well content that his fellow had broken the yee before, & taken in hand to deale first in so weighty a matter, willingly challenged lenged unto himselfe the charge to performe the part and office of a Consull, in the execution and accomplishment of those designements. But then the Tribunes made a game therat, & setting light at the Consull his words, inferred againe and demanded, how the Consuls would lead out an armie, and no man suffer them to muster souldiors. Marry (quoth Quintius) we need no mustering at all: for, at what time as P. Valerius armed the Commons to recover again the Capitoll, they were all swome unto him, and tooke their oath in this forme, To assemble together at the Consull his commandement, and not depart from their colors without his leave and licence. Wee will and charge you all therfore, that have taken this oath to present your selves to morrow, with your armor, at the lake of Regillus without faile. Then the Tribunes began to cavil and wrangle, and would needes have the people discharged in their conscience of that oath: alleading how when they tooke that militarie sacrament, Quintius was but a privat person. There was not as yet, that neglect and contempt of the gods entered into the world, which now reigneth every where and is so rife: neither did men interpret their oathes, and construe lawes, to serve their own purpose, but rather attemperd and framed their lives and demeanour therunto. The Tribunes therfore, seeing no hope to hinder the thing, began themselves to treat about seding forward the army: and the rather, because there ran a rumour abroad, that the Augurs were commaunded to attend at the lake Regillus: and that by them a place should be halowed and consecrate there, wherein the Consuls might duly commune and conferre with the people, concerning all matters, according to the sight of birdes: to the end that whatsoever at Rome had passed under a lawe, extorted by the violent force of the Tribunes; the same might there in a lawfull assembly and generall Session, be abrogated & made void by the suffrages of the souldiors, who all no doubt would accord to that, which should stand with the Consuls pleasure. For by reason that there was no appeale in force without the citie, above one mile, the Tribunes themselves also, if they came thither, should be subject as well as the multitude besides of the people, to the commandement of the Consuls. These matters scared them indeed and put them in a bodily feare: but the greatest thing above all the rest that disquieted their hearts was this, that Quintius oftentimes had given out and said, That he would not call an assembly of the people for the election of Consull, for that the city was growen so farre out of frame and temper, that it might not be reformed and cured with ordinary and usuall remedies: but that the Common-wealth had more need of a Dictator, that whosoever went about to trouble the state of the city, might well know that there was an absolute Dictatorship, that checked all appeales. The Senate was assembled at that time in the Capitoll; thither came the Tribunes with their Commons greatly disquieted and troubled. The multitude cried out and besought one while the Consuls of their favour, another while the LL. of the Senate of their protection; but could nor once remoove the Consull from his opinion (such a pitch had he taken) before the Tribunes gave their word & faithfull promise, that they would be wholly ruled and ordered by the Senators. Then the Consull propounded the demands and petitions of the Tribunes and Commons, and the Senate enacted these orders and decrees. First, that neither the Tribunes should that yeare presere their lawe: nor the Consuls lead out of the city any armie. Item from thence forth, the Senate deemed it not to stande with the weale publike, that Magistrates should continue still in place from yeare to yeare, & that the same persons should be more than once chosen Tribunes. The Consuls for their part, were overruled and ordered by the Senators. But, say and gainsay what the Consuls would, the same Tribunes were chosen anew: and the Nobles also because they would not be one ace behind hand with the Commons, would needes choose L. Quintius likewise for their Consull againe. But all the yeare through was not the Consull more earnest and vehement in any action and speech whatsoever than in this. Should I mervaille my Lords of the counsell (quoth he) that you beare no stroke with the Cominallty, and your authority is so little worth among them? Why, you, even your owne selves set light thereby: seeing, forsooth, the Commons brake the ordinance of the Senate, touching the continuitie of Magistrates; ye also, because ye would not seeme to yeeld one yuch in rashnesse and folly to the multitude, are as readie and willing to infringe the same: as who would say, this were to have more rule and authority in a citie, namely, to use more levitie, inconstancie, and licentiousnesse. For it is a point of much more lightnes and vanitie, I assure you, For men to disanull the actes and decrees of their owne making, than of others. Yee that be Senators and Fathers of the C. VV. imitate, and spare not, the ignorant, leawd, and inconsiderate multitude: ye that should give good examples to others, sinne ye hardly your selves, and doe amisse by the precedent of others; neither then let others by your example doe well: so long

A long as I, for my part, take not after the Tribunes, nor suffer my selfe to be declared Cos. against an expresse act of the Senat. As to you, O Claudius, I would exhort you, that both your selfe would restrain the people of Rome of this their licentiousnesse, that thus they have not their swinge: and also that you would perswade your selfe thus much of me, That so farre off will I be from thinking my honour by you impaired, that rather I will take my glory to be encreased by the despising & refusing of a dignitie; & the ill wil and envie abated & diminished, that might grow upon the continuation thereof. Whereupon, both the Consuls jointly together made an edict and proclamation, That no man should (by his voice) nominate Quintius, Consull: and if any man did, they would not allow of his election. So there were created Consuls: Q. Fabius Vibulanus the third time, and L. Cornelius Maluginensis.

B In this yeare was held a selling and numbring of the citizens: But touching the Lustum, there was some scruple of conscience; because the Capitoll had been taken, and the Consull slain. When Q. Fabius and Lucius Cornelius were thus Consuls, sodenly in the very beginning of their yeare began great troubles: for the Tribunes on the one side, as their guile was, set the Commons a worke: the Latines and Hernicks on the other side, sent word of great wars from the Volscians and Aequians: That the Volscian legions were already at Antium, and the Colonie it selfe greatly suspected to rebell. Yet hardly could the Tribunes be brought to agree, that preparation should be made aforehand to prevent this warre. But upon these newes, the Consuls parted betwene themselves the charge of all affaires. Fabius was appointed to lead forth an armie to Antium: and Cornelius, to abide at Rome for the defence of the city, for feare least some part of their enemies, as the Aequians manner was, should in a running campe make rodes and harry the territories about. The Hernicks and Latines, were by vertue of the league, charged with the finding of certaine souldiors, so as the whole army should consist of ij. parts of confederates and onethird of citizens. When, at the day appointed the Allies were come, the Consull pitched downe his tentes without the gate Capena: from whence when he had taken a generall muster and purged his armie, he marched toward Antium, and encamped himselfe not far, either from the towne, or the standing campe of his enemies: where the Volscians seeing no forces yet come unto them from the Aequians, had no heart to fight, but made preparation how they might keepe themselves quiet and safe, within their mure and rampire. The morrow after, Fabius made not one entire battaile of Allies and citizens mingled together, but three battaillons severally by themselves, of three sundry nations, & raunged them along all about the counterscarpe and trench of his enemies. Himselfe was in the midst with the Romane legions, and gave commandement to observe heedfully and make the signall: that the Allies also should both begin battaile and also retire, when he sounded the retreat. In like sort he placed the horfmen behind the Principia at the backe of each battaile. Thus in three sundry parts he assailed the campe, and invironed it round about, and charging lustely hard upon them on every side, he beat the Volscians downe from their rampier, for they were not able to endure his violence. And having gotten over all their trenches and fortifications, he drave the fearefull multitude cleane out of their hold, that now were retired to a side and corner of the campe. The horfmen might not easily get over the trench, and stood still of purpose to behold the fight, and to marke them when they should flie: but having once gotten them in the open fieldes, they chased them as they ran away on heapes: and by killing them in their fearefull flight, deserved their part in that victorie. Great was the execution both within the campe, and also without the rampiers, as they fled: but greater was the pillage, for that the enemies had much ado to carry their armour away with them, and but that they throwded themselves as they fled in the woods, they had perished every man. During these exploits about Antium, the Aequians having sent before them the tallest and lustiest young men they had, surprised the castle of Tusculum, upon a fodaine and at unawares in the night season: and with the rest of their power they were encamped not far from the wals of Tusculum, intending to intercept and stay the armie of their enemies. Tidings hereof came in post to Rome, and from Rome to the campe before Antium, which troubled the Romanes as much as if newes had beene brought, that the Capitoll was taken. So fresh in remembrance was the late desert of the Tusculans: and the like jeopardy seemed to challenge and redemand semblable aide and succour. Fabius setting all other things aside, caused the booty in all hast to be conveyed out of the campe to Antium: where having left an indifferent garde, he hasteneth apace in order of battaile to Tusculum. By reason whereof, the souldiors could take nothing with them, but their armour, and such baked or boyled meats as were at hand ready.

die. The Consull (Cornelius) sent a convoy of victuals unto them from Rome. Thus for certaine months continued the warre at Tusculum. The Consull (Fabius) with one part of his host assailed the campe of the Aequians: for the other part he had let the Tusculans have, to win again their fortresse. Against all force it was impregnable, but in the ende famine constrained the enemies to abandon it. To which extremity being at length driven, they were by the Tusculans disarmed and compelled to passe naked under the yoke. Who as they fled homeward with shame enough, were overtaken of the Romane Consull in Algidum, and put to the sword every one. After this victory, he encamped with the rest of his armie at Columen, for so the place is named. The other Consull likewise, seeing that there was no danger threatening the wals of Rome, now that the enemy was discomfited and repulsed, departed himselfe from the citie. So the Consuls entering two waies the borders of their enemies, made sharpe war and spoiled the Volscians of the one side, and the Aequians on the other. I finde in most writers that the Antiates in this yeare rebelled: and that L. Cornelius the Consull managed that warre, and won the towne. But for as much as there is no mention made of that matter in any ancient writers, I dare not avouch it for a certaine truth.

This warre was no sooner brought to an end, but the domestickall Tribunes warre at home put the Nobles in feare: for the Tribunes cried out that this was cautelous and fraudulent dealing, thus to keepe the armies abroad, for nothing els but to disappoint them for publishing the law. Yet nevertheless, since they had begun it, they would not give over, but go through with it and see an end. Howbeit P. Lucretius, President of the cittie for the time, prevailed thus much with them, That all Tribunitian actions should hang and be deferred untill the coming of the Consuls. There was besides a new occasion arose of fresh trouble. A. Cornelius and Quintus Servilius Questours, gave summons to M. Volscius to make his answer at a day, who laide to his charge that he without all doubt, had borne false witness against Cæso. For by many presumptions and evidences it appeared, that neither Volscius his brother, from the first time that he fell sicke and tooke his bed, was at any time seene openly in the streetes, or so much as to have sit up, and mended any whit, but of that disease which held him many monethes, he languished and consumed away to death: nor about that time, wherein the deponent supposed the deede was done, was Cæso once seene at Rome: it being plainly affirmed and proved by those who served together with him in the warres, that he was ordinarily all the time fighting vnder his colours as well as they, without any passport or licence to depart. And to make this good, many there were that of themselves privately challenged Volscius, and offered to traverse the law and to be tried by any indifferent and competent judges. But when as he durst not abide the triall and to be judged, all these things put together, and so consonant one to the other, made men doubt no more of the condemnation of Volscius than of Cæso, which was grounded upon the bare testimony of Volscius. The Tribunes were only the stay; who said plainly they would not suffer the Questours to holde any sessions or judicall court, for the triall of the defendant, before they had a solemne assembly about their law. So were both these matters put off unto the Consuls coming. Who being entred with triumph into the city, with their victorious armie, and no wordes made of the law, many men thought the Tribunes were cleane daunted and stricken dead. But they (for that the yeare now was at an end) aspiring to be Tribunes the fourth time, left all their hoat contention for the law, and reserved themselves wholly to argue and reason at the assembly for the Election of new Magistrates. And albeit the Consuls had bent all their might and maine against the continuity of the Tribuneship, as earnestly, as if a law had been propounded, tending to the impairing and abridging of their majesty, yet got the Tribunes the matrie, and had the hand of them in the end. In this yeare peace was granted upon request and petition, unto the Aequians. And the Seßing, which the yeare before began, was now finished. And this was counted the tenth generall Survey and solemne purging of the cittie from the foundation thereof. There were numbered in the Censé-booke, of citizens 132419 polles. A glorious and honourable yeare it was unto the Consuls, both at home and in warre. For they not onely procured peace abroad, but also the Cittie was, if not in perfect concord and unitie, yet in lesse trouble than at other times. L. Minutius, and L. Quintius, that were created Consuls, entred upon the reliques of the two matters begun the former yeare. And much after one sort, as the Consuls crossed the going forward of the law, so the Tribunes hindered the judicall proceeding against Volscius. But the new Questours were men of more power and greater authoritie. For, together with M. Valerius, the sonne of Valerius, and nephew of Falsus, was T. Quintius Capitolinus created Questour,

A a man that had ben thrice Consull. Forasmuch therefore, as Cæso, the worthiest gentleman of all other, and the very ornament of the youth of Rome, could not be restored again, neither to the house of the Quintii, nor to the Commonweale, he pursued of meere pietie, with just and lawful warre, that false witness, who would not suffer on any hand the innocent person to have the libertie to plead in his owne defence. And when Virginius, most of all the other Tribunes, was earnest to publish the law, the Consuls had two months respite given them to consider thereof, and looke into it thoroughly: to the end, that when they had advertised the people what secret fraud and inconvenience was hidden and lurked therein, they might afterwards suffer them to proceed to a scrutiny, and gather voices accordingly. This space between granted, brought the citie into a good and quiet state.

B But the Aequians would not abide, that long it should continue so. Who having broken the league, which the yeare before was made with the Romanes, chose Gracchus Clulius for their governour and Generall, who was in those daies the greatest man amongst the Aequians. Vnder the conduct of this Gracchus, they enter first in warlike manner the countrey of Lanuvium, and from thence into the territorie of Tusculum, spoiling and ransacking as they went: and being loaden with preyes and booties, they pitch their tents in Algidum. Thither repaired from Rome into their campe, Q. Fabius P. Valerius, & A. Posthumus as embassadors, to complain of wrongs received, and to demand amends and satisfaction according to covenant. The Generall of the Aequians seemed to graunt them audience, and willed them to declare what message and commission they had from the Senate of Rome, unto the oke; for that himselfe had some other matters to dispatch the while. Now there grew a mightie great Oke hard by the Generall his pavilion, spreading his boughes even over it, and the shadow thereof served for a coole sitting place. Then one of the Embassadors, as he went his way: Let both this sacred Oke (quoth he) & what divine power forever is seated in this place, hear and know, that by you first the league is broken, who now regard our present complaints, and shortly assist our valiant armies, when we shall prosecute and revenge at once the disloyall breach, both of Gods lawes and mans. So soone as the Embassadors were returned to Rome, the Senate gave direction, that one of the Consuls should lead forth an armie against Gracchus, into Algidum, and the other to have in commission, to wast the borders of the Aequians. The Tribunes, as their manner was, hindered the muster, and peradventure had staied it altogether, but for a new fearefull occurrent that suddenly came in the necke of the other. For a mightie power of Sabines were approached well-neere to the wals of the citie, robbing, spoiling, and destroying all afore them with sword and fire. The territorie was piteously round about laid desolate, and the citie therewith sore terrified. Then the Commons stomackes came downe, and gently they tooke weapon in hand: and (say what the Tribunes would against it) two great armies were enrolled. Quintius had the leading of the one against the Sabines: and being encamped at Eretum, with small rodes and incursions, and those for the most part by night, made such foule worke and wast in the Sabines countrey, that in comparison thereof, the lands about Rome, seemed as if they had not bene once touched. Minutius in his exploits, had neither like good successe, nor yet egall courage and valour of heart. For having pitched his tents not far from the enemy, and received no great foile and losse at his hands to speake of, yet hee kept himselfe for feare within the campe. Which when the enemies perceived, they grew more bold (as commonly the cowardise of one increaseth the courage of another) and assailed the campe in the night season: but seeing that plain force finally prevailed, the morrow after they raised mounts, and cast trenches round about. But before they had with their countermures and rampires stopped up all passages, five horsemen being sent even amongst the guards of the enemies, brought newes to Rome, that the Consull with his armie was besieged. Nothing could there have happened so little thought of, and unlooked for: whereupon there was such feare, trembling, and quaking, as if the enemies had besieged not the campe, but the very citie. Nautius the Consull they send for, and because they thought him like to do but small good, they agreed therfore to create a Dictator, who might restore again the distressed state of the C.W. And L. Quintius Cincinnatus by consent of all men was nominated.

C Now a world and wonder it is to hear them speak, that in regard of riches despise all things else; and suppose there can be no great honor and vertue, but where wealth and riches doe flow in excess. This *L. very place, where now the Arsenall and Shipdocks are, and there was hee found digging a ditch, and bearing hard on his spade, or els a plowing the ground, I wote not whether, but busie and earnest about some rustical worke, no doubt he was: and after salutations passed on both sides, betwene him and the Embassadors that were sent, he was requested by them, that he would put on his best gown, and (that which might turne to the good of himselfe and the Commonweale) heare a message from the Senat. First, he marvelled what the matter should be, and eftsoones asking of them if all were well, he willett his wife Racilia to bring him forth his Senators robe straightway, out of his forie cottage: which he put on his back (but first he brushed off the dust, and wiped away his sweat, & made himselfe somewhat manly) & then came forth unto them, who in joyous manner, by way of congratulation, stiled him by the name of Dictator: calling hard upon him to repaire unto the citie, and declaring in how doubtfull tearmes the armie stood. Then was there a barge provided readie for Quintius, at the citties cost: and being ferried over the river, his three sonnes met him and received him first, then other of his kinsfolke and friends; and after them the more part of the Senators. Thus attended with this frequent companie, and with the Sergeants going before, was he brought to his house. Great concourse there was also of the Commons: but nothing so joyous were they, to see Quintius, supposing that government of his overgreat and absolute, and himselfe a man in time of his rule, too imperious. And for that night verilie, nothing was done, but a good standing watch kept in the citie. The morrow after, the Dictatour being come into the common place of assemblie before day-light, appointed Generall of the horse, L. Tarquinius, of Noble blood descended: a man who for meere povertie had ever served on foot, but of all the flower of Rome was reputed and taken to bee a brave servitour, and an excellent fouldiour. Then Quintius with his Generall of horsemen, mounteth up into the pulpit aloft: proclaimeth a publicke vacation or Lawtied: commandeth all shop windowes through the citie to bee shut, and chargeth that no man should follow any private businesse of his owne. Then, as manie as were of age to fight, were willed to shew themselves in their armour, before the sunne set, in Mars field, everie one with victuals dressed for five daies, and with twelve forked stakes a peece, for to pitch in the rampart. And that whosoever were above that age, and were unwelddie, and not meet for service, should dresse and provide victuals for the next fouldiour unto him, whiles hee himselfe made readie his armour, and sought for stakes aforesaid. Thus ran the young and able men to and fro, to furnish themselves with stakes, and tooke wheresoever they could find, and whatsoever was next hand: no man was forbidden, and so they were all readie with heart and good will, according to the Dictator his proclamation. Then went the Dictator forth with the legions of footmen, the Maister of the horse likewise with his men of armes, in such good order & array, as might not onely serve for a speedie march to rid ground, but also for a set battell if occasion served. In both regiments they spared not to encourage and exhort their fouldiours, according as the present time required: willing them to set foot forward, to mend their pace & make speed, that by night time they might reach to their enemies: and not (say they) before there was great need: for that the Romane Confull and armie were besieged, and had now three daies already been pent up fast inclosed: and what might happen in one day or one night, no man knew: for oftentimes in the twinkling of an eie, & in the very turning of an hand, there fall out accidents of right great moment and importance. On afore apace, Ensigne crieth one: follow fouldiour, thus another. Thus went they also lustily forward, and all to gratifie and pleasure their captains. So that by midnight they were come into Algidum: and so soone as they perceived their enemies to be neere at hand, they pitched downe their ensignes. Then the Dictator rode about as farre forth as he could see in the darke, and having viewed well the situation, coasting, and fashion of the campe, commanded the Marshalls and Colonels to give direction, That all the carriage and baggage, should bee laid up together in one place, and that the fouldiours with their armour and stakes only, should come againe into their ranks. What he commanded was soone done. Then in the same order that he marched, he draweth out his host in length, & compasseth the campe of his enemies, and commandeth them all (upon a signall or watchword given) to set up a shout, and presently upon the shout to cast a trench, and every man sticke downe his pale in the rampier. Having given this charge, straightwaies the signall followed. The fouldiours doe that which they were bidden: the shout was heard over all the campe of the enemies, yea and into the Confull his campe: causing in the one great feare, in the other exceeding joy. The Romanes rejoicing one with another to heare the shout of their fellow citizens and countymen,

A with a conceit of their coming to rescue, begin of themselves from their sentinels and Corps de guard, to threaten and terrifie their enemies. The Conful set them forward and said, there was now no staying for the matter, nor delais to be made: for that it appeared by that arme, that not only their friends were come with succours, but also had begon to skirmish: and that it was all to nothing, that their enemies campe, was already on the outward side assaulted. Whereupon, he commandeth his fouldiours to arme, and to follow hard after him. Thus in the night began the skirmish, and the legions of the Dictator by their outcry and shouting made signification, that the enemies on that side also were driven to their shifts and in great hazard. By this time the Aequians had addressed themselves to impeach them in their trenching and making of their rampier, to the end they might not be compassed about: but the arme was given and the skirmish already begun by their enemies within: fearing therefore, lest they would breake through the midst of their campe, they turned from the pioners & workmen without, to them that fought within, and thereby gave the other leave to plie their worke and labour all the night long at their pleasure: and so they maintained skirmish with the Cof, until daie light. Now by the breake of day, they were entrenched on every side by the Dictator, and were scarce able to hold out battaile with one of the armies. Then the host of Quintius, which presently upon the finishing of the trench returned to their weapons, entered upon the mures and rampiers of the enemies. Here began a fresh conflict againe, and yet the former nothing abated. The enemies then, seeing themselves thus distressed and so hardly driven on every side, left fighting and fell to intreating: they besought the Cof, on one side, and the Dictator on the other, that they would not get the victorie by effusion of blood and cruell massacre, but would permit them to go their waies naked without their weapons. The Confull he posted them off to the Dictator: who being in great wrath & displeasure, would not be contented without their shame and ignominie besides. But commanded that Cluilius their general, with other Colonels and Captaines should be brought bound unto him. Item he enjoyed them to abandon and quit the towne of Corbio: as for the Aequians blood, he sought not for it, he had no neede thereof: they might depart with their lives. Howbeit, because he would have it now at length, maugre their heads, confessed, that their nation was vanquished and subdued; his will and pleasure was, they should passe al under the yoke or gallows: the manner whereof is this. They tooke three speares or javelins, and set two of them pitched in the ground endlong, and the third overthwart fastned to the other. Under this kind of gallows the Dictator compelled the Aequians to go. Thus having gotten the tents of his enemies full of all kind of store (for naked he sent them under the yoke) the whole pillage he bestowed upon his own fouldiours only: and rebuking sharply the Consuls armie and the Cof, himselfe, Yee shal (quoth he) fouldiours, go without your part of bootie won of the enemy, whose bootie ye had like your selves to have been. And as for thee, O L. Minutius, until thou begin to have the heart and courage becomming a Conful, thou shalt be a Lieutenant onely over these legions. So Minutius being discharged of his Consulship, remained still as he was commanded, with the armie. But so well were men content in those daies, willingly to yeeld obedience to them that better could command, That this armie in remembrance hereof, as of a favour received, rather then of a disgrace offered, both ordained for the Dictatour a coronet of gold of one pound weight: and also when he went homeward, saluted him by the name of their Patron. At Rome the Senate being assembled together by Q. Fabius Provost of the citie, decreed that Quintius should enter the citie in triumph with his armie marching in battail array as he came. Before his chariot were led the commanders of his enemies: the ensignes are carried afore, then followed the armie laden with spoile and pillage. Great cheere and banquets were set out, men say, upon tables at every mans dore. Thus making merry, they followed the chariot with songs of triumph, with sports and merrie conceits, as they are wont to doe at their great and solemne feasts. The same day L. Mamilius the Tusculane, with the approbation & good liking of all men, was enfranchised citizen of Rome. And forthwith would the Dictat, have resigned up his office, but that the court, held for the triall of M. Volscius, endited of bearing false witness, staid him: and in truth, the Tribunes would have hindered the judiciall proceeding against him, if they had not stood in awe of the Dictatour. But Volscius was convicted and had sentence, and departed to Lanuvium in exile. And Quintius having taken the Dictatorship for six moneths, gave it over the sixteenth day after he entered into it. About the same time the Confull Nautius fought valiantlie with the Sabines at Erenum: who besides the wasting of their fields, had an overthrow in fight. Fabius was sent into Algidum, to succede in the roome of Minutius. the yeare, the Tribunes began to stir, about their law: but because the two armies were absent, the Senatours prevailed so much at that time, that no bills were propounded unto the people. The Commons likewise obtained, that they might create the selfesame Tribunes, now the fifth time. The report goeth, that there were scene in the Capitol, wolves chased away by hounds: for which strange sight, the Capitoll was purged. And these were the acts of that yeare. Then followed Consuls Q. Minutius and M. Horatius Pulvillus.

In the beginning of which yeare, whiles all was quiet abroad, the same Tribunes and the same law caused disention and sedition at home: which would have grown to a farther mischief, in such heates men were, had not word been brought, as it were of set purpose, that the garizon at Corbio was surprized in the night by the Æquians and put to the sword: wherupon the Consuls called the Senate together: and order was given, that they should lead a Subitarie armie, and with a running campe invade Algidum. Then was the strife about the law laid aside cleane, and a new contention arose about the musters. But the Consuls with all their authoritie, were overswaied of the Commons, by the help and assistance of the Tribunes. At what time a new trouble put them in feare: for intelligence came, that a power of Sabines were come downe alreadie into the territories of Rome, for to fetch booties and make spoile: and from thence advanced against the citie. Vpon which feare, the Tribunes were content that souldiours should be prest, yet not without this covenant indented: That for as much as they had now themselves these five yeares been trifled off and deluded, and that this Protectorship of theirs stood the Commons in little steed, in regard of their small number, therefore, there should from thenceforth be ten created Tribunes of the Communalitie. The Nobles were so neere driven and to such streights, that will they, nill they, yeeld they must thereto: with this provizo, that they should never after elect the same men Tribunes twise. And for feare that this act should after the warre was once past, turne to nothing, like as others had done before, they went in hand immediatly, to call a Court for the election of the Tribunes. So in the 36. yeare, from the first Tribunes of the Commons chosen, there were ten created; out of every Classis, two. And by an act it was provided, that in such sort they should be created ever after. The Multers then being taken and souldiours enrolled, Minutius went with a power against the Sabines: but found not the enemy. And Horatius, because the Æquians after they had put the garizon at Corbio to the sword, had won Hortana besides, fought with them in Algidum. Many a man there he slew, and drave his enemies not onely out of Algidum, but also out of Corbio and Hortana. As for Corbio he utterly rased it, for betraying the garizon there. After this, were M. Valerius and Sp. Virginius made Consuls. At quiet they were both at home and abroad. But great scarcitie there was of corne, by reason of the untemperate and unseasonable raine that fell. A bill there was preferred, That the mount Aventine should be turned to Commons. And the same Tribunes were made againe: who, all the yeare following, when T. Romulus and C. Veturius were Consuls, in all their Haules and assemblies, still published the law: saying, It was a shame, that their number was thus increased to no purpose, in case their affaires should lie dead in their two yeares, as they had done in the whole v. yeares past. While they were earnestly debating these things, fearful messengers came in all hast from Tusculum, with newes, that the Æquians were in the territorie of Tusculum. The fresh desert of that nation would not suffer the Romanes for shame to defer their helping hand. Wherupon both Consuls were sent with an armie, and met with the enemies in Algidum in their wonted haunt and accustomed place, where they encountered & struck a battaile: in which were slaine about 7000. enemies. The rest were put to flight. A huge bootie there was gotten, which the Consuls sold outright, by reason of the want of money in their common treasure. But this caused the souldiours to repine and grudge, and in the end ministred matter unto the Tribunes, to accuse the Consuls unto the Commons. As soone therefore as they were out of their office, when Sp. Tarpeius and A. Aternius were Consuls: Romulus was arrested and put in suite by C. Claudius Cicero, Tribune of the Commons. And Veturius was likewise troubled by L. Valerius an Edile or Varden of the Commons. Condemned they were both the one and the other, to the great indignation of the Nobles. Romulus was fined in 10000 Asles: Veturius in 15000. But for all this hard hap and calamitie that befell to those former Consuls, the new were never a jore more remisse and coole in the quarrell: saying, Weill may we also be cast and condemned: and both Commons and Tribunes never the neerer to compasse and enact their law. Then the Tribunes giving over the law, which now by propounding onely to use, was waxen stale and old; began more gently to deale with the Senatours, praying them to make an

A end once of all strife and contention. And in case that the laws of the Commons so disliked and displeased them, they requested them to suffer certaine Lawmakers to be created indifferently out of the Communalitie, as well as of the Nobilitie, who might devise acts commodious and profitable to both parts, and for the equall libertie and freedome of all. As for the substance it selfe of this motion, the Senatours refused not: but they flatly said, that none but of the Nobilitie should have the making of those laws. Seeing then they agreed thus about the lawes, and differed only and squared about the Lawgiver, there were Embassadors sent to Athens, Sp. Posthumius Albus, A. Manlius, and P. Sulpitius Camerinus: who were commanded to exemplifie and copie out the famous and worthy lawes of Solon: to search out and learne the ordinances, customes, and rites of other citties in Greece. For any outward warres, this yeare was quiet, and the yeare following more quiet, when P. Curvatus and Sex. Quinctilius were Consuls, by reason of the continual silence of the Tribunes: which, as the expectation of the Embassadors that were gone to Athens, and of strange and forraine lawes, first and principally procured: so, two mightie calamities that rose both at once, to wit, famine and pestilence, noisome and loadsome both to man and beast, afterwards continued. By meanes whereof, the fields lay wast and desolate, the citie was dispeopled with continuall burials: many right worshipfull and honourable houses, thereby mourned. Sergius Cornelius, the Flamine of Quirinus died thereof. C. Horatius Pulvillus the Augur went of it likewise: in whose roome the Augurs (his confreers) chose C. Veturius: and the rather, because he had been condemned by the people. Quinctilius the Consull departed also this life, and foure Tribunes of the Commons. So that this was a yeare, with manifold losses and calamities foule destined. But for enemies, all was quiet. After this were C. Menenius, and P. Sestius Capitolinus made Consuls. In which yeare likewise there was no warre abroad, marry at home some troubles arose. By this time were the Embassadors returned with the Athenian lawes. And therefore the Tribunes were so much the more earnest & urgent, that once at length they would set on, to describe and put downe some lawes. And agreed it was, that there should be created Decemvirs, above all appeale: and for the yeare being, there should no other officers and magistrates be in place. Now, whether any of these might be of the Commons or no, that was a question: and hereupon some debate and controversie continued for a good while. At the last, the Nobles went away with it, and had the preheminence, upon this condition, that neither the law scilicet, concerning the Aventine mount, nor other sacred lawes should be repealed. Thus in the three hundred and second yeare after that Rome was built, was the forme of the citties government changed the second time, and from the Consuls to the Decemviri, was the soveraign rule translated, like as before, from the kings to the Consuls.

This change was lesse notable, in that it long continued not. The beginning of this Magistracie was faire and goodly to see to, but grew too rancke, and exceeded in overmuch licentiousnesse. The sooner therefore it faded and fell away, and the former government was taken up again, and both the name and jurisdiction of Consuls returned, and was conferred upon twaine. The Decemvirs created were these: Sp. Claudius, T. Genucius, P. Sestius, L. Veturius, C. Julius, A. Manlius, P. Sulpitius, P. Curvatus, T. Romulus, Sp. Posthumius, Claudius and Genucius, because they had been Consuls elect for that yeare, had this dignitie bestowed upon them, in lieu of the other. And Sestius, one of the Consuls the year before, because he had preferred this matter unto the Senatours, against his fellow Consuls will. Next to these were counted the three Embassadors that went to Athens, both for that they should be rewarded with this honourable dignitie, for their embassage into so farre and remote a cuntry, and also because men were perswaded, that by reason of their insight and skill in forraine ordinances of strange nations, they might be well employed in setting downe, and making of new. The rest made up the number. They say, that in the last scrutines and suffrages at this election, choise was made of those that were more aged, and farther steeped in yeares, to the end they might not so fiercely and stoutly gainesay and crosse the opinions and constitutions of the other. In this new state of government, Appius was the man that bare the greatest stroke, he ruled the rest and swaied all the rest, so highly stood he in grace and favour with the people. He had so altered his nature, and became such a new man, that all on a suddaine, of a cruell and terrible persecutor of the commons, he proved a very Publicola, and courter of the Communalitie, and one that lay for to get every gale of popular love and favour that might be had. Everie one sat his tenth day in place of judgement, and ministered justice in their severall turnes unto the people. On which day, the twelve knitches of rods were born by the Lictors before the soveraigne judge: as for his nine brethren, they had each of them one serjeant to give attendance. In this agreement among themselves, (which accord otherwhiles G when they were private persons, had been hurtfull unto them) rested only and wholly the greatest equitie towards others. A prooffe and argument of this their moderation, it shall be sufficient to observe now in the example and instance of one onely matter: For whereas they were created absolute, and past all appeale, it fortuned, that in the house of P. Sestius, a Nobleman, there was a dead bodie found buried, and brought forth openly into the publicke assemblie of the people. The thing being no lesse apparent in view, than hainous and horrible in fact, C. Claudius a Decemvir, brought Sestius in question therefore, put him in suit to answer at a certain day, and became plaintife unto the people, and accused that defendant, whose competent judge he was by order of law. And so he yeelded of his owne right: adding so much to the freedom of the people, as was taken from the power of his owne jurisdiction and government. When as now both high and low gave out, that this authoritie was sound and uncorrupt, and set as it were from Oracle, and Gods owne mouth, and all men willing to accept of justice at their hands: then set they to it, and went about the making and giving of lawes. And with great expectation of men, they set out ^{the ten tables of} ~~the~~ ^{Romane Lawes.} Tables, and called the people to a generall assemblie, commanding them in a good hower, and in the name of God to go, and (that which might turne to the good, to the benefite, & happines of the Commonweale, of themselves, their children and posteritie) to read the law there published: protesting, that they so farre as ten men could withall their wisdom foresee and provide for, had devised indifferent lawes, and equall for all sorts of calling, as well the best as the meanest. But for as much as the wits and heads of many men, were of deeper reach to see farther into things, they gave them good leave, to cast in their minds, and ponder with themselves each particular, yea and to reason together from point to point, and thereof to deliver their opinion openly, what was short and wanting, or what was superfluous, in everie article: and looke what lawes the consent of all men seemed to bring in, those should the people accept, and none other: that it might appear they were not so much to approve of them, and give their assent after they were propounded, as to propose and preferre them their own selves. And when as they were thought sufficiently corrected, according to the speeches of men, and as every one spake to the severall titles and chapters of the lawes, as they were set forth: then in the high court of parliament, assembled of all the Centuries and degrees of men, the laws of ten Tables were enacted and established. Which even at this day, among that infinite number of statutes, heaped and huddled one upon another, are the verie well-spring and fountaine of all justice, both publicke and private. After this, there ran a rumour abroad, That two tables were yet wanting, which if they were put unto the rest, then might the complete bodie as it were of the whole Romane law be finished and made perfite. The expectation thereof, now that the great Lic-day drew neere for the Election, made men very desirous to create Decemvirs againe, the second time. Now the Commons abroad, besides that they hated the verie name of Consuls, as well as of Kings, sought not greatly for the protection of the Tribunes: seeing that the Decemvirs one after another, yeelded in their prerogative, and admitted in some sort the appeale. But after that the solemne assemblie for the chusing of Decemvirs, was published against the Trinundinum*, or third market day next ensuing, to such an heighth was the ambition and desire of this dignitie growne, that the verie cheefe men, and principall heads of the cittie (for feare, I beleeve, least the possession of so great a government, in case they were not invested themselves in the place, should lie open unto some unmeet and unworthie persons) went about and made court to everie man, suing in humble manner to those verie Commons, with whom they had been at strife and variance, for that honour and dignitie, which they themselves had with all their power and might impugned. The worthinesse and reputation of men of those yeares, and having borne and gone through such offices, being now come in question, & submitted to the choise and judgement of others, pricked on Ap. Claudius, and set him forward. So as a man could hardly know whether to reckon him among the Decemvirs, or those that stood to be Decemvirs againe. For otherwhiles he was more like one that sued for an office, than him that presently bare office: blaming personages of best qualitie in the citie, and laying hard to their charge: but extolling the vaine & basest of the Competitors. Himselfe in person sorting among M the Duillij and teijij, and such like as favoured the Tribunes, went swinging and squaring in the common place, using them as instruments to vendicate himselfe forth to the common people. So long, as at length his verie brethren in office, who untill that time had bene singularly addicted and affectionated unto him, cast their eyes upon him, and began to marke, and marvaile much what his meaning was: reasoning thus among themselves: Surely there is no found- nesse

A nesse nor goodnesse herein, but all meere dissimulation and hypocrisie. Certes, it is not for nought, that in such pride of his, there should appeare so much courtesie. What? to force his owne nature too much within compasse: to debase himselfe, and suffer private men to bee his fellowes, was a signe of one, that made not so much hast to forgoe a dignitie and promotion, as sought meanes to keepe it still: Openly they durst not presume to checke and withstand his ambitious desire, but assailed by pleasing and soothing him up, to repress and bridle his foolish affection. And seeing he was the youngest of his companie, they all with one accord laid upon him the charge, to hold the high court for the Election of Decemvirs. Their drift and policie was, that he should not elect his owne selfe: a thing, which unlesse it were the Tribunes againe, (and that was a most dangerous precedent and example) no man ever had don before. And he, with all his heart accepting thereof, made profession that he would be President of that honourable court and Session, and praised to the gods that he might performe it for the benefit of the weale publicke. And so, tooke the vantage of that opportunity, to set forward his owne designe, which they meant should have stopped and crossed the same. And after he had by secret packing and canvassing with the other competitor, and given the repulse unto the two Quintij (Capitolinus, and Cincinthus) and put beside the quishion his owne Vnckle by the fathers side (C. Claudius, a most stout and resolute champion of the Nobilitie) with other citizens of like marke and qualitie: he createth Decemvirs, such as were not for worth, port, and haviour, to them comparable, and his owne sweete selfe with the first. Which as there was no man thought he ever would have done, so all good men misliked when it was done. With him were C elected M. Cornelius Maluginensis, M. Sergius. L. Minutius. Q. Fabius Vibulanus. Q. Petilius. T. Antonius Merenda. Cajo Duillius. Sp. Oppius Cornicen. M. Rabuleius. And there an end of Appius playing another mans part. Off went his maske and visour now, and so from thenceforth, he began to shew himselfe in his owne likeness, and to live in his kinde: yea and to frame his new companions to the bent of his bow, even before they were entred into office. Daie by daie had they their secret meetings by themselves apart from all other: and being once hereby furnished with ungratious and proud designments, which they had closely complotted together, they could no longer hold and dissimule their pride. Few might have access to them: feld would they be spoken with, shewing themselves strange, surly, and churlish to those that came unto them. Thus drew they the time on, unto the * Ides of Maie, which was the usuall and solemne daie then, of entering into offices of government. In the very beginning wherof, they made the first day of their magistracie noted, by an intimation and evident shew of exceeding terror. For whereas the Decemvirs their predecessors, had observed this order, That one alone should have the rods of State borne before him, and that these regall ornaments should passe round through them all in course one after another: Behold, these came all of them abroad, and each of them had his xij. bundles of rods caried before him. So that these Lic-tors, 120 in number, with their rods and axes too, fastned within the rods, tooke up and filled the whole Forum of common place, as they went. And for as much as they were created absolutely, and their commissiō ran without all appeale, men made this exposition, That to go with their axes or without was all one, and made no matter at all. Thus there was a shew and representation of ten KK. And this terror grew more & more E not with the meanest and basest sort only, but also with the chiefe and best of the Patritians: supposing that they sought to pick a quarell, and to minister occasion and ouerture to some massacre: that if any man should offer either in the Senate or among the people, to speake one word concerning libertie, forthwith there should be exemplarie whipping and heading, to the terror of all others. For, besides that, from the people there was no remedie and succour to be had, by reason that the appeale unto them was quite disanulled and taken away: the Decemvirs themselves, drew so all in one line together, and were so combined and linked, that there was no hope at all, that one would thwart and crosse that which another did: whereas the former Decemvirs could well abide, that their judgements and sentences should be censured and corrected, by the appellation or appeale to one of their brethren in commissiō: yea and in some cases put off F some matters from themselves to be decided by the people, which seemed properly to belong unto their owne jurisdiction. For a while, the feare was to all indifferent: but by little and little, the Commons onely began to seele the finart. The Nobles were forborne and escaped cleare and scotfree: the meane persons went to the wals, and with them they dealt according to their lust and pleasure right cruelly. The person wholly they regarded, and never respected the cause, as with whom favour and friendship prevailed as much as equity and right should have done. At home in their houses, they determined of matters how they should passe: and in open place G they pronounced sentence accordingly. If a man had appealed to one of their bench, from him unto whom he fled for reliefe, he went his waies again by weeping crosse, repenting that he stood not to the order and injunction awarded by the former. It was thought and spoken also abroad, but the first author would not be known, That they had conspired together, nor for the present time onely to doe wrong and injurie, but also were confedered betwene themselves privily, yea and had bound it with an oath, to call no assembly at all for the electing of newe magistrates: but being now once invested in the soveraigne rule, to hold the possession of the Decemvirship for ever. The Commons then began to looke about them, to behold and advise well the countenances of the Nobles, to see if they could from them, catch some good gale of wind, some hope againe of libertie, at whose hands they fearing bondage, had brought the common- H weale to this hard passe. The LL. of the Senate hated the Decemvirs, they hated also the Commons. They liked not of things as they went, and yet were persuaded that the Commons were well enough served, and deserved no better: who gaping greedily after libertie were now fallen and plunged into servitude and thraldome. Helpe they would not with the least of their fingers, but rather heape more wrongs upon them: that having a wearisome and tedious loathing of the present state, they might fall to a longing desire after two Consuls, and with the old world were come againe. By this time now was the better part of the yeare gone and past: and the two tables of laws were annexed to the other ten of the former yeare: which if they might be once confirmed and ratified by a parliament of the Centuries, there remained nothing behind, for which the common-weale should need these magistrates: but expected it was certainly, that the assembly I for Election of Consuls should out of hand be published and proclaimed. Marry, there was one thing hammered in the Commons heads, By what meanes they might revive againe the Tribunes authoritie, the very grand bulwark of their freedome, & a thing that now had discontinued and lien dead. But all this while there was not a word of the new Election. And the Decemvirs, who at the first presented usually unto the Commons sight, a crew of those that favoured the Tribunes, for to attend upon their persons, (a thing right plausible and pleasing unto the people:) were guarded now, with certaine tall pensioners of their Nobilitie: whole troupes of them stood about their Tribunal seats and places of judgment. These made havock and spoile of the Commons and their goods: and looke what the mind of a mightie man stood unto and lusted after, it was his hap to have it, whatsoever. Nay, there was no spare now made of their backs and sides: X some were scourged with rods, some lost their heads by the ax. And because this crueltie should not go unrewarded; lightly there was none executed, if he were worth any thing, but his goods went after, and were begged or given away. The youth of the Nobilitie, by this kind of hire well fleshed; not onely opposed not themselves to withstand these wrongfull dealings and hard courses, but carried it afore them, openly professing and avowing that they wished rather their own licentiousnes, than the liberty of al. The *Ides of May were now come about, and no new magistrates elected in the others roome. Forth come the Decemvirs, (who to say a truth and to give them their right, were no other than privat persons) neither with mindes abated for the exercising of their imperious rule, nor with fewer regal ensignes, to set out & shew their honor and dig- L nity. When the people saw that, they made no other reckoning, but this was plaine usurping of the Kings government, and no better: And now farewell freedome for ever and a day. For neither had they presently, nor hereafter were they like to have any man to recover it againe. So that now, not they onely let fall their hearts and were discouraged in themselves, but also grew to be contemptible in the eyes of their neighbour-nations: who disdained highly, that they should have soveraintie of rule, who were not free themselves, nor enjoyed their owne libertie. For the Sabines with a strong power invaded the Territories of Rome: and when they had harried farre and neere, and driven away booties both of people and of cataille, without impeach- ment, they gathered their armie together againe, that had raunged here and there up & downe, and retired to Eretum, where they encampe themselves: laying this for a ground, and building their hope upon the discord at Rome, that it would stay their mustering. Not only the newes M that came hereof, but the flying of the countrie pezants, put the whole citie in great feare. The Decemvirs fall to consulting what were best to doe. And whiles they were to seeke what course to take, and betwene the hatred of the Nobles and the Commons utterly forlorne and destitute, there happened also another fearfull trouble in the taile of the former. The Equians from another side were encamped in Algidum. And from Tusculum Embassadors brought tidings

A tidings that their countrie was wasted with excursions from thence, wherupon they craved their help and aide. These fearefull occurrents so troubled and perplexed the Decemvirs, that considering the citie was now beset at once with warres from two places, their stomacks were come downe to consult with the Senate. They commanded therefore the Senatours to be summoned to the Curia. And well they wist, what a great fit and storme of anger, displeasure and blame was toward them, that they would burden them and lay to their charge, how they were the onely cause both of the countrie wasted already, and of the perils like presently to ensue: looking for no other, but that there would be given an attempt and shrewd push, to abolish utterly their government, unless they stuck closely together to it, and by extending their authoritie sharply upon some few of the stoutest, quaille and crulhe the attempts of others. After the voice B of the Bell was heard in the Forum or common place, citing the Senatours to repaire into the Council house to the Decemvirs: the noveltie and strangenesse of the matter, (because they had laid downe for along time the manner of calling them to counsell) caused the Commons to mar- vaille and muse what was befallen, that they should after such discontinuance, take up a thing so forlet and out of use. And thus they conceived of it, that they were much beholding to their enemies, and might thanke war for this, that any auncient guise and custome of a free citie was come up and in ure againe. They looked about on every side of the Forum, to see if they might es- C pie a Senatour: but few or none could they heare off, any where. Then looked they into the Curia, and beheld, none at all appeared about the Decemvirs. Wherof, their owne selves, even the Decemvirs could gather no otherwise, but that in the conceipt and consent of all men, their go- vernment was become odious: and the Commons also thus collected and interpreted, That the Senatours met not together, because privat men (such as the Decemvirs were indeed) had no au- thoritie to assemble a Senate. And now, said they, is the way and enurance made to recover their libertie againe, if for be the Commons would joine with the Senate: and as the Nobles being called, meet not together in counsell, so the Commons likewise would refuse to be mustered. In this wise muttered and whispered the Commons. And in truth, scarcely was there any one of the Senatours about the common place, and but few within the citie: for very grieve and indigni- tie to see that things went as they did, they had withdrawn themselves into the countrie to their lands: and forgetting the state of the common-weale, they became carefull of their owne privat D affaires: thinking themselves so farre forth freed from oppression and wrong, as they were remote and sequestred from the societie, meeting and conference, with so lordly and imperious rulers. When they would not assemble at their summons, the officers were sent unto their houses, both for to streine and take away strenges for their contumacie and disobedience: and also to enquire and learne, whether they refused to come at their commandement, of set purpose or no. And word they bring backe, that the Senatours were in the countrie. The Decemvirs were better paid to heare that, than if answer had come that they were at home and refused to obey. Then they gave commandement that they should be sent for: and they warned a Senate house against the next day following: where they assembled in more number than they looked for. Whereupon the Commons supposed that their libertie was bought and sold and utterly betrayed by the No- E bles, for that the Senate had yielded obedience to them (that now by right were out of their of- fice) as if they had given lawfull summons, who being private men had no power at all, so to do. But they shewed more obeisance and submission (as we have heard say) in coming to the coun- sell house, than any disposition to deliver their mindes and opinions there, to the liking & plea- sures of the Decemvirs. First, L. Valerius Potius, as it is recorded, after that Appius Claudius had proposed unto them the cause of their meeting, before they were required their advise in order and course, claimed the libertie of the house, to speak in the behalfe of the common-weale. But when as the Decemvirs denied it flatly, yea and forbad him with threats, upon paine of their high displeasure: he inferred againe and menaced, that he would go forth unto the Commons, and so began a broile and tumult. M. Horatius Barbatus likewise tooke part with him, and was nothing behind in stoutnesse to maintaine the quarell, terming them the ten Tarquines: and are ye avised (quoth he) how the Kings were in times past expelled by the Valerij and Hora- F rij? And yet the name it was not of Kings, that men were so wearie of and loathed in those daies. For why? It was right lawfull to call Jupiter by that name: wherby Romulus also the found- er of this Citie, and other Princes his successours have beene called: yea and the name hath beene used and is retained still as a solemne title, in the sacred rites of holy Kirke. Nay, it was the pride and oppression of the king, that then was odious, and nothing els: which en- L iij ormities omnibus, if they were in those daies in the king himselfe, a lawfull prince, or in the king his sonne. G. intolerable, who can abide and endure the same in so many private persons? I advise you therefore to take heed how you debarre men of their libertie of speech in counsell house, least ye drive them thereby to speake their mind and complaine without the counsell house. Neither see I any reason at all, why it were not as lawfull for me a private man, to assemble the people to sit and once, as for you to call the Senate together to a counsell. Make triall whensoever ye will, ye shall find how much more forcible our iust greefe will be, in recovering our libertie againe, than this greedie desire of yours, in holding and upholding still your usurped, and tyrannicall rule. You have propounded here unto us, forsooth, concerning the Sabines warre: as who would say, the people of Rome can be at greater warre with any than with those, who having been created Magistrates onely for the publishing and enacting of certaine lawes, have left now neither H law nor justice at all within the citie. VVho have taken away their Comices, i. Courts and Lictes of Election, their yearly Magistrates, the successeive change and course of bearing rule, the only thing that maketh Isonomie, and equalitie of freedome: VVho being but private men, are possessed both of regall ornaments, and also of roiall government. After the expulsion of the kings, the Magistrates that succeeded were of the Nobilitie: in processe of time, upon the rising of the Commons and their departure, there were officers chosen out of the Communitie. I demand of you, and I would gladly know, of whither State and bodie are ye? Are ye, I pray you, popular, and of the common people? VVhat have ye ever done with advise and approbation of the people? Are ye Nobles and Peeres? who now for a whole yeares space almost, have held no counsell of Senators. And now that ye have assembled them, you restraîne them from speaking I for the Weale publicke. Well, presume not too much, neither beare your selves upon the timo-rousnesse of others. For, truite me truly, the indignities that men already suffer, seeme more ike-some and unsupportable, than whatsoever els they can doubt and feare hereafter. As Horatius spake these words aloud, and the Decemvirs could not bethinke themselves of some indifferent and meane course, either in anger to be revenged, or in lenitie to pardon and put up all, nor wist whereto this matter might tend and proceed in the end: then C. Claudius, uncle to Appius the Decemvir, began to speake, rather by way of praier and intreatie, than in checking and reproo-ving wise, and besought Appius for his brothers soule sake, who was his owne father, to remember and regard more that civile societie wherein he was borne, than this ungracious and wicked confederacie, contracted with his fellow Decemvirs. And this request I make (quoth he) tende- K ring your private estate more than the Commonweale. As for her, if she might not by faire means, and with their good wils, obtaine her owne due and right, she would by foule waies, and in spite of their hearts recover it in the end. And for as much as, of much debate & strife there ensue commonly heats of anger and cankered rancour, I am in dread and horror what the sequell and illie will be of these jarrs. Now when as the Decemvirs would not permit the rest to speake, but only to the point propofed & occasion of their meeting, yet they were abashed to interrupt the speech of Claudius & to cut him off: but suffered him to go on untill he made an end. And in conclusion his opinion and sentence was, that he would not (to abide by it) agree, that any Act of the Senate should for that time passe in that behalfe. And all that were present tooke his words so, as if Claudius deemed no otherwise of the Decemvirs, than of private men. Many of them also, such especially as had been Consuls, were of his mind, and said as much. Another opinion there was, more rough and sharpe in outward shew, but faire lesse forcible and effectually in deed: assisting and willing the Nobles, to make no more adoe, but to goe together and chuse an Interregent. For this man seemed yet, to account and judge them Magistrates, (bad though they were) that had called a Senate, and held them in counsell: whereas the former, that would not abide any Act to passe, reckoned them but for private persons. Thus when the Decemvirs cause began to shrink and goe downward, L. Cornelius Maluginensis, brother to Cornelius the Decemvir, being reserved of purpose to give his opinion in the last place of all the Consular Senators, such as had been Consuls, pretending a care that he had of the warre, tooke part with his brother and his Colleagues, saying, that he marvelled much by what misfortune or destinie it M happened, that the Decemvirs should be challenged and oppugned, especially by those that had stood for the Decemvirship, or by their friends and associates: and how it came about, that in so many moneths space, whiles the citie was at rest and without feare of warre, no man made question or doubt, whether they that were in place, and governed the State, were lawfull Magistrates or no: and now at last, when the enemies are in manner at the gates, they should sow civile dif-sention,

A sention, unlesse this were the meaning of it, that in a troubled state it would not be so clearly seen and perceived, what they went about. But no man is able (quod he) to set down a true doome, and alledge a ruled case in so great a matter as this is, to men, whose minds are busied and wholly possessed of a greater care. And therefore my opinion is, that concerning that point which Valerius and Horatius charged the Decemvirs with, namely, That before the Ides of May their government was determined, and they out of office; the Senate should discusse and debate, when as the warres now at hand were dispatched, and the Commonweale brought once againe to quietnes.
 And that Appius Claudius should make this reckoning even now aforehand, and know, that hee is to render a reason of that high court of parliament, which for the election of Decemvirs hee called and held, being a Decemvir himselfe: namely, VVhether they were created for one yeare only, or to continue still, untill the other laws which yet are wanting, were ratified and confirmed.
 B As for the present time, he thought good that all other matters should surcease, and bee passed over, save the warre only: the rumour wherof, if they thought to be false, and that they were but tales that not only the messengers, but also the Embassadors of the Tuscules reported, then his advise was to send out espials, who upon their discoverie might bring more certaine tidings.
 But in case they gave credence to messengers and Embassadors both, then with all speed possible to muster, and the Decemvirs to have the conduct of the armies, and to lead them whither they thought meet: and that nothing els should be thought upon before this. VVhich opinion of his, that it might prevaile and take effect, the punie Senators by importunate canvassing, obtained. Then Valerius and Horatius both, rose up the second time more fierce and eager than before, calling upon them alowd, that they might bee permitted to speake concerning the Commonweale: and in case they might not bee suffered by reason of the side, to have the libertie of speech in the counsell house, they would speake their mind without, before the people. For neither could private men (as they were) debarre them in Senate house, or in open assembly; and to give place unto their imaginarie, and pretended imperiall ensignes, they would never be brought. Then Appius supposing the matter wel-neere come to this passe, that unlesse the violence were resisted with like boldnesse, their rule was at an end, and their authoritie conquered: Yee were not best (quoth he) to speake but to the matter, whereupon we sit in consultation. And when Valerius replied againe, and said plainly, That he would not hold his tongue for a private mans commaundment: Appius sent a Sergeant unto him. Whereupon, Valerius cried D for helpe to the Quirites, from the porch of the Counsell house. Then L. Cornelius clasping Appius about the middle, without regard to content him whose good hee pretended, staid the strife. So by the mediation of Cornelius, leave was graunted to Valerius for to say his mind at his owne pleasure. But, for as much as his libertie proceeded no farther, than to some few words, the Decemvirs held on their purpose still, and had their desire. The Nobles also, such as had been Consuls, and the Ancients, upon an old cankered hatred that they bare still against the Tribunes authoritie, whereunto they supposed the Commons were much more devoted and affected, than unto the government of the Consuls, were rather inclined and willing that the Decemvirs of their owne accord should themselves afterwards forgoe their office, than that upon hatred and malice received against them, the Commons should take heart of grasse, E and hold up head againe. For if with gentle handling of the matter, without stir and clamour of the people, the regiment returned againe unto the Consuls, it would haply come to passe, that either by means of warres comming betwene, or through the moderation of the Consuls in their government, the Commons might in time forget the Tribunes quite.

Thus whiles the Nobles were silent and made no more words, a muster was proclaimed, and the younger sort of the people, seeing the government of the Decemvirs absolute and without appeale, made answer to their names. And when the legions were enrolled, the Decemvirs took order and agreed betwene themselves, who should goe forth to the wars, and who should have the command of the forces. The cheefe and principall of the Decemvirs were Q. Fabius, and Appius Claudius. And for that there seemed greater warre at home than abroad, the Decemvirs F supposed the violent nature of Appius, fitter to repress all troubles and mutinies in the citie; and considering withall the disposition of Fabius, to be lesse constant and resolute in goodnesse, than active and quick in militarie service, (for this man having been in times past of great worth, both at home, and also in warre; the Decemvirship, and the conditions of his colleagues together, had so greatly changed, that he chose rather to bee like Appius than himselfe) to him therefore was imposed the charge of the warre against the Sabines, together with M. Rabulcius and *Q. Peti-

lius joined in commission with him. M. Cornelius was sent into Algidum, with L. Minutius, T. Antonius, Cato Duilius, and M. Sergius. And they ordaine and appoint Sp. Oppius as assistant to Appius Claudius, for the defence and government of the cittie, and to have the full authoritie of all the ten Decemvirs. But the Common-weale sped no better abroad in warfare, than it fared at home. The onely fault in the Generals was this, That they had made themselves odious to their souldiors and citizens: all the weight els lay in the souldiors themselves. Who to the end that nothing might go well forward and prosper under the leading and conduct of the Decemvirs, suffered themselves to their owne shame, and dishonor of their capitaines, to be defeated: for the armies were both by the Sabines at Eretum, and also by the Æquians in Algidum discomfited. They that fled from Eretum in the dead of the night, had encamped and fortified upon an high ground nearer unto the cittie of Rome, betwene Fidene and Crustumina. And when the enemy pursued them still and provoked them to fight, they would never come forth into the plaine and even ground, to encounter with them in a pight battaile, but stood upon their guard and defended themselves, trusting in the situation of the place & their rampier, and nothing upon their owne manhood and force of armes. But in Algidum they committed a more foule and beastly fault, and received withall a greater losse and overthrow: inasmuch as having lost their campe with all their tents, the souldiors being turned out of bag and baggage, their harnais and implements of necessarie use, retired for refuge to Tusculum, hoping there to be entertained as guests, and to live upon the protection, mercie and devotion of their hostis and freinds: who failed and deceived not their expectation. But to Rome there came such fearefull news, that the Senatours and Nobles laying apart now all hatred against the Decemvirs, thought good to keepe watch and ward in the cittie: and commanded as many as were able to beare armes, to keepe the wals and guard the gates: they gave order also to send harnais and armour to supply their want at Tusculum: moreover, That the Decemvirs should abandon the castle at Tusculum, and with their souldiors take the field and keepe the campe: That they likewise should dislodge and remove from Fidene, that lay fortified there, and remove into the countrie of the Sabines: so that by making wars upon the enemies first, they might scare and divert them from pursuing their intent of giving assault unto the cittie of Rome. Besides these damages and foiles sustained at the enemies hands, the Decemvirs committed both in warre abroad, and also in the cittie at home, two most wicked and horrible facts. For whereas one L. Siccius, during their aboad in the Sabines countrie (upon an odious conceit & malice against the Decemvirs) had gone up and down, and in secret talke whispered in the eares of the common souldiors, some mention of creating Tribunes, and of another insurrection and departure: him the Decemvirs dispatch afore, to espie out a convenient plot of ground to encampe in. Now they had given those souldiors in charge, whom they sent to accompanie him in that expedition, to set upon him in some fit place of advantage and to kill him. And kill him they did, but to their owne cost: for whiles he fought in his owne defence, some of those that laid for his mischiefe, died for it, and lay along about him for companie: for being a right stout and strong man of his hands, he stood to it courageously: and notwithstanding he was beset round about, he defended himselfe very manfully. The rest that escaped bring word into the camp, that Siccius was fallen unawares into an ambushment, and whiles he fought lustily, was with certaine other of the souldiors slaine. At the first, credit was given to him that brought the newes. But afterwards, when as there was a band of souldiors thither sent by the permission of the Decemvirs, to burie them that there lay dead: they observing none of their bodies there, to be disarmed and dispoiled, and Siccius lying in the midst in his armour, and all the rest of the dead with their faces towards him: no corps of enemy, nor footing of them departing thencefro, brought away with them his dead carcasfe, and made report, that undoubtedly and past all peradventure, he was murdered by his owne companie. Hereupon was the whole campe fulfilled with hatred and detestation of this fact, and generally it was agreed, that Siccius forthwith should be conveyed to Rome, had not the Decemvirs made hast to solemnise his funerals souldiorlike, at the public charges of the common treasure. So, entered was he with exceeding sorrow and mourning of the souldiors, but to the most shamefull obloquie and infamie of the Decemvirs, amongst the common sort.

Now followeth the other heinous deede committed within the cittie: which began of wanton lust, and had as foule and shamefull an end, as that, which upon the carnall abusing and bloudie death of Lucretia, cast the Tarquines out of the cittie, and deprived them of their regall dignitie:

- A dignitie: that both KK and Decemvirs, might have not only the like successe and issue, but also one and the selfesame cause, of loosing their rule & dominion. Appius Claudius enamoured upon a virgin, a commoners daughter, lusted to the abuse and spoile of her bodie. The father of the maiden L. Virginus, was of good calling, and in place of credit in the camp that lay in Algidum, and had the leading there of a companie: a man of honest example and conversation of life, both at home and also abroad in warfare. His wife likewise of vertuous disposition: so were their children nurtred and taught accordingly. He had espoused and affianced his daughter in marriage to one L. Icilius, a man of stout courage (as having been Tribune) and whose vertue and valour, had been well tried and approved in the quarrell and defence of the comminaltie. This damsell in the prime of her yeares, passing faire and beautifull withall, Appius (I say) cast a fancie and liking unto, and so burned in love of her, that he assaied with gifts and faire promises to win her good will. But seeing all guarded and surely fenced with maidenly shamefastnes and honestie, he bent his mind wholly to cruell and proud violence. He suborneth and setteth on a favourite and follower of his, one M. Claudius, to make challenge and lay claime unto her as his bondmaid: and not to give place nor yeeld her unto them, that required to have her at libertie out of his hands, during the suite, and untill she brought prooffe of her freedom: supposing, because the father of the virgin was absent, he had good opportunitie to worke this feate, and compass his intended injurie. As the maiden therefore was coming into the market place, (for there were the schooles for peties kept, of reading and writing) the Decemvirs man (a broker to serve his masters lust) laid hold upon her, avowing that she was his bondservants daughter, and therefore his bondmaid: commanding her to follow him, and threatening besides, that if she made any staies, he would have her away perforce. The feartull girle hereat was amazed, and her nurse withall cride to the Quirites for helpe: wherupon the people came running & flocked together all about them. Now was the name of Virginus her father, and likewise of Icilius her spouse, verie gracious and popular: so that the love and favour wherein they stood, raised friends and acquaintance: and the indignitie of the thing besides, moved the wole multitude to tender the cause of the damosell. When as therefore she was now past danger of violence, the partie that made claime unto her, said there was no need that the people thus should gather together, for his meaning was to proceede onely by order of law, and not with any violent course. And so he cited her to the court, minding to commens his action against her, and put her in suite. Then they that were present to assist her, persuaded her to follow. Now when they were come before Appius, sitting judicially upon his tribunall seate, the plaintife or challenger aforesaid, declareth against her, and telleth a tale full well known to the judge himselfe, being the authour and deviser of the whole matter and argument: Namely, that the maiden was borne in his house, and by stealth was from thence conveyed home to Virginus, and so was his supposed and reputed daughter: this he averred to have certaine knowledge of, by pregnant evidences and witnesses: and would make prooffe thereof to be most true, and let Virginus himselfe be the judge, whom the greater part of this wrong deeply touched: in the meane while, it was but meete and reason, that the bondmaid should go with her master. The friends and advocats of the damosell, having alleaged and pleaded in her behalfe, that Virginus was absent and employed in the affaires of common-weale: and if he had word therof, would not faile but be at home within two daies: that it was no reason, that whiles a father was away, he should be in contention and controversie about his children: they required of Appius therefore to defer and put off the hearing of the whole matter, untill her fathers coming; and that according to a law by himselfe in that case made and provided, he would grant her to be at large and stand at libertie, for to bring in proofes that she was not bond: and that he would not suffer a maiden of those yeares, ripe and readie for a husband, to be more in hazard and danger of her good name, than prejudiced in the triall of her freedom. Appius made a long preface and discourse before his decree, namely, how much he favoured and rendered the cause of libertie, and to that effect, alledged the selfesame law which the friends of Virginus pretended for their purpose and demand. But so furre forth, and no otherwise, should there be in that law assured safeguard of freedom, as the case altered not in circumstance of causes and persons. For, this privilege and benefit held onely in those that were claimed to bee free, where any man whosoever might goe to law and plead. As for her, who was in her fathers hand and at his disposition, there was no other man els, unto whom the Maister that maketh challenge, is to yeeld the right of his possession. His pleasure therefore was, and thus he decreed, That the father should be sent for:

for: and that in the meane season, hee that made title to her, should not bee prejudiced thereby, G but that he might lead away the wench, promising and assuming to have her forthcomming, and to present her in court, at the returne of him who is pretended and nominated to bee: her father.
 Against this injurious decree, when as many men rather muttered and murmured, than any one durst resist and contradict it, P. Numitorius, the maidens uncle by the mothers side, and Scilius her espoused husband, happened to come in place: and having way made them through the throng and presse, the multitude thought verily, that by the comming, especially of Scilius, Appius might have been resisted and crossed. But then the Licitor pronounced that Appius had passed an order and decree already, and put Scilius backe: who cried out aloud, (for so manifest and horrible a wrong had been y enough to have mooved a very Saint, and set on fire a right mild natured person) Nay Appius (quoth he) thou hadst more need to set me backe with force of arms, H if thou wouldst goe cleare away, and not be spoken to, for that which thou wouldst doe in huck-ker macker. This maid, I tell thee, I meane shall goe with me: I purpose to have her to my selfe, an honest and pure virgine, and enjoy her in lawfull marriage, as my wedded wife: call therefore unto thee all the Licitors besides (thou were best) that belong to thy companions: cause both rods and axes to be made ready: I tell thee, Scilius his espoused wife, shall not abide in any place without hir fathers house. What? although yee have taken from the Commons of Rome the Tribunes assistance and protection, and the priviledge of Appeale, two principall bulwarkes for defence of their libertie: yee are not therefore allowed to rule and tyrannise, and to fulfill your lust upon our children & wives too. Exercise your rigour and crueltie, and spare not, upon our backs and sides in scourging us, yea upon our necks and heads also, in taking them from our shoulders: I so yee forbear to assaile our chastitie and honestie. Wherunto, if any violence shall be offered, I will for my part, call for the helpe of the Quirites here present, in the behalfe of my spouse: and Virginus for himselfe will call to the souldiours, in regard of his onely daughter: we will crie for helpe of God and man: and cost it shall our lives before thou goe away with this decree, and put it in execution. I require and charge thee, O Appius therefore, to be well advised, and looke how farr thou doest proceed. Let Virginus when he is come, see to his daughter, how he dealeth about her: and let him know thus much for certaine, that if he give place to this plainties assertion, and forgoe the present possession of her, he shall goe seeke his estate and propertie that he hath in his daughter. As for me, in this quarrell of maintaining the freedome of my spouse, I wil lose my life, before I faile in my faithfull promise to her made. Hereat the whole multitude was moved, and like it was, that some mutinie and fray would presently have ensued. For the Licitors had hemmed in Scilius on everie side. Howbeit they proceeded no farther than to big words and high threats: whiles Appius laid hard to Scilius, That he did not this so much in the behalfe and defence of Virginus, as, (being himselfe an unrule person, and even already breathing forth a Tribunes spirit) sought meanes, and picked occasion of an uprore and sedition. Howbeit for his part, he would not that day minister unto him any matter thereof. And that he might now well know, that he did not this to feed his malapert saucinesse, but in regard of the absence of Virginus, and for the name of a father, and the tender respect of freedome, hee would not that day sit to heare and determine the matter, nor award a definitive judgement in that case: but would request Marcius Claudius, to suspend his action, and to forbear and yeeld so much of his owne right, as to suffer the maiden to be bailed and goe under sureties, and to be at her libertie untill the next day. But in case her father appeared not in court the morrow after, he gave Scilius, and such as hee was, to wit and understand, that neither the law should want the patronage of the maker, nor the Decemvir faile in courage and resolution: neither would hee call together his fellowes officers and sergeants, for to keep under such seditious and turbulent spirits as he was: but would content him selfe with his owne Licitors, and doe well ynough. The time now of effecting this injurie, being thus deferred, and the maidens advocates gone aside, they agreed first of all upon this point, that a brother of Scilius, and a sonne of Numitorius, two lustie and nimble young men, should be dispatched straight from thence to the gate: and that with all speed possible Virginus should bee sent for home from the campe: for that it stood the maiden upon, as much as her whole estate and life was worth: that he would be present and ready in due time the day following, to preserve her from this hard course, and wrongfull proceeding. According as they were bidden, they set forward, and spared no horticest, untill they brought tidings hereof to her father. All this while the plaintie that made challenge to the maiden, was very instant with Scilius to baile her, and put in sureties. And he again made answer, That he went about it as fast as he could, and did nothing els:

A els: but indeed, trifling out the time for the nonce, untill the messengers that were sent to the campe, were gotten afore well onward on their way. Then the whole multitude on all sides held up their hands, in token that they offered themselves everie one unto Scilius, ready to become bound. Whereupon, he burst out into tears for tender heart. Gramercie (quoth he) my maisters all, to morrow I will use your helping hand: for this time I am sped of sureties ynough. So was Virginus set at libertie, and bailed by the suretiship of her kinsfolke. Then Appius, after hee had staied a while, because hee would not seeme to have sitten for that matter alone, when hee saw all other suits and causes omitted, in regard they had to it, and no man comming to him for justice, he arose, gat him home to his house, & wrote unto his brethren Decemvirs into the campe, that they should not give Virginus his passport, but keepe him fast in durance, and in ward. This wicked practise (as God would have it) came short. For Virginus already had gotten his discharge, and was departed forward on his journey, in the evening by the setting of the first watch. And verie earely in the morning came the letters for to stay him, but all in vaine.
 For Virginus by breake of day was arrived: by which time the whole cittie resorted into the common place, standing and waiting wistly for his comming. And thither, he himselfe being in soiled and simple array, brought his daughter in her old worne clothes, accompanied with certaine wives, and a great number of advocats and friends: Then and there began he to go from one man to another, and to labour them hard: and not onely besought their assistance by way of intreatie and praier, but also required it as due and deserved: saying, that he stood daily in field ready to fight in defence of their wives and children: neither could there be reported of C any man more hardie exploits and valiant pieces of service in warre, than of himselfe. But what booteth or availeth all this (quoth he) to save the cittie from enemies, in case our children be forced to abide the utmost extremities that befall unto citties taken by the enemies? thus went he about preaching as it were from one man to another. Semblably Scilius cast soorth and redoubled like speeches freely and spared not. But the traine of women, with their still & silent weeping, moved men more than any words uttered. All this notwithstanding, Appius in his obsti-nat mind (so disquieted was he & wholly possessed with a forcible spirit of humorous madnesse rather than of amorous passion) ascended up into the tribunall. Where, as the plaintie first of himselfe was framing some short complaint, that by reason of partiall favour and making of great friends, he could not have law and justice the day past: before that either he had made an end of his demand, or given leisure to Virginus for to put in his answer accordingly: Appius D interrupted the speech, and began himselfe. What preamble it was that he made before his decree, peradventure some auntient writers have for truth recorded. But for as much as I cannot any where find, in so shamefull a decree, that which carrieth but a shew and soundeth like a truth: therefore, that only which is of all agreed upon, I thought best to set downe, even the sentence barely without any preface at all namely, That he iudged her in the behalfe of the Plaintie to be his bond-servant. First, all men there, wondered at this unworthie & foule act: and being stricken therewith astonied, for a good while after, stood still and held their peace. But afterwards, when as M. Claudius, went to lay hand on the maiden, amongst the dames that stood about her, and was received with a piteous lamentation, and crye of the women: Then Virginus beckning with his hands and shaking them at Appius: To Scilius (quoth he) have I betrothed my daughter and not E to thee O Appius: brought her up I have for honest and chaste wedlock, & not for uncleane and filthie whordome: to be a wife another day, and not an harlot. Is this the manner of it, like bruit and wild beasts without all regard, to leape and run upon you care not whom, and to fulfill your fleshly lust? How these that be here will suffer such pranks, I know not: but they that are in camp with sword in hand, I hope, will never put them up. Now when as he that challenged the maiden was by a knot of women and advocates that stood about her repelled back, then proclaimed the bedell and commanded silence. And the Decemvir having his head intoxicated, and altogether carried away with unbridled lust, brake forth and said, That he had certaine intelligence and was informed of a truth, by manifest and assured evidences, (and not induced and led thereto by the reviling taunts of Scilius yesterday, and the violent proceedings of Virginus, whereof he had the people of Rome to beare witness, and which might give some light and presumptions) That the night past, there were meetings and conventicles in the cittie, and all to raise a mutinie and insurrection: and therefore, he not ignorant of such a broile and riot toward, was come downe into the common place with a guard of armed men: not minding to hurt any one that would keepe the peace, but onely by vertue of the majestic of government and authoritie, to repress such as troubled words to Appius.*

troubled the peaceable state of the citie: therefore it were best for them to be still and quiet. Go G Sergeant (quoth he) cause the people to avoid the place, and make roome for the master to lay hand upon his bondslave: and after he had thundred out these wordes full of ire and wrath, the multitude of themselves gave backe and made way: so the poore silly wench stood all forlorne and left as a prey to their injurious clutches. Then Virginius seeing all past helpe and no other remedie: Well Appius (quoth he) pardon me first I beseech thee, if upon a fatherly affection and griefe of heart, I have let fall some shrewd and curst words against thee more than was be-seeming: Then give me leave here before the virgin, to enquire of her nourse the truth of this matter, that if I have fathered her untruly, I may goe hence better apaid & satisfied in my mind.
Leave being granted, he led his daughter and the nourse apart from the rest, neare to the church of Venus Cloacina, hard at the shops, called at this daie Nova Taberna, i. the new shops or standings: and there having caught a knife from a butcher, he thus spake: My sweete daughter, no other meanes have I but this onely to set thee free: and so he strike the damsell to the heart: and looking presently to the judgment seat, Here with this blood I sacrifice thee Appius, & thy head to the divell. Appius with the crye that arose upon so horrible a fact, being much troubled, commanded Virginius to be apprehended: but he with bloudie blade in hand, made way where he went, untill with a number that followed him apace to beare him companie, he recovered the gate. Julius and *Nymitorius*ooke up the bloudlesse corps, and held it aloft to the people: blaming and cursing the wickednesse of Appius: pitying the unhappie and unfortunate beautie of the damsell: and bewailing the hard exigent and extremitie of the father. The Matrones followed after and cried: Is this the condition and fortune allotted unto parents for getting & bearing children? Is this the hire and guerdon of chastitie and virginity: with other like speeches, which in such a case, women in their griefe of mind use to utter: whose sorrow as it is more hea-vie, proceeding from weake and tender hearts, so it yeeldeth and affordeth more pittifull and lamentable words, as they make their plaints & dolorous mones. But the men, and Scilius above the rest, had no other talke but of the Tribunes authoritie, and the appeale unto the bodie of the people, how they were taken away from them, and of other publike indignities and common disscontentments. The whole multitude partly upon the hainousnesse of this wicked acte, and partly for hope by this occasion to recover againe their liberties, were all up at once in an uprore. Appius one while commanded Scilius to be called, another while for his disobedience and contumacie to be attached and convented before him. At the length, seeing no way made unto the Apparitours, for to come by him, passed himselfe with a crew of tall gentlemen of the Nobilitie that were of his guard through the throng, and commanded to have him away to prison. By which time, there were gotten about Scilius not onely the multitude, but the chiefe captaines and ringleaders of the multitude, L. Valerius and M. Horatius: who having thrust the ser-jeant backe, said withall, that if Appius had any thing to charge him with by order of law, they would baile Scilius, and maintaine his cause against him, who was but a privat person: but if he went about to offer violence, he should soone meet with his matches. Hereupon grew a fierce braule and boile. The Decemvirs officer setteth upon Valerius and Horatius to lay hold upon them: but his rods were by the multitude broken to fitters. Then Appius getteth him up into the common place of audience, for to speake unto the people. Horatius and Valerius follow after him up, to doe the semblable. Them the assembly heard with patience, but they hissed at Appius and cried out against him. Then *Valerius*ooke upon him, and commanded the Lictors to give attendance no longer upon a privat person. Whereupon, Appius his heart was done and his courage quailed: & so standing in fear of his life, he was faine to cover his face and to withdraw himselfe in disguised manner, & tooke an house over his head, neare unto the common place (unknown to his adversaries) there to save himselfe. Sp. Oppius, for to rescue & succour his colleague, rushed from another side into the place: and there he might see force & might, to have gotten the upper hand of authoritie. After many devises and consultations, wherwith he was distracted, & framing himselfe to yeeld consent on every side, at length by the advise & persuasions of many there about him, in great fear he commanded the Senat to be called together. M This appealed the multitude, for that they were in hope that (by meanes of the Senatours, who many of them, seemed to milike the acts and proceedings of the Decemvirs) that government of theirs should come to an end. The Senat devised and tooke order, not to provoke the Commons too farre: and withall to have a more provident and speciall eye, that the coming of Virginius into the campe, bred no mutinie in the armie. Vherupon were sent certaine of the punie Senatours

- A Senatours unto the hoast, that lay encamped upon the hill Vecilius, who advertised the Decemvirs from the Senat, to endeavour all they could to keep the souldiours in good order, from commotion and sedition. But there Virginius raised a greater uprore and tumult than hee had left behind him in the citie. For besides that, he was seene coming with a cruce and traine almost of four hundred men, who incensed with the indignitie of the late accident, accompanied him vo-luntarie from the citie, his naked drawne knife, and himselfe bespreint and embriued with bloud, caused the whole campe to turne their eyes upon him. Moreover, their gownes seene in sundrie places within the campe, made a greater shew of citizens in number than was indeede. Being demanded of them what newes, and what the matter was, hee wept, and for a good while held his peace. At the last, when as now the multitude, that for feare ran confusedly together, began to stand still and keepe silence: he declared orderly from the beginning to the end, every thing in particular, as it was done. Then lifting up his hands to heaven, and calling to all his companions and fellow souldiours, hee besought them not to impute that foule act unto him, whereof in truth Appius Claudius was the authour and cause: nor to detest and abhorre him as a parricide and murderer of his owne children: saying, that his daughters life was more deare unto him than his owne, if she might have lived free and honestly. But when he saw her once haled by force, as a bondmaid to be ravished and made a strumpet, he thought it better to be bereft of his children by death, than by contumelie and reproch: and so upon meere pittifulnesse incurred the shew and apparance of crueltie. And but that hee repofed some hope in the aid of his fellow souldiors, trusting that they would be revenged for his daughters death, he would not have remained C a livesman after her. I know well (saith he) that you also have daughters, sisters, and wives of your owne: And it is not the death of my child that hath killed and mortified the lust of Appius, but rather the longer it escapeth unpunished, the more outrageous and unbridled would it be. So that by the calamitie of another man, yee are well taught and warned to beware of the like injurie. As for me, I have buried my wife before, who died on Gods hand: and now my daughter, for that she might not finish the course of her daies, with the safetie of her maidenhead and chasti-tie, hath died, I confesse, a pittifull and lamentable, but yet an honest kind of death. As to Appius, (quoth he) now can he not fulfill his lust in this my house: and for any other violence of his whatsoever, I carrie the same mind and heart still, to defend mine owne bodie, wherewith I have alreadie saved my daughters. Now let other men looke to themselves and their children, as well as D they can. As Virginius uttered these speeches aloud, the whole multitude with one accord cried and protested, they would not faile, but both revenge his greefe, and maintaine their owne free-dome. The citizens also in their side gownes, intermingled among the souldiours, made the selfesame complaints: shewing how much more horrible those things were in the eye to bee seene in fact, than they could found unto the eare by bare relation: and withall reported, how at Rome the matter was welneere dispatched already, for that there were certaine come after them, even hard at their heeles from thence, who brought word that Appius had like to have been murdered, and was departed into exile: and so far prevailed they with them, that they gave the arme, plucked up their standards, and tooke their way to Rome. The Decemvirs being sore troubled, both at these present occurrents which they evidently saw, and also to heare these newes, in what bad tearmes all things stood at Rome, ran up and downe, here one, and there another, into sundrie parts of the campe, for to appease the tumult. When they went to worke mildly and gently, they had not a word of them againe: but if any one laid his commaundement upon them, and extended his authoritie, they would beard them and answer, That they were men, and more than that, men in armes and souldiours. Thus march they in order of battell toward the citie, and take the mount Aventine, and there settle themselves. And as they encountered any, all their song was this, to exhort and encourage the Commons to recover their franchises, and to create Tribunes of the Communitie. Not a word was heard els, tending to any violence. Oppius assembled the Senat together: where it was agreed, not to proceed by way of rigour in any case: for as much as they themselves had given the occasion of sedition. But three ancient personages, such as had been Consuls, were sent Commissioners in Embassage, as it were, Sp. Tarpeius, C. Julius, and P. Sulpitius with commission, to demanda of them in the name of the Senat, by whose commandement they had abandoned the campe, or what their intent was thus in warlike maner to keepe the Aventine: and why leaving to war with their enemies, they had thus invaded their native cuntry? They were not to seek of an answer, only there wanted a man to give the an-swere: for as yet they were growne to no certaine head, upon whom they might relie: and singly by themselves they durst not incur the hatred and dangerous displeasure that might ensue. G This onely the multitude with one voice cried aloud; to send L. Valerius, and Marcus Horatius unto them, for to those they would make a resolute answer. The Commissioners being dismissed, Virginus puteth the souldiours in mind, and advertiseth them, how erewhile, in a matter not of the greates importance, they were in feare and perplexitie, because the multitude was without an head; and how an answer was returned, although not altogether unprofitable and besides the purpose, yet agreed upon at a venture, and not proceeding from any publicke counsell. But now his opinion was, that there should bee ten chosen to beare soveraigne rule: who for the honour of warfare and souldierie, should be called militarie Tribunes. And when this dignitie was to him offered first, Nay (quoth he) reserve still these your good persuasions and judgments of me, unto more happie daies and favourable times both to me and you. For neither H doth the remembrance of my daughter suffer me to take joy of any honour in this life, nor (as the state standeth now troubled) is it good for you to have them to be your Magistrates, who of all other are most exposed to ill will and displeasure, and in neere danger to be hardly thought of. If I may serve you in any stead, you may make bold, and have no lesse use of mee, remaining still a private person. So they create Tribunes militarie, ten in number. But all this while was the armie as unquiet in the Sabines countrie. For even there also, by the instigation of Isilius and Numitorius, the souldiours fell away from the Decemvirs and departed. For their minds were no lesse troubled and disquieted with the remembrance renewed, of the late murder of Sicius, than kindled and set on fire by the fresh newes of the death of Virginus, so villanously, so shamelessly laid unto and challenged, and all to satisfy the lust of another, Isilius, so soon as he heard say, that there were ten militarie Tribunes created in Aventine, fearing least the Election in the citie should follow the prerogative of the militarie Election in the campe, as a precedent to create the selfsame men Tribunes of the Commons, being a man well seene and experienced in these popular affaires, and reaching himselfe at the same dignitie and promotion, wrought so with his adherents and friends, that before they went to the citie, they should likewise elect the selfsame number with equall authoritie. Who entred the citie with banners displayed, at the gate Collina, and marched through the mids thereof in warlike order, up to the Aventine. And there joining and uniting themselves unto the other armie, they gave in charge to the twentie militarie Tribunes, to create out of their number twaine for soveraigne governours to rule all.

 So they elected Marcus Oppius, and Sexius Manlius.

The Senatours being in great care for the common-weale, sate in counsell every daie: where they spent time oftner in wrangling and jarring, than in sage advise and politicke counsell. The murdering of Sicius, the wanton lust and loose life of Appius, the shamefull disgraces received in the warres, were laid in the Decemvirs dish. At length they concluded that Valerius and Ho- ratius should go to the Aventine. But they refused and would not go, but upon condition that the Decemvirs would give up the ensignes and ornaments of that magistracie and government, which by right they should have forgone and departed from a full yeare before. The Decemvirs were grieved and complained, thus to be set downe and made no better than privat men, and said flatly they would not be deposed from their place of rule, before those lawes were fully enacted and confirmed, for which at first time they were created. The Commons having intelligence by M. Duilius, (who had been a Tribune of the Commons) that by reason of continual debate and contention in the Senat house, there was nothing done and agreed upon, removed from the Aventine unto mount Sacer. For Duilius ceased not to suggest, and plainly affirme unto them, that the Senatours and Auncients of the citie would never sadly thinke upon any care and provision to be made, untill they saw the citie abandoned and desolate: moreover,
 That the mount Sacer would put them in mind of the constant resolution of the Commons; and that they should well knowe, that matters would never be settled and brought to concord, without they restored unto them their power and authoritie againe. So they take their waie by Nomentana Via, which at that time was named Ficulensis, & encamped themselves in the moun-taine Sacer; doing no harme to any creature as they passed along: following therein the mode-stie of their forefathers. The whole communaltie followed after the host: there was not one who for age was able to travaile on foote, that drew backe & tarried behind. Their children and wives beare them companie, in piteous wise moning themselves, and asking them: wherto they would leave them behind in that citie, where neither their honest chastitie might be guarded, nor yet their libertie secured and kept safe. When as now, by reason of his uncooth and strange desolation,

This speech of Virginus, referring a dignitie.

A desolation, all seemed at Rome wast and void, and none to bee seene in the publicke place, besides a few of aged men: and when the Senatours were called into the Senat house, the common place appeared emptie, naked, and forlorne: then there were more besides Horatius and Valerius that cried out and said. What looke yee for still my LL. of the counsell? What? and if the Decemvirs will make no end of their peevish frowardnesse, will yee let things run at sixe and seven, untill all come tumbling downe, or be of a light fire? And what goodly dominion is this, that you huggle so in your armes, that you clip and hold so fast? Will yee minister justice and give lawes to emptie houses and bare wals? Are yee not abashed and ashamed, that there should be seene in the Place, a greater number welneere of your Licitors and officers, than of growned citizens, and of all other men whatsoever? How and if the enemies should come against the citie, what would yee doe? Nay, what if shortly the Commons should march in armes, seeing we weigh their insurrection and departure so lightly? Will yee, together with the ruine and downefall of the citie, end your rule, and not afore? Well, to be plaine, yee must either have no Commons at all, or els allow them to have their Tribunes againe: there is no meane, there is no other remedie. Sooner shall we want our Magistrates of the Nobilitie, than they will be without their Patrones and Officers of the Communaltie. They wrung and wrestled from our forefathers that power and authoritie fire new, and whereof they had as then, no prooffe and experience: how thinke yee then, that having tasted now the sweetnesse of it, they will endure the want thereof? especially seeing, that we our own selves are not of so temperate carriage in our government and command over them, but that they have need of some succour and releefe. And when these C and such like reasons were on all hands often alledged and laid abroad, the Decemvirs over-weighed with the generall consent & unities of the house, promised: That seeing it was so thought good, they would be wholly ordered and ruled by the Senatours. This onely they besought at their hands, and admonished them of, by way of a proviso, that they would take order for the safetie and securitie of their persons: and not by sheading their blood, to flesh the Commons, and to nuzzle them up, and acquaint them with exercising crueltie upon the Nobles and Sena-tours. Then were Valerius and Horatius sent with commission to reclaime & call home the Commons, upon such conditions and capitulations, as they should thinke convenient: yea, and to set all things in good order and make a finall composition, with a speciall charge to provide for the safeguard of the Decemvirs, against the raging ire and violence of the multitude. These mediatours took their journey, and were received into the campe with exceeding joy of the Commons, as being doubtlesse, their very favours and redeemers, approved both in the beginning of their troubles, and now also at the very end and upshot of all in regard whereof, they were welcomed with thanksgiving. Isilius was the mouth of the multitude, and their proloquutor. Who when they came to debate and reason about the articles of covenants, and that these Delegates and Committees, required of the Commons, What the demands & points were that they stood upon? Being already provided aforehand of purpose what to say, demanded such conditions, as it was well seene, that they reposed more hope, and relied themselves rather in equitie, and in-differencie, than in force of arms. For they require, Imprimis, to have the Tribunes power on foot againe; and the appealing unto the people revived: which before the creation of the Decemvirs E had been the onely helps and succours of the Commons. Item, that no man should bee called in question, nor any way touched in life, lim, or goods, for gathering the souldiours or Commons together by way of commotion, for recovering againe their liberties and franchises. Only, their demand concerning the punishment to be inflicted upon the Decemvirs, favoured of crueltie.
 For they deemed it meet and reason, that they should bee yeelded into their hands, and then they threatened to burne them quicke with fire. To these articles the Committees spake in this wise. As for those capitulations, which upon counsell and deliberate advise yee have articulated, they are so reasonable and indifferent, that without your suit, they ought to have been offered unto you frankly and freely: for yee request to enjoy such things as concerne the defence of your libertie and freedom, and maintaine not your licentiousnesse, to the offence and hurt of others.
 F But as to your ire and wrath, it is to be pardoned, rather than to be followed and yeelded unto: as who, under colour of hatred and detestation of crueltie, run headlong into crueltie: and before, in a manner, that yee bee set free your selves, yee will bee rulers and lords over your adversaries.
 Alas the while, and will our citie never be at rest, and cease from punishing: but that either the Nobles will scourge the Commons of Rome, or the Commons whip the Nobles? As for you, yee had more need of a shield ywis, than a sword. Humbled hee is ynough, and too much humbled, M ij who who liveth in a cittie on even hand, and equall with others, under the same lawes, neither doing taking wrong. And if ever at any time you meane to shew your selves dread and to be feared, when you have once recovered your Magistrates and ordinances againe, when ye have the law in your owne hands, to censure and judge according to your owne discretion, then may yee give your doome of our lives and goods, as each cause requireth. Now for this time it sufficeth, that yee claime and have your freedome againe. Hereupon they all submitted themselves to the deputed Delegates, permitting them to doe what they would. Who seeing they had brought all matters to so good a conclusion, promised to returne with al speed. So they took their leave. And when they had declared to the Senatours the demands of the Commons, all the rest of the Decemvirs, perceiving no mention at all made of their punishment (a thing more than they looked or hoped for) denied no one point thereof. But Appius, a man of a fell and cruell nature, and who above all the other was most odious, and lay open to the malice of the people, and measuring the hatred of others toward himselfe, by his owne rancour that hee bare against other men: I wot well (quoth he) what ill fortune will betide me shortly: and I see plainly, that our adversaries hold off to bicker and buckle with us, no longer than untill they have weapons given them in their hands. To satisfie this their malice and hatred, we must part with our blood: nothing else will content them. For mine owne part, to renounce my Decem-virship I weigh not: neither passe I how soone I doe it. Then was an Act made by the Senat, that the Decemvirs out of hand should surrender their place: & that Q. Furius the Archbishop or High priest, should create Tribunes of the Commons: provided alwaies expressly, that the mu-tinitie of the foulidors, and insurrection of the Commons, should turne no man to displeasure and harme. These Actes being passed, and the Counsell risen, the Decemvirs came abroad into the open place of assemblies, and there to the exceeding joy of all men, they resigned up all their power and authoritie. Tidings hereof were carried to the Commons, by the mediators aforesaid: and looke, what people soever remained behind in the cittie, went now forth to ac-companie them. As this multitude passed along forward, they were encountred upon the way, with another joyfull companie from out of the camp. Who rejoyced mutually one in the behalfe of the other, that both freedome and concord were restored to the cittie againe. Then the mediators in the generall assembly of them all spake and said: To the great good, happinesse and felicitie of you and of the C. VV. be it spoken, Returne in Gods name into your owne countrie, to your houses, wives and children: but see, that as ye have demeaned your selves modestly in your way hither, hurting and spoiling no mans lands and possessions, notwithstanding the neede ye were driven unto of so many things: so ye carry the same moderation and stay of your selves homeward into the cittie. Go into the Aventine from whence ye came: and there for good lucke sake, where ye laid the first foundation and ground-woke of your libertie, create yet shall your Tribunes of the Commons. There, will the high priest be readie and give attendance, to call an assembly for the ground Election. Great was the accord, alacritie and cheerefulnessse, that they shewed in approving all that was propounded. So from thence they turne their standards and ensignes, and as they marched to Rome, they strove avie with all they met on the way, who could shew most joy and gladnesse: they passe on through the cittie armed as they were, yet peaceably and without noise, untill they came into the Aventine. Where the chiefe priest immediately held the * Comices, in which they created for Tr. of the C. first and formost L. Virginius, next after him L. Icilius and P. Numitorius, Vuckle by the mothers side of Virginia: all authours of their insurrection and departure: then, C. Sicinius, descended from him in right line who was the first Trib. of Comm. created in mount Sacer, (as we finde in records) and M. Du-illius, who before the choosung of Decemvirs, had right worthely and notably borne the Tri-buneship, and in all combats & bickerments with the Decemvirs, stuck close to the comminalltie and never failed them. After these, were elected, more for hope than any former desert, M. Titi-nius, M. Pomponius, C. Apronius, Ap. Iulius, C. Oppius. Then C. Icilius immediately in the very entrance into the Tribuneship, preferred a bill unto the Commons, and the Commons enacted it, That the departure and insurrection of the common people against the Decemvirs, should not be laied to any mans charge, nor bring him into trouble. Then without farther delay *M.

 Duillius* went through with an Act of his own, to wit, That there should be Consuls created, with reservation of libertie to appeale unto the people. All these things passed in the Comices of the Commons, assembled in the meddowes named Flaminia, which now they call Circus Flaminius.

Then

A Then, by an Interregent were Consuls created, L. Valerius and M. Horatius, who presently began their government. Whose popular Consulship, as it was without wrong doing to the Sena-tours and Nobles, so it was not without some offence committed of their part: For whatsoever was provided for the liberties of the Commons, they supposed it abridged somewhat of their power and authoritie. And first and formost, whereas it was a question and controvercie not well cleared in law, Whether the Nobles were bound to stand to the Acts of the Commons: they made alaw now in a general Session, by the suffrages of the Centuries, That what ordinance soever the Commons (being parted by Tribes) had by their voices granted, it should comprise and bind the whole bodie of the people. By which law, the Tribunes actes were armed with a most sharpe and keene weapon to strike withall. Moreover, The other consular law concerning Appeale, the onely fort and strength of libertie, which by the Decemvirs absolute power had been overthrown, they not onely revive againe, but also fortifie the same for the time to come, by making a new law, forbidding expressly that no man should create any magistrate absolutely without the libertie of Appealing: & whosoever should create any such, he might rightfully and lawfully be killed, and that murder should not be counted a capitall crime. And when they had sufficiently strengthened the Commons, on the one side with the benefit of appealing, and on the other side with the Tribunes power: in favour of the Tribunes themselves, that they also might seeme sacrosanct and inviolable (a thing now almost grown out of remembrance) they renewed that high privilege, with certain solemne ceremonies, which having ben of long time forlet and neglected, were now brought up againe and put in ure. And they ordained them to be inviolate, as well in a reverent regard of religion & scruple of conscience, as also by a speciall law in that behalfe provided: namely, that whosoever hurt either Tribunes of the Commons, Ediles, Judges, or Decemvirs, his head should bee accursed and devoted to Jupiter, and his familie sold in portualle at the church of Ceres, Liber and * Libera. By vertue of this Act, the great Expositours of the law, denie that any man is sacrosanct or inviolable: but (say they) it is enacted only, That whosoever hurt any of them, shall be accursed. And therefore, an Edile may be attached and led away to prison by superiour Magistrates. Which although it be not warranted by law (for hee is hurt, who by this law ought not to be hurt) yet it is a good argument to prove, that an Edile is not inviolable. Marry, as for the Tribunes, they were indeed by vertue of an ancient oath of the Commons, at what time as they first created that power and authoritie, inviolable: as they would seeme to expound and make construction of the law. Others have bene, that thus open and interpret the law, That in this selfesame Act of Horatius, the Consuls also, yea and Pretours too, (because they are created by the same auspicia or birdsignes that the Consuls be) were comprised, and had the benefite thereof. For a Consull is called by the name of a Iudge. But that exposition is confuted, for that in those daies it was not the manner to tearme the Consull a Iudge, but the Pretor onely. And thus much concerning the Consular lawes.

The same Consuls also brought up this order and custome, that all the Acts of the Senat should be brought into the church of Ceres, and presented unto the Ediles of the Commons: which aforesaid were suppressed and smothered, yea and corrupted or perverted at the will and pleasure of the Consuls. After all this, M. Duillius a Tribune of the Commons, propounded unto the Commons a law, and they let it passe and graunted it, That whosoever should leave the Communalitie destitute of their Tribunes, or create any Magistrate absolute without Appeale, should be scourged, and lose his head for it. All these Acts, as they passed against the wils and minds of the Nobles: so they went cleane without their contradiction: for that, all this while hitherto, there was no rigour and severitie that seemed to extend and reach to any one particular person among them. But afterwards, when as both the Tribunes power, and also the Commons freedome, were once well and surely grounded: then the Tribunes, supposing now it was full time, that they might safely and without perill give the onset upon them, severally one by one, made choise of Virginius to be the first accuser or plaintiffe, and Appius Claudius the first defendant.
 And Virginius had not so soone arrested Appius to answer at a day, and Appius come downe into the Common place, guarded with a companie of tall yong gentlemen of the Nobilitie: but presently upon the sight of him and his guard about him, the remembrance of that most cruell and detestable tyrannie was refreshed and renewed. Then Virginius: Speeches (quoth hee) and Orations were devised for doubtfull causes: and therefore will I neither spend time in accusing him before you, from whose crueltie yee have by force of armes delivered your selves: nor suffer this wretch, over and besides his other wicked pranks, to shew in the defence of himselfe his audacious impudence. Therefore, as touching all other lewd parts of thine and wicked designes, O Appius, which thou hast for these two years ungraciously & impiously enterprised and practised one in the neck of another, I wil do thee some favor, & pardon thee: but for one crime only, unless thou canst acquite thy selfe the better, namely, that thou being the judge, against all order of law, didst not grant unto the party defendant, the benefit of liberty to go at large, during the time of the suit depending, untill she might bring proofes of her freedome, for this, I say, I command thee to prison. Now had Appius no hope at all, either in the Tribunes helping hand, or in the dome and judgment of the people. Howbeit he both called upon the Tribunes for succour: and also seeing himselfe tugged and halsted away by the officer, & no man to staie his hand; I appeale (quoth he) unto the people. This one word in maintenance of freedome, being heard to come out of that mouth, that lately had given sentence on his side, that impeached the freedome of one, and challenged the partie for bond, caused silence. And when every man to himselfe secretly muttered in this wise: I see well (when all is done) there are Gods in heaven, and such gods as neglect not the affaires of mortall men. Pride and crueltie (although it bee long first) at length will surely have a fall, and throughly be punished. Lo, how he is now faine to appeale, who aforetime abolished and tooke away all appeale: he humbly craveth reliefe of the people, who heretofore trod under foot all rights and franchises of the people: and see how he is carried to prison, destitute and deprived of the benefit of libertie, who awarded and adjudged a free bodie to bondage and servitude. Amidst these words I say, that might be overheard in that confused humming of the assembly; Appius also was perceived to call unto the people of Rome for reliefe and mercie. He reckoned up withall, the deserts of his auncestours in the behalfe of the C.VV. both at home in the cittie, & abroad in the wars: he alleaged his own unhappy affection (when time was) to the cominaltie of Rome, and partaking with them: and namely how with the exceeding displeasure of the Nobilitie, he resigned up his Consulship, & all for to bring in and establish, equall & indifferent laws to both parties. He rehearsed moreover his own laws, which notwithstanding they remained still in force and strength, he, the lawgiver himselfe, was going to prison. But concerning his owne proper parts and deserts good or bad, he would then make triall thereof, (he said) when he should be permitted judicially to make his defence: as for the present time, he pleaded the common benefit of the cittie, to wit, that being a Citizen, he might at the appointed daie, speake for himselfe, and stand to the dome of the people: neither feared he the hatred and malice of men so much, as to repose no hope at all in the equitie and mercie of his neighbours and fellow citizens. But and if he were cast into prison and not suffered to come unto his answer, then he would once againe call upon the Tribunes of the Commons for their help, and admonish them, not to follow and imitate them, whom they would seem to hate. And in case the Tribunes will be known and avow, that they are linked in the same bond and covenant, to abolish and take away the benefit of calling unto any one of them by way of mediation, (against which they have charged and blamed the Decemvirs for complotting and agreeing together) then he said, that he appealed unto the people, and had recourse for succour unto the laws concerning appeale, made as well by Consuls as Tribunes, that present yeare and no longer ago. For who may ever hereafter (quoth he) have benefit of appeale, if it be not lawfull for me, who stand yet not condemned, nor attainted, and have not pleaded for my selfe: what commoner, what meane person may find reliefe by those laws, if Appius Claudius may not? It will be seene in me, and mine example shall be a precedent and prooffe to others, Whether by these new statutes, lordly rule, or equall libertie be established: whether the calling for helpe by way of mediation and intercession, or by plaine appealing against the wrongfull proceedings of magistrates, be granted in very deepe, or but onely pretended in bare shew, under vaine colourable pretences and foolish letters patents. Against all this, Virginius made his rejoinder and said, That Appius was the man alone exempt out of all benefit of lawes, and excluded from all civile and humane societie. Let men but looke backe toward the tribunall seate, the very well head as it were and receptacle, the fortress and hold of all wickednesse: whereon that perpetuall Decemvir practising his crueltie upon the goods, the bodies and lives of free citizens, menacing whipping cheere and hangmans worke unto all persons; a contemner both of God and man, garded with a crew of executioners and butcherly tormentours, rather than Serjeants, proceeding on from spoile and bloudshed to set his heart on lecherie and carnal lust, plucked a maiden by birth free, from out of the very armes of her father, as if she had ben taken captive in war; and that, in the sight of the people of Rome, and gave her away to one of his followers, even to a groome

Appius with the people before the Decemvirs.

A a groome of his bedchamber. Where, by a cruell decree of his, and detestable sentence, adjudging her bond, he caused the father to lay violent hands upon his owne daughter: where he commanded, the espoused husband and Vnckle of the Virgin (that tooke up her bodie halfe dead) to be had away to the Gaol, as being more displeased with them, for disappointing and putting him beside his purpose of abusing and spoiling her, than for the murder upon her by them committed. Adding moreover and besides, That he had built a prison, which hee used to tearme The habitation and dwelling house of the Commons of Rome. And therefore, plead hee estoones, and as often as hee will, his appeale, I will not give over (quoth Virginius) but as often tender a judge betweene, and be able to prove, that he gave not sentence, and pronounced her free, but bond: but in case hee will not abide to bee censured by a competent judge, then I command him to be carried to prison, as attaint and convicted. Thus was he committed to ward: and as there was none misliked of this proceeding, so everie man was greatly troubled in spirit, to see so great a personage punished, & the very Commons themselves thought their libertie too large and excessive. The Tribune set him downe a day (before hand) to plead for himselfe & make his answer.

Appius committed to prison.

Amidst these affaires, there came to Rome Embassadors from the Latines and Hernicks, to congratulate, and to shew their joy and great contentment, for the unie and concord betweene the Nobles and the Commons: in token whereof, they brought as a present unto Sup. Opt. Max. a crowne of gould, not very massie in weight, but according to their abilitie, which was not much, yet answerable to their devotion: which men performed rather with religion and zeale in those daies, than in portly shew and magnificence. By relation and intelligence from them they were certified also, that the Æquians and Volsicians prepared warre with all the power they could make. Whereupon, the Consuls were commanded to part their provinces betweene them: To Horatius befell the Sabines, and to Valerius the Æquians and Volsicians. And when they had proclaimed musters against these warres, such was the forward affection and favour of the Commons, that not onely the younger folke, but also a great sort of those that by law were dispensed with, and discharged from warfare, and lived of their pensions, offered their voluntarie service, and were readie to enter their names into the muster-masters booke: whereby the armie was not onely in number greater, but also for the goodnesse of men, more puissant, as having the old, beaten, and experienced souldiers among them. But before they went out of the cittie, the Decemviral lawes, (which now are knowne by the name of the twelve Tables,) they set up openly to be seene, engraven in brasse. Some writers have delivered, that the Ædiles performed this office, as they had it in charge from the Tribunes. C. Claudius, who upon a detestation and deepe hatred of the Decemvirs leaud and wicked enormities, but especially above all others, of the insolent pride of his brothers sonne, which hee could no longer abide, had removed and departed to Regillus, his old native countrie. Hee being now a very aged man, returned to sue and intreat for his deliverance out of danger, whose vices hee abhorred: and in sullied weed and poore array, accompanied with those of his linage, and other his followers and vassals, went through the common place, and laboured everie man one by one, beseeching them not to set that brand of ignominie, and bring such a stain upon the house and name of the Claudij, as that they should bee thought worthe of imprisonment and yrons: nor suffer a man of most honourable qualitie, a singular patterne of Nobilitie to his posteritie in time to come, the law-maker and founder of the Romane lawes, to lie in chaines amongst fellows, night-theeves & robbers by the high way side: but to turne away their minds a while from anger and wrath, and incline to a due regard and consideration of matters: and rather at the suite and earnest petitions of so many of the Claudij, to forgive them one man, than for the hatred of one man, to reject the praiers of so many suppliants. As for himselfe, he protested that he did thus much for kinred and names sake. Neither was he reconciled unto him, and they made friends again: yet could he wish, that his adverse fortune & poore condition were relieved. Concluding with this in the end, That as their libertie was recovered againe by vertue and prowess, so the concord of all degrees and estates might be established sure by clemencie. Some there were whom he mooved, more in regard of his owne kinnesse and love, than in any respect of him for whom he spake. But Virginius praied them, To take pittie and compassion rather, of him and his daughter, and to give care to the praiers and supplications, not of the Claudij, who have had the day, and tyrannised over the Commons, but to the neerest friends of Virginius, the three Tribunes, who being created for the aid and succour of the Commons, doe now themselves implore and beseech the helpe and assistance stance of the Commons. And verily these tears were thought more reasonable, and like to speed. G Thus when Appius saw all meane of hope cut off, before the foresaid day appointed was come, killed his owne selfe. Soone after this, Sp. Oppius, who of all the rest next unto Appius, was most hated: for that hee was in the citie at the very time when this unjust doome and sentence of his colleague happened to be pronounced, was attached by P. Numitorius. But Oppius was the worse thought of and more prejudiced, by occasion of an injurie by himselfe done, than for not stopping the wrong intended by Appius to Virginia. For a witnesse was produced to depose against him, one, who having served in the warres seven and twentie yeares, had bene rewarded and honoured extraordinarily eight times. This valiant servitour, thus adorned with those gifts & markes of valour, in the view and sight of the people of Rome rent his garments, and shewed his backe and sides, & the skin all broken with scourging: beseeching no other favor, but if Oppius the partie accused, could justly charge him with any trepasse and offence by him committed, he should not spare him, but now a private person as hee was, exercise and redouble his crueltie upon him once againe. Well, Oppius likewise was had to prison: and there before the law day, ended his life. The goods of Appius and Oppius both, the Tribunes did confiscate. Their comparteners also and fellow Decemvirs fled their countrie and were banished, and all their goods also were forfeit and confiscate. And not so much as M. Claudius, the partie that laid claime unto Virginia escaped, but he was arrested to answer at a certaine day, and was condemned. Howbeit Virginius of himselfe released him his life, and would not take the extremitie, so he was sent away and confined to Tybur, as it were into banishment. Thus the poore spirit and ghost of Virginia, more hapie after her death than fortunate during her life, having wandered abroad, and haunted so many houses for due revenge of her adversaries: at last, when there was not one guiltie person of them left unpunished, gave over her walking, and rested quiet.

Now were the Nobles in exceeding feare, beholding the same countenance already in the Tribunes, which they had observed in the Decemvirs. But then M. Duilius, a Tribune of the Commons, wisely and politickly restraining and keeping within a meane this excessive power of theirs: We have ynough (quoth he) both of our owne libertie, and also of revenge of our enemies: and therefore I will not suffer for this yeare, any man more to be arrested or imprisoned. For I doe not like that old faults done and past, and now as it were cancelled and rased out, should be revived againe, and brought in question, since that by the punishment of the Decemvirs, satisfaction hath been made for the new: and the continuall care and diligence of the Consuls both twaine, for the maintenance of your freedome assureth me, that nothing will be committed hereafter, that may require and need the power of the Tribunes. This moderation at the first hand of the Tribune, put the Nobles out of their feare: but made the Consuls to bee thought the worse of, (for that they had been so addicted, wholly to the Communalitie) in that a Magistrate of the Commons had more regard of the safetie and libertie of the Nobles, than the proper Magistrate of the Nobilitie: and because the adverse part had their full of revenge and punishment of the Nobles, before it did appeare that the Consuls would once seem to stop the course & streame of their licentiousnesse. And many there were who gave it out, that the Consuls bare themselves too remisse and slacke in the matter, and little respected the good and credite of the Nobles, in that they had approved and confirmed the Acts that were proposed by the Tribunes. And no question, troubled as the state was then of the C.V. they were forced to give place, and doe according to the necessitie of the time.

When the Consuls had set all things in good order within the citie, and surely grounded the state of the Communalitie, they went either of them into their owne province. Valerius against the armies of the Aequians and Volscians, which now had joined together in Algidum: where full politickly he held off, and stood upon his defence onely: for if out of hand he had put it to the hazard of a battell, I cannot tell, but I greatly doubt (considering how the hearts of Romans and enemies both, were affected, presently upon the unfortunate conduct of the Decemvirs) it would have turned to their great losse, and cost them an overthrow. Hee therefore having encamped a mile off from the enemies, kept his souldiours within the campe. The enemies raunged in battaille array, tooke up the whole ground betweene both camps, and when they made bravadoes, and challenged them to come forth and fight, not one Roman would answer them againe. At length the Volscians and Aequians, wearied with long standing still, and in vaine expecting battell, thinking verily, that the honour was in manner yielded unto them, departed: some into the countrie of the Hernikes, other some to the territories of the Latines, for to raise booties and make spoile: leaving

A leaving behind them rather a competent guard for defence of the campe, than a sufficient power to maintaine a field-fight. Which when the Consull perceived, he paid them againe with the like measure of feare, as they before had from them received; and with his armie readie embattailed, biddeth them battaille: who being privie to themselves what forces were wanting, forbore to fight: whereupon the Romanes presently tooke a better heart unto them, and made account that their enemies were overcome, being in such a feare within their rampier. When they had stood thus a whole daie readie to fight, they retired backe in the evening and gave place to the night. And the Romanes full of good hope, refreshed their bodies and made much of themselves, but the enemies nothing so hartie and courageous, send out messengers every way in fearefull haile, to call againe the forraiers. Such as were neare at hand came running backe into the campe: those that were farther off, could not be found nor met withall. Now when it was once day light, the Romanes issue forth of the campe, intending to give an assault upon the rampier, unlesse they would come forth and fight. But when it was farre forth daie, and the enemies stirred not at all, the Consull commanded to advance with their ensignes. The Aequians and Volscians seeing their battaille comming forward, began to chafe and take foule disdaine, for very shame that their rampier and trench should protect victorious armies within the campe, rather than their weapons and valour defend them in plaine and open field: and were earnest likewise themselves with their Generals for the signall of battaille, and at length after much importunitie obtained it. Now were some of them falled out at the gates already: and others followed hard after at their heeles, keeping their array, and every man comming orderly into his file and ranke. By which time, the Romanes Cos. before the battaille of the enemies stood surely furnished with their full strength, came on still and gave the onser: charged them before they were all come forth, yea and ere they were well marshalled that came abroad, being a multitude, waving (as it were) to and fro every way for feare, and looking about themselves, and to their fellows: & to masker their troubled heads the more, hee assaileth them with a great shout and maine violence. At first the enemies gave back: but after they had gathered their spirits together, and were come againe to themselves, and that their captaines on every side rated them, and asked them whether they would yield unto them, whome before they had overcome, the fight began againe to bee renewed. The Consull on the other part, willed the Romanes to remember, that this was the first day, wherein they being newly set free, were to fight likewise for the freed citie of Rome: and therefore they were to win a victory for themselves, and not after victorie gotten, to be a prize for any more Decemvirs to prey upon. For they fought not now under the conduct and standard of Appius, but of the Consull Valerius: who as he was descended from the deliverers of the people of Rome, so he was one of them himselfe: exhorting them to shew now, that in former battailes of late daies, it was long of the leaders and not of the souldiours, that they achieved no victories: saying, it were a foule shame for them, to have had more stomacke against their owne neighbours and citizens, than heart against their enemies; and to have stood more in feare of servitude at home, than of bondage abroad. As for Virginia, shee was but one, whose honestie and chastitie was in time of peace hazarded: and Appius it was onely, and none but hee, that in regard of his unbridled and dissolute lust, was the dangerous citizen. But if the fortune of warre should faile on our side, and goe against us, then shall our children all bee in jeopardie, to bee abused and spoiled at the hands of many thousands of enemies. Vnwillling I am (quoth hee) to boden such miseries, and to offe the citie unto those calamities, which both Sup. and our stockfather Mars, forbid and forsend to light upon it, founded upon so lucky signes and happy foretokens, at the first beginning: I put you in mind rather of the Aventine hill, and mount Sacer: that where within these few moneths you recovered your freedome, thither ye may carry backe again your Empire, safe and sound, unsteined and unfoyled: that all the world may see that Roman souldiours are as forward and nobly minded after the banishing of the Decemvirs, as they were before their creation: and that by the bringing in of equall and indifferent lawes, the manhood and prowess of the people of Rome, is no whit decayed nor diminished. Having uttered these words among the ensignes of the footmen, he made speed to the corners of the horsemen. Go to, brave galls (quoth he) excell the footmen in valour and chivalrie, like as ye exceede them in honor and degree. At the very first shooke and encounter, the footmen forced the enemy to recule: and being now reculed to your hand, set spurs to, gallop after them apace, and chafe them out of the plaine field: they will never abide your violent charge: for even already they are at a bay, and stand rather at a stay, than make any resistance. Hereupon they gird out lustily, and run their horses among the enemies, disordered already and in disarray by the service of the footmen. And having broken through their ranks, and passed forth even to the reward; certain of them cast about in the void and open ground, and when the enemies were about on all sides to flee, they turned most of them away from their campe, and overriding them, they got betweene them and home, and scared them wholly from thence. The footmen and the Consull himselfe, with the whole strength of the maine battaile, made forward to the campe, assailed the tents, won them, and besides a great slaughter, obtained a bootie farre greater.

When newes of this battaile was brought, not onely into the cittie, but also unto the other armie into the Sabines countrie, it was received in the cittie with joy onely and solemnitie: but in the campe it set the souldiours hearts on edge, and enkindled them to strive for the like honour and renowne. Now had Horatius already, partly by sending his souldiours forth, to make reises and outrodes: and partly by training and proving them in light skirmishes, insured and acquainted them to trust unto themselves, and have confidence in their owne good service, rather than to remember the shamefull disgrace & foile, received under the leading of the Decemvirs. And even those final bickerings had done them much good already against they should venture upon a fier field, and hardened them in assured hope to win the victorie. The Sabines againe for their part, still lustie upon their good successe the yeare before, ceased not to provoke and urge their enemies: estoones asking them what they meant after the guise of robbers, to run in and out in small companies, so to trifle out the time, and thus by peece meale to make of one entire battaile many petie and small skirmishes? Why rather fought they not one field for all, and without more ado, hazard all upon a cast, and commit the whole to the triall of fortune, to see unto what side she will incline. Then the Romanes, besides that of themselves they had gathered hart and courage yough, were with the indignitie of this challenge also set on fire: considering, that when the other armie was at the point now, with victorie to returne into the cittie, their enemies began to insult and crowe over them with reprochfull tearmes: and if now they were not meet and even with them, when should they ever bee able to make their parts good? So soone as the Consull perceived the souldiours thus to mutter and mumble within the campe, hee assembled them all together, and thus he spake: Sirs (quoth he) what successe hath bene, and how the service hath sped in Algidum, I suppose you have already heard, namely, such as becomed the armie of a free itate and people. By the pollicie of my fellow Consull, and the manhood of his souldiours together, achieved is the victorie. As for my selfe, that course will I take, and that resolute mind will I carrie, which you my souldiours shall afford unto me. The warre may be drawne out in length profitable: it may be also dispatched and ended speedily. If protracted it shall be, look how I have begun already to traine you, with the same discipline still I will exercise you, and bring to passe, that your hope and prowesse may increase every day more than other. If your hearts now serve you well, and that you like to fight it out, Go on in the name of God, and in token of your willing hart and valorous prowesse, now set up such a crye and shout, as you will make when you first joine battaile, and give the charge. After that they had with exceeding cheerefulness shouted aloud: God bleesse us all (quoth he) I will fulfill your desire, and bring you forth to morrow into the field for to fight. So the rest of that day was bestowed in making their hamish and weapons readie. When morrow was come, the Sabines so soone as they perceived the Romanes raunged in battaile array, came forth also themselves, as readie and desirous of fight, as they. Here was a battaile strucke, such as might becomed two annies, that trusted on both sides in their owne valour, and made full account of that daies honour. The one eager and greedie to recover their ancient glorie, wonted evenmore to have the upper hand, the other proudly bearing themselves, upon a new victorie lately achieved. The Sabines besides, mended their strength well with a stratageme, for when they had equally divided their battaillons every way, they reserved two thousand drawne out of the rest, extraordinary without the rankes apart. Who in the verie time of the conflict, should hotely charge the left point of the Romanes: they advancing overthwart with their ensignes; and flanking them on the same side, pressed threwdly upon that one point, and overcharged it, well neare environned all about. Then the horsemen of two legions, 600 almost in number, alight on foote from their horsebackes, and as their fellowes were even now readie to recule, rush forward with all speed to the forefront: and withall, made head against the enemy. And first, they put life unto them againe, for that they entred equally with the footmen into danger and bare even part thereof: afterwards, for very shame, they gave more boldnesse and animated them to fight. For abashed they

A they were, that horsemen should be put to double service in both kinds of fight, on horse and on foote: and professed footmen not able to countervail the horsemen, who had taken them to their feete. So they advance forward to the battaile, which on their part was abandoned, & make hast to recover the ground which they had lost. And with a trice at one instant, not onely the fight was renewed, but also a battaillon of the Sabines began to shrink. The horsemen closely among the ranks and files of the footmen, gat againe to their horses, and from thence rode speedily unto the other side, reporting to their fellowes the victorie: and withall, sharply charged the enemies, who now were affrighted, because the stronger wing of their side was discomfited: neither were there any in this battaile also, that were seene to performe better service than they. The Consull, as an overseer, beheld all the maner of it, praising those that stood to it manfully and rebuking where they fought but faintly. They were not so soone chastised and reproved, but presently they bare themselves like hardie men and did right good service: and looke how much that praise excited some, so much shame stirred up other. Then with a fresh shout and outcrie, they bent their whole force on all sides, and compelled the enemies to turne their backs: who were not able after this, to abide the violence of the Romanes. The Sabines, scattered here and there all over the fields, left their tents for a spoile to their enemies: where the Romanes recovered againe not the goods of their Allies, as before in Algidum, but their very own, which they had lost by the harrying and spoiling of their lands.

For this two-fold victorie achieved in two sundrie battailes, the Senate right sparingly, (such was their miserie) decreed in the name and behalfe of the Consuls, one daies thanksgiving and proceffion, and no more. But the people, the second day likewise, without order and warrant from authoritie, solemnised the same in great numbers. And this popular proceffion, disorderly as it was and without formalitie, was with more good will and better affection of men celebrated, than the other. The Consuls of set purpose (as it was agreed afore) came within the compasse of those two daies into the cittie: and summoned the Senat to assemble in Mars field: where, as they were about to make some speech of their exploits and worthie actes, the chiefe and principall lords of the Senat, complained and shewed themselves grieved, that the Senat was assembled for the nonce, among the souldiours, to strike a terror into them. Whereupon the Consuls, because they would give no occasion of quarrell and faultfinding, called away the Senat from thence into Prata Flaminia, where now the temple of Apollo standeth: a

D place, which even then they called Circus Apollinaris: where they being denied triumph with one voice and generall consent of the Nobles: L. Scellius, a Tribune of the Commons, propounded unto the people, to know what they thought of the Consuls triumph. And among many that stepped forth to crosse and dissuade the bill, C. Claudius above all others cried out aloud, that the Consull intended to triumph over the Nobles and not over their enemies: and that they sought a thanks by way of recompence for a privat favour done to the Tribune, and not for an honourable reward, for any vertue and worthie act. For never (quoth he) aforetime, was there held any treatie of triumph before the people: but evermore it was referred to the Senat, to consider and determine of that honour. Neither had the Kings at any time, impaired the majestie of that highest court and degree: what should the Tribunes then meddle so much, and have their hand in all matters by vertue of their authoritie, as to suffer no publike counsell at all to remaine in force? For a cittie can never be counted free, nor lawes equall and indifferent, but when each degree and estate retaineth still their own priviledge, and hold their proper preeminence. When the rest of the principall Senatours had spoken much to the same effect, all the Tribes notwithstanding in generally, allowed by their suffrages that which the Tribune had propounded. This was the first time that ever any triumph was granted by the voices of the people, without the authoritie and assent of the Senatours. But this victorie of the Tribunes and the cominaltie, had like to have turned to a dangerous surfeit of licentious libertie: by reason that the Tribunes conspired together and were fully agreed, to be chosen Tribunes againe: and to the end that their owne ambition should be lesse seene above others, they alleaded to the Consull for a sufficient reason (that they likewise should continue still in place of government) the agreement and consent of the Senatours: through whose holding together and drawing in one line, the liberties of the Commons, to the great disgrace and reproch of the Consuls, were infringed and indammaged. For what would come of it, say they, if before the late lawes were fully established, the (new) Consuls with their factious banding, should set upon the new Tribunes: for we must not looke to have alwaies such as the Horatij and Valerij, to be Consuls, men that would not regard their own weale before

umph of the

before the freedome of the comminatie. As it happened very well for that time, it fell to M. Du- tilius his lot especially, to be chiefe president of the Comices and Election: who like a prudent and wise man, foreseeing the hartburning and hatred, like presently to ensue, upon the continuance of the same magistrates still in place, said flatly, that of the old Tribunes he would not pro-pound any one: and when his brethren in office labored earnestly with him, to permit the Tribes to go to a free scrutinie, or els yeeld up the charge to him allotted, of holding the assembly, unto his brethren, who would keepe the same and manage the matter, according to law rather than to the will and pleasure of the Nobles: Duillius then, seeing their earnest contention, caused the Consuls to be called into their owne pures and seates, and demaunded their mindes concerning the Election of the Consuls: and when they answered that they would create new, he having once gotten them to be the authors of a popular sentence, and not popular themselves, went forth together with them into the assembly of the people. Now when the Consuls were brought out into their presence, & were asked the question, what they would doe, in case the people of Rome should elect them Consuls the second time, and that, in remembrance of their libertie received and recovered by their meanes, and for their good service in warre, and worthie actes by them performed: he finding them constant in the same mind still, and nothing altered from their resolution: after hee had commended the Consuls, for their steadfast perseverance unto the last (as altogether unlike to the Decemvirs) went presently to the new Election. And when he had created five Tribunes onely, seeing there were not other competitours enough to reach unto sufficient voices of the Tribes, in comparison of the other nine Tribunes his colleagues who openly stood to be chosen againe: he brake up the assembly, and from that time forward called no more about any Election. For he said, That he had fulfilled the law in that behalfe, which without setting downe any precise and definite number of Tribunes, so that there were some left behind and roomes void, gave authoritie to those that were created, to chuse and take unto them more colleagues, to make up the number. And therewith he recited the words of the law, which run in this forme. If I shall propound ten TRIBUNES OF THE COMMONS TO BE CREATED, AND THEY SHALL THAT PRESENT DAY MAKE FEWER THAN TEN: THEY BY VIRTUE OF THIS LAVV, SHALL BE ACCOUNTED TRIBUNES, VVHOM THOSE ELECTED SHALL CHUSE AND TAKE UNTO THEM FOR THEIR FEL-LOWES, AND AS LAVVFULL SHALL THEY BE HELD, AS THOSE VVHOM THIS DAY YEE SHAL CREATE TRIBUNES OF THE COMMONS. Thus when Duillius persisted still resolute unto the end, saying, That in any case the state might not beare xv. Tribunes; and having thus conquered the greedie ambition of his colleagues: with great favour and the good liking as well of the Nobilitie as the Cominatie, he gave up his roome. The new Tribunes now in the electing and making choise of their companions, curried favour with the Senators, and framed themselves to their will and pleasure, in chusing to them two of the Nobilitie, and those that had been Consuls, to wit Sp. Tarpeius and A. Aternius. And Consuls there were created Sp. Her- minius and T. Virginius Calimontanus. Who bearing themselves in a meane betweene Commons and Nobles, and not greatly inclining to one side or other, had peace as well at home as abroad. L. Trebonius a Tribune of the Commons, being highly offended with the Senators and spitefully bent against them, and saying withall, that in the cooptation of the rest of the Tribunes, he had been cunningly overtraught by them, and betrayed by his colleagues, proposed a law, That whosoever hereafter propounded unto the Commons any Tribunes to be elected, should not give over, but still propound, untill he made up the full number of ten. Thus continued he all his Tribuneship in persecuting and molesting the Nobles, never letting them to be quiet: wherupon he was surnamed * Asper.

 more.

After this, M. Geganus Macrinus, and C. Iulius being created Consuls, appeased the contentious orations of the Tribunes, which were begon and raised against the young Genlemen of the Nobilitie, so as without any bitter invectives against that authoritie of the Tribunes, they preserved still the soveraigne majestie of the Nobles: and by meanes of decreeing musters against the warres of the Volscians and Equians, staied the Commons, and kept the Citie from all sedition and discord: saying, That by civile unitie, all would be at quiet abroad: whereas through discord of citizens, forreiners tooke heart. The care likewise of outward peace, was the cause of inward and intestine concord. But evermore the one state disquieted the moderation of the other: for whiles the Commons were still and in good temper, the punie Senators began to offer them wrong & hard measure. And when the Tribunes would have assisted the weaker side,

A side, at first it bootted little, and small good they did: but afterwards they themselves escaped not without abuse and hurt: and especially in their latter monthes, when as they received injuries; both by reason of the meetings and packing together of the mightier sort, and also for that toward the end of the yeare, the edge and vigor commonly of all authoritie waxeth dull and groweth feeble and weake. So that now the Commons had little or no confidence at all in the Tri-buneship, unlesse they might have such as teilius to be Tribunes: and as for these two yeares last past, they had them but in bare name, and not to any effect and purpose. The elders and ancient fathers of the Senat on the other side, as they beleaved verily that their youth were too cocked and lustie: so they were of this mind, That if there needs must be trespasse and excessse, they had leiffer those of their owne degree and core should exceede measure, and have greater sto-make, than their adversaries. So ticklish and dangerous a thing it is to keepe a meane in maintenance of libertie: whiles under a colour of wishing and desiring equalitie, every man advanceth and listeth up himselfe so, as that he thrusteth and beareth downe another: and in pretending a care and regard that men should not stand in awe and feare of them, they make themselves dread and fearefull to others, and so the wrong that we put off and shove from our selves, we impose upon others, As if there were no remedy, but that we must either doe, or suffer injurie.

Then were made Consuls, T. Quintius Capitolinus the fourth time, and Agrippa Furius: who found neither sedition within, nor warre without. But yet both the one and the other was neare at hand. For now could no longer the diffention of the citizens be held in, but needs it must C breake out. And both Tribunes and Commons rose against the Nobles. For in all the folk-mores and meetings of the people, one or other alwaies of the Nobles and Senatours were served with processe: wherupon grew fresh troubles and new contentions. At the first noife wherof, as if the signall of battaile had been given, and the al'arme stricken up, the Æquians and Volsci-ans tooke armes: and withall, their leaders and captaines (such as gaped greedely after spoile and pillage) had borne them in hand and perswaded them to beleewe, That for these two yeares past, they could not go through with their musters proclaimed: for that the Commons refused to obey, and brake their allegiance: which was the onely cause, that there were no forces sent out against them. Besides, say they, The use and manner of their warfare, is now with their licentious loosenesse, discontinued and cleane decayed: Rome was now no more a common-wealth and countrie to her citizens: For, all their anger, quarrels and malice, that they bare aforetime D against forreine nations, was now turned upon their owne selves: so that at this time they had fit occasion and good opportunitie to surprise them, blinded as wolves with mutuall rage & wood-nes one against another. Hereupon they joyned their whole power, and first wasted the coun-trie of Latium: and afterwards seeing none to encounter them and make defence (to the exceeding joie of those that were the authors of this warre) they came harrying and spoiling al the way to the very wals of Rome, even before the gate Esquilina, there braving and vaunting in re-proachfull and scomfull termes before the whole citie, telling them how they had laid their fields & territories wast. From whence they retired themselves without revenge and losse, driving their booties afore them, and marched along to Corbio. Quintius the Consull seeing this, as-E sembled the people, and there (as I have heard) he made to them a speech in this wise. Albeit I am not privie to my selfe, and my conscience accuseth me not of any fault, O Quirites, yet am I exceedingly abashed and ashamed to come forth into this assembly of yours: that ever you should know, or the posteritie hereafter understand, how the Æquians and Volscians (who of late daies were hardly comparable to the Hernicks) came when T. Quintius was the fourth time Consul, in warlike manner with banner displaid to the wals of the citie of Rome, and went their waies againe cleare and without any hurt by them received. This shamefull dishonour, if I had known it would have light so just in this yeare (and yet for this good while the world hath so gone, and such hath been the course of our life and conversation, that my mind ever gave me there was no goodnesse toward) I would have avoided this place of dignitie, either by banishment or death, if F there had been no other way to escape it. And might indeed have Rome been taken in the time of my Consullship, if those weapons which were under our gates had been in the hands of valorous men? Then had I indeed enjoied sufficient honour already, then had I lived long ynough, and a little too long, and might have died well when I was but the third time Consull. But who were they, I pray you, whom these most base and cowardly enemies of ours, despised and set so light by? Were we they that are your Consuls, or you (Quirites) the people of Rome? If we were

 Consull, to the people of Rome

in the fault, take from us as insufficient & unworthy persons, our rule and government: and if that be not enough, let us over and besides be well punished, and abide the smart. But if the blame be in you Quirites, let neither God nor man chastise your trespass and offence, only do you repent your selves, and be sorie therefore. It was not your cowardise that they scorned and despised, neither was it their owne valour wherein they trusted. For why? they having ben so often defeated and driven out of the campe and the field, fined with forfeiture of lands, forced to go under the galloes, and brought into servitude, knew very well both themselves and you also. No no, the variance and discord betweene our owne states and degrees, is the onely bane, and nothing els, of this citie: the jarres and debates, I say, betweene the Nobles and the Commons. Whiles neither we have any gage or stay of rule and commaund, nor you know meane of freedome and libertie: while you are wearie of Noblemen rulers, and we likewise of the Commoners Magistrates, they have gotten heart, and waxe bold. Now, (Gods will) what meane you to doe, and what would you have? Tribunes of the Commons yee longed and hunkered after: for quietnesse and concord sake, we let you have your longing. Decemvirs you had a great misse of, & them you desired: we granted and permitted them to be created. Wearie you were anone, and all too wearie of Decemvirs: we forced them to forgo their office. And when your anger continued stil against them, being become private persons againe, we suffred to be put to death, and to be exiled, most noble and right honorable men. When you would needs elect a new your Tribunes of the Commons, you chose them at your pleasure. To create Consuls from out of your owne faction, although we knew it hurtfull and prejudiciall to the Nobles, yet have we seene that dignitie proper to Nobilitie, given away as it were, and made common with the Communitie. The assistance of Tribunes, the appealing to the people, the lawes and Acts devised by the Commons, to bee tendered and imposed upon the Nobles, to bind them thereto: and that, under the pretence and colour of respublice, or equall and indifferent lawes, our owne rights and privileges should be overthrowne, we have abidden, and doe still endure. When will there be an end once of discord and dissension? Shall we never have one citie of it? Shall we never have this to bee the common countie of us all? We can be content much better to be at quiet, when we are vanquished, than whiles we are victors. And is it not ynough for you, that you are dread and feared of us? but still you seeke for more? Against us it was, that you tooke the mount Aventine, against us it was that you held and leapt the mountaine Sacer. For when the gate Esquilina, was well-near surprised by the enemye, and when the Volscians our enemies were readie to climbe our trench and banckes, and to scale our wals, none of you there was to be seene, for to remove and set them farther off. Against us ye play the men, against us ye can be armed. Well then, go to: When ye have here beset the Senatoules, taken up the market place and common hall with souldiers, filled the gaole with Noblemen, and those of the cheefest and best qualitie, then with like courage and stoutnesse of heart, sallie forth of the gate Esquilina. Or if you dare not venture so much, behold and view all afore you from the wals, discover your lands and territories with fire and sword wasted and consumed, your goods and cattell had and driven away as booties and prizes, your fermes and horses burning and smoking in every quarter. But all this time the Commonweale onely (you thinke) by this meane is in worse plight and poorer case, the villages fired, the citie besieged, and the enemye goeth his way with the honour of the warre. And in what taking, I pray you, is your own private estate the while? Tidings will come anon to every man particularly, from out of his owne livings and possessions, of his proper losses: and what have you at home (if a man may aske) to make supplie againe? Will the Tribunes make you restitution, and amends for all your damages? You shall have words of them your fill. They will not sticke to speake, to raile, and let siee slanders freely before you against the heads of the citie. Lawes upon lawes you shall have huddled thicke and threefold. Assemblies, convocations, and seditious invectives good store. But from these their folkemotes, never came there any of you home to his house, richer of one gray goat or single denier, nor in better state to live than before. Was there ever any one carried ought from thence to his wife and children, but hatred and mallice, displeasure and rancour, grudges & hartburnings, both publicke and private: from which at all times ye have been shielded and defended, if not with your own vertue and innocencie, yet by the helpe and aid of others. But certes, when ye served in wars under the conduct of us your Consuls, and followed not the leading of your Tribunes: when you served I say in campe, and not in the hall and common place: when in battaile your enemies quaked to heare you shout, and not in your folkemotes, the Romanes were in dread of your uas and outcries: then you wan prizes, and conquered lands from your enemies, then you returned home with triumph

A to your houses, full of riches and wealth, full of honour and renowne, as well publicke as private. Where as now, you suffer your enemies to depart, fraught and loaden with your goods. Sticke to your Warde-Leetes, as if you were nailed and fast pinned to them: dwell still in your hall, and lead your lives continually there: yet must you needs war when all is done, sie from it as fast as you can. Greeved if you indeed, and thought you it a trouble and a painful thing, to take an expedition so farre as into the Volscians and Aequians countie? Lo, the warre is come even un to your gates: if it be not put from thence, it will anon be within the wals, it will scale the castle and arid Capitoll, it will follow you, even into your houses. Two yeares ago, the Senat gave order and commanded, that there should be souldiers mustered, and an armie conducted into Algidum. But we sit still at home and doe nothing, but chide and scold (as it were) one at another, like curst and shrewd women, contenting our selves, and joying in a present peace: and little seeing, that of that rest, there will come sundrie warres againe, and that right shortly. I know full well, there are speeches more pleasing and plausible than these. But to speake the plain truth for your good, rather than to flatter and sooth for your pleasure, if mine own nature and disposition did not reach and admonish me, even very necessitie doth force and constrain me. Willing would I be, and most willing, O Quirites, to please you: but much more would I have you to be in safetie, think whatsoever ye will of me. It falleth out commonly, as a thing that cometh by kind, that who so speaketh to a multitude in his owne cause, and for himselfe, is better liked, and heard with more applause, than hee whose mind aimeth at nothing els but a publicke weale. Vnlesse peradventure you thinke these common flatterers, these clawbackes, and men-pleasers, which give you no rest, neither in warre nor peace, doe stirre you up and provoke you for your good. But will you have the truth? yee being once solicited and pricked on by them, serve their times in good stead, either for their honor or gaine. And because they see themselves to bee of no worth and regard, while the states doe agree, they desire to play small game, rather than to sit out: to be captaines of misrule and leaudnesse, rather than of nothing: and in one word, to be the heads, the ring-leaders and guides of troubles and dissentions. Whereof, if you be so blest and happie, as to be wearie now at length, and will betake you selves to the auncient manners and fashions, both of your owne, and of your auncestors, in lieu of these new fangles, I will refuse no punishment: nay, let me be put to the most shamefull death that is, if I do not before many daies passe over my head, defeat, discomfit and put to flight these robbers and harriers of our fields, and send them packing out of their owne campe, and finally translate and remove this terror of warre, wherewith ye now are so affrighted and altonied, from our gates and wals, even unto their owne townes and cities. Sildome at any time els, had there been a speech delivered by a popular Tribune, more acceptable unto the Commons, than was the sharpe Oration at this present of a most severe Consull. Yea and the very youth, which amid such terrors of warre, had ben wont to refuse souldiery, the onely keene and sharpe weapon they had to fight withall against the Nobles, now desired warre and to be in armes. Over and besides, the countie kernes that fled (to Rome,) such also as were spoiled & wounded in the villages about, reported more foule and cruell outrages in their cares, than were presented unto their eies, and set all the citie in an hoat and angrie broile. Now when the Senatours were assembled together in the Counsell house, then verely they all cast their eies upon Quintius, beholding and regarding him well, as the onely patrone and maintainer of the majestie of Rome: but the chiefe peeres and Lordes of the Senate spake out and said: That hee had made an oration, becomming the soveraigne government of a Consull, becomming so many Consullships by him already borne, becomming the whole course of his life, that had passed off through many honourable dignities, and yet alwaies deserved more. As for other Consuls, they either in flattering and sooothing up the Commons, had betrayed the dignitie of the Nobles: or els in seeking by hard courses to maintaine the rights, preheminiencies and royalties of their state, and to tame the multitude, have thereby made them more fell and untractable. But T. Quintius, he hath made a speech, respective and tending, as well to the royall dignitie of the Nobles, as to the concord and unitie of the States, and principally regarding the condition of the times.

F They would request him therefore, together with his brother Consull, to take in hand the care of the common-weale. They would request the Tribunes likewise, to joine in one accord with the Consuls, and shew themselves willing and forward, to have the warre kept off and put back from their cittie wals: and in so fearefull and dangerous a case, to reclaime their Commons to their due obedience to their Nobles: saying moreover, That the native countie, the common mother of them all, calleth unto the Tribunes and craveth their aid, now that the territories are wa-field, and the citie at hand to be assaulted. Whereupon, they all agreed generally to decree a muster, and presently to make a levie of souldiours. And when the Consuls, had pronounced before the whole people then and there assembled, that it was no time as then to heare excuses, but that all the younger sort, should betimes the next morning by day light, be readie to attend in Mars field: and that after the warre was ended, they would find out and appoint a time, to enquire into their allegations and reasons, that entred not their names: and that he should be taken for a traitour and rebell, whose excuse they allowed not: the whole manhood and youth of the citie shewed themselves the morrow after in readinesse. Each cohort or regiment chose their centinieres or captaines, and every Regiment had two Senatours for their provost marshals. All this was performed (by report) with such speed and expedition, that on the very same daie, the standards and ensignes were by the Questors had forth of the Armorie and chamber of the citie and brought into Mars field: and by the fourth houre (or ten a clocke) the same day, set forward and advanced out of the field. And this new armie, with a few bands of old souldiours, who willingly of their owne accord followed them, marched on, and rested, at ten miles end. The day following they discovered their enemies, and at Corbio encamped close unto them. And by the third day, there was no stay on both hands, but they must needs encounter and fight. For why? The Romanes for anger were sharpe set: the enemies againe, upon a guiltie conscience that they had so often rebelled, were grown desperate. Now, whereas in the Roman armie the two Consuls were in egall commission, yet gave Agrippa place unto his brother Quintius, and yeelded unto him the entire and absolute command. A course most profitable in the managing and execution of great affaires. And being thus preferred, he againe in curtesie answered and requited the others gentleness and inclination to submission, in this wise, by imparting unto him all his counsels: by parting with him all his honour and praise, and by making him his equall, who was indeede his inferiour and underling. In the battaile, Quintius commanded the right point, Agrippa led the left: Sp. Posthumius Albus, the Lieutenant generall, had the conduct of the maine battaile. And P. Sulpitius the other Lieutenant, they set over the horsemen. The footmen of the right point fought most valiantly, and the Volscians received them with equall valour. Sp. Sulpitius with his men of armes, brake through the maine battaile of the enemies: and albeit he might have retired himselfe the same way againe unto his companie, before that the enemies could bring their ranks againe into order, that were disraied: yet he thought it better to charge them upon their backs. And in one moment he had discomfited and quite defeated his enemies, by assailing them behind, and thus affrighting them on both sides, but that the Volscian and Equian horsemen recharged him, held him plaie in his owne fight, and so kept him occupied a good while. Thereat, Sulpitius said, it was no time now to linger and to drive off, but to betirre themselves, crying out aloud, that they were environed round, enclosed within their enemies, & excluded from their owne fellowes, unlesse they set to, and bent their whole force, quickly to dispatch the horse fight: and that it would not serve, to put the horsemen to flight and save their lives: but kill both horse and man, that none might ride backe againe from thence into the battaile to renew the fight. And to make head and resistance against him and his horsemen, they were never able, since that the maine thicke battaile of footmen had given him ground already. Good care they gave to his words, and soone harkned to his direction: & with one entire assault they gave a fierce charge, and defeated the whole power of the Cavallerie, unhorsed and dismounted a number of them, and with their javelins goared both them and their horses. And theres an ende of the horse service. Then they set upon the battaile of the footmen, and dispatched messengers unto the Consuls with newes, what they had done: where also by that time, the battaile of the enemies began to shrink. And when tidings came unto the Romanes that were already upon the point of victorie, they verely were more encouraged: but the Equians that were about to recule, were stricken with greater feare. In the maine battaile first began the overthrow, namely, whereas the men of armes before had broken the array. After them, the left point also began to be distressed and driven backe, by Quintius the Consul. But in the right there was hardest hold, and most a doe. Where, Agrippa being a tall man of his handes and young withall, seeing in every part of the battaile things go better than where he was: caught the ensignes from the enigne-bearers, advanced them forward his owne selfe, yea and fell to flinging some of them against the thickest of his enemies. For feare therefore of so shamefull a disgrace, the souldiours betirre themselves, and freshly assailed the enemy. And so on all hands alike, they achieved the victorie and won the field. Then came a messenger from Quintius, and brought word

A word, that he had the better hand, and was now readie to give an assault upon the campe, but would not breake in, and enter thereinto before he knew for certaine, that they in the left point, also had gotten the upper hand, and made an end of the battell. In case therefore he had discomfited the enemy, he should joine his forces to him, that the whole armie altogether might gaine the spoile and pillage of the tents. So Agrippa, who also for his part was victor, came to his brother Consul and the campe of the enemies, and met with mutuall congratulation one to the other. There, finding but a few to defend, whom they discomfited in the turning of an hand, they brake into the rampier and munitions, without conflict or skirmish: and so besides the recovery of their owne goods againe, which they had lost by the overrunning of the country, they gained also a rich bootie, and retired back with their whole armie. I cannot learn, that either they themselves required triumph, or the Senat offered them any: and no cause appeareth upon record, why they should either refuse, or not hope for that honor. For mine own part, so far as I can guesse in so long distance of times, seeing that Valerius and Horatius, who over and besides the conquest of the Volscians and the Equians, had the honour also of dispatching and finishing the Sabines warre, were denied triumph at the Senates hand; these Consuls might not with modestie, sue for the same having performed but halfe the good service of the others: least if they had gotten it graunted, there might have seemed more regard had of the persons, than of the deserts.

But this noble and honourable victorie over the enemies abroad, thus achieved, was obscured and foule distained with a shamefull dome of the people, in a controversie of their allies, about the bounds and meeres of certaine lands. The inhabitants of Aricia and Ardea, having warred oftentimes one with the other, about some lands in question betweene them, and by giving and taking fundrie foiles and overthrows outwearied, chose the people of Rome their Vintire, to decide and determine this quarell. And when they were come with their counsell to plead the case, the Magistrates graunted a court of Assises of the people. Where was much arguing and dispute on both sides before them: and after the witnesses were deposed, and that at length the Tribes should be called to the scrutinie, and the people give their voices: there steps forth an old father, one P. Scaptius, a Commoner. And I (quoth he) for my part, O Consuls, if it be lawfull to speake for the good of the State, will not suffer the people to erre, and be deceived in this question. When as the Consuls denied him audience, as being an old foole, and of no credit: and commanded him (as he cried still that the publicke cause of the citie was betrayed) to behad away, he calleth for the assistance of the Tribunes. The Tribunes then, who lightly are ever overruled by the multitude, rather than able to rule them, yeelded unto the Commons: That for as much as they were desirous to heare what the old man could say, Scaptius should speake his mind at large. Then setteth he the tale on end, and beginneth thus: I am (quoth he) fourescore winters old, and three on the head of it: and even upon that very ground, for which all this strife and variance is, I served as a souldior, when I was no young man neither, but one that had been prest to warres, and received pay twentie yeares afore. And it was, I remember well, during the siege before Corioli. Hither am I now come, to give evidence of a thing by long continuance of time, worn out cleane and forgotten of other men, but fresh in my knowledge and remembrance: to wit, that the lands thus litigious, and in controversie, had been sometime within the confines of the Coriolanes: and after the winning of Corioli, were seised by right of conquest, to the Commons of the people of Rome. I marvel much therefore, by what custome and prescription, the Ardeates and Aricines, who never had right and interest, and were not possessed of the land, (so long as Corioli stood in prosperitie) should hope to defeat the people of Rome thereof, whom being the LL. in fee of the ground, they had chosen for their Arbitrator. As for mee, I have but a small while to live, and one foot already is in grave: and yet I cannot find in my heart, but (to that land, which whileme, I being a young and lustie souldior, did my best to fight for, and conquered with sword in hand) make claime now that I am aged, by word of mouth, the one lie meanes left mee to recover it. I advise the people therefore in good sadnesse, that in a vaine respect of bootlesse modestie, they condemne not their owne cause, nor give away their right. The Consuls marking well what audience was given to Scaptius, and that he was heard not onely with silence, but also with good liking and contentment, cried out upon this abominable practise: calling both heaven and earth to witnesse, and therewith sent for the Lordes of the counsell: and joyning with them, went to the Tribunes, fell in hand with them, and instantly besought them not to go forward with this most leud action for the present, & a more shamefull precedent for the time to come: namely, that Vmpiers and daies-men, should convert the thing in

A controversie betweene the Ardeates and Aricines, decided by the people of Rome.

The evidence given by old Scaptius „ suit unto their own and proper vanrage: especially considering, that, Admit it were a lawfull thing „ for a judge himselfe to have an eie and regard to his own commoditie: yet would there not be so „ much gained and gotten by comming thus betweene, and interverting the land, as there would „ be damage and hinderance another way, in alienating by those hard courtes, the hearts of their „ good friends and Allies. For the losses (verely) and cracks of name and credit, are such as may not „ be valued at any price. And should the embassadours indeed, say they, go their waies home with „ this goodly catch? and make report abroad how they have sped? should our confederats heare „ this? should our enemies come by the knowledge thereof? with what griefe the one? with what „ joy the other? Thinke ye that our neighbour nations will impute, attribute, and ascribe this, unto „ the speech made by Scaptius, a prating old busie body & one that loveth to heare himselfe speake „ in assemblies? Nay this is certaine: well may Scaptius be famous and much talked of, in the „ playing of this pageant: but the people of Rome shall incurre the obloquie, to have acted the „ part under the visour of Scaptius, of a cunning promoter, and a false interceptour to him„ selfe, of other mens right in suite. For, what judge at any time in a private matter, hath done „ the like, as to award the thing in question, unto himselfe? Why, even Scaptius, past all shame „ and grace as he is, would never have done it. These and such like words, spake both Consuls and „ Senatours aloud in all their hearing. But the covetousnesse of men, and Scaptius that first set „ them a longing and their teeth a watering, prevailed more than they all. The Tribes were cal„ led to the Scrutinie of their voices, & gave judgment, That the lands pertained to the common „ Teiritorie of the people of Rome. Neither can it be denied, but it would have so appeared in„ deed, in case it had been tried before other judges. But now, for all the goodnesse of the „ cause, is not the ignominie of the arbitrement one jot the lesse: Nay, the Aricines „ and Ardeates themselves, thought not more shamefully and hardly of „ it, than the very Senatours and Peeres of Rome. The rest „ of the yeare continued quiet, from all trou„ bles as well domestickall as

THE FOVRTH BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIVS

Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the fourth Booke.

The law concerning marriage betwene the Nobles and the Commons, was proposed, and with much ado enacted by the Tribunes of the Communalitie: not withstanding, the Nobles withstood it. Tribunes militarie with full authoritie of Consuls, were created. Under this kind of Magistracie was the State ruled for certaine yeares, both in cittie and in warre. The lands of the Ardeates, which had been awarded from them by an arbitrement of the people of Rome, were restored againe unto them, and Colonies sent to inhabit the same. In the time of a great dearth and famine at Rome, one Sp. Maelius, a Roman knight, dealt come amongst the people freely, at his owne proper charges: by which deed he won the favor of the Commons: and thereby aspiring to be king, was at the commandment of Quintius Cincinnatus, the Dictator, slaine, by the hands of C. Servilus Hala, General of the Horsemen. L. Minutius, who disclosed the treason, had their Statues or Images erected at the Rostra, or the common Crosse of the cittie, because they died in the service of the Commonwealth. Cornelius Cos-sus a Colonell, having slaine with his owne hand Tolumnius, the king of the Veintians, won and bare away the second of all spoiles. M. Aemilius Aemilius the Dictator, limited the government of the Consularship, within the compasse of one year and six months, which before that time continued five yeares: and for that act, was shamefully disgraced by the Consuls.
Fidenes was conquered and subdued, and thither were Colonies sent to dwell. Whom the men of Fidenes slew, and revolted from the people of Rome: and by M. Aemilius Aemilius the Dictator were subdued, and the cittie forced. The conspiracie of the bondslaves was suppressed. Posthumius a Tribune militarie, was for his crueltie slaine by his owne soldiors. The sold-iors then first, and never before, had their pay out of the common treasure. Moreover, this booke containeth the warres against the Volsicians and Veintians, the Fidenates and Falisci.

Here succeeded Consuls after these, M. Genutius and P. Curiatius. A yeare full of broiles, both at home and abroad. For in the beginning of the yeare, both Canuleius, a Tribune of the Commons, proposed a law, concerning alliance of the Patritians with Commons, by way of marriage. Whereby the Nobles supposed their blood to be defiled, and the rightes and privileges of families and houses confounded. Also, whereas at first the Tribunes by little and little had moved, That one of the Consuls might bee created out of the Commons: now the matter proceeded so far, that of ten Tribunes that then were, the other nine propounded this in plaine termes for a law, That it might be in the peoples power to chuse both the Coss, (if they would) either out of Commons or Nobilitie. Mary, if that should come to passe, the Nobles thought indeed that the soveraigne rule and authoritie, was not only made common with the basest sort, but also translated altogether from the great men and best of the cittie, to the comminalltie. Glad were the Senatours therefore to heare say, that the people of Ardea, for the wrongfull awarding away of their lands from them, were revolted: and that the Veintians had wasted the frontiers of the Romanes: and that the Volsicians and Aequians grudged and muttered for the fortifying of Verrugo. So much preferred they any warre, miserable though it were and dangerous, before a shamefull and dishonourable peace. Having heard therefore these newes, and taken them in the worst manner: to the end that amidst the rumour

mour and bruite of so many warres, the Tribunitian troublesome suites might staie and bee dead for the time: they command musters to be taken, souldiours to be levied, all furniture of war, and all manner of force to be prepared, and (if it might be) with more indevor, than it had been when T. Quintus was Consul. Then C. Canuleius, after some hoat words which he spake aloud in the Senate, namely that the Consuls by frighing the Commons, went about but in vaine, to avert them from the regard of their new lawes: and that so long as he had any breath in his bodie, they should never go through with muster, unlesse the Commons had first ratified those things, which by him and his brethren had been propounded: forthwith assembled the people together. Thus at one instant the Consuls animated the Senate against the Tribune, and the Tribune incited the people against the Consuls. The Consuls gave it out plainly and said, that no longer now might these furious courses of the Tribunes be endured. Now were they come to the very height & extremitie, and raised more war in effect, at home, than the enemies abroad. Which thing (no doubt) happened not so much through the fault of the Commons, as of the Nobles, not of the Tribunes more, than of the Consuls. For looke what thing was best rewarded in a citie, the same alwaies most increased: thus men in peace (we see) prove excellent, thus in warre they come to bee singular. In Rome (say they) seditions sped ever best, and have been reputed both to each one in particular, and to all in generall most honourable. But let the Senat call to mind the dignitie which they themselves had received from their fathers, & compare it with that which they were like to leave to their children: and see, whether they may boast as the cominaltie doth, how that their condition is much bettered and more glorious than before. Well, neither is there any end now, nor ever will be, so long as the authours of seditions be as highly advanced, as the seditions themselves are prosperous and fortunate. See what matters and how great hath Canuleius attempted! He would bring in a minglemangle and confusion of kindreds and houles, a perturbation in the managing both of publike and private affaires: that nothing might be sincere and intire, nothing pure and undefiled: that all difference and distinction being taken away, no man might know either himselfe or his. For what thing doth these mixtures of states and degrees by mariages draw after them, without all order and difference: but that like bruit beasts in a manner, Commons and Nobles may go and couple together: so that the children betwene them borne, shall not be able to tell of what blood he is descended, and to what religion he doth belong, being a mungrell, as it were, the one halfe a Noble, the other a Commoner: and not well suiting and according with himselfe? They thought it not enough (belike) that all divine and humane lawes, were confused and shuffled together: for now these mutinous persons, these busie heads and troublers of the common people, addresse themselves to shoot at the Consulship. At first, they sounded in privat speeches and secret enticements, only, how to compasse, That one of the Consuls might be created out of the bodie of the Commons: but now they go roundly to worke, and carrie it before them: they are so bold to prefer laws (sterbooth) that the people might make them both, either Nobles or Commons, at their good pleasure. Wherby (no doubt) they would make choise from out of the Commons, of the most seditious persons of all other. We shall have then the Canuleians and Scilians to bee our Coss. But Jupiter (that great good god) forbid, that ever the royal & imperial majestie, should come to that low & desperate passe: die they would a thousand deaths rather, than suffer so great a shame & indignitie: knowing this assuredly, that their ancitours also, if they had once suspected or foreseene, that by granting the cominaltie every thing as they desired, they would not have proved more bonair and buxome towards them, but rather more churlish & untractable: and when they had obtained their first suites, to proceed still to demanda worfe and worfe, one thing after another: they would sooner have indured at the first, any contesting and debate whatsoever, than suffered those hard conditions to be imposed and put upon them: and because they had once relented, that Tribunes should be created, therefore to grant them againe the second time. So that as now, there is no ho with them, nor end of quarrels will be none, so long as in one and the selfesame citie, Tribunes and Senatours remaine together. Nay verely, either this state must be put downe, or that office utterly adolished. And better late than never, to withstand and meet with their rash and desperat boldnesse. What? shall they without controllment, first sowe discord at home, and then stir up forreine wars abroad? and afterwards, against those wars which themselves have raised, debar and hinder the citie, for to take armes and defend it selfe? and when as they, have as good as sent for the enemies to come to their dores, then, not suffer an

- A armie to be levied against them. But let Canuleius (if he dare) speake these wordes out in the Senat, That unlesse the Nobles suffer his laws, as if he were a Conquerer, to be admitted and received, he will stay the mustering? For what els is that, but to threaten that he will sell and betray his countrie, and suffer it to be assailed and lost? What encouragement will such a word give as that, I say not, to the cominaltie of Rome, but to the Volscians, Aequians and Veientians? Will not they hope, under the conduct of Canuleius, to be able to scale the Capitoll and the castle, if so be the Tribunes shall take from the Nobilitie their courageous hearts, as they have bereaved them already of their right, their honour and dignitie? Let him know therefore, that the Consuls are readie, first to shew themselves to be captaines and leaders, against the mischievous practices of their own citizens, before they will make head against the armed forces of their enemies?
- B Whils these matters were debated of with great contention & heat in the Senat house, Canuleius for the maintenance of his laws, and to crosse the Consuls, made this Oration unto the people. How greedily the Nobles have despised you! O Quirites, how unworthie they have ever thought you, to live among them within the wals of one citie, me thinks I have, as often heretofore, so now especially & most of all perceived: in that they have risen up altogether so fiercely to check and withstand our proposed lawes. Wherein, what pretend we els, but to tell them and put them in mind, That we are, as well as they, citizens: and although we are not of the same wealth, yet we inhabit the same countrie with them? In the one, we request mariages: a thing to borderers, yea and to forrainer nations usually granted: and to speake of our selves, we also have afforded even to our conquered enemies, the benefit of our citie, which is far more than marriage. In the other, we move no new matter, but onely claime againe and challenge that, which is the peoples right, to wit, that the people of Rome may bestow their offices and dignities, upon whom they please. What reason have they then, I pray you, to set all on an uprore, as if heaven and earth should go together? and what is the cause, that erewhile I had like to have had violence offered unto me in the Senate? What moved them to breake out and say, they could not forbear nor keepe their hands from me, and threaten to abuse and violate the sacred authoritie of the Tribunes? Set case that the people of Rome may have their free voices & suffrages, to elect the Consuls whom they will, and that no Commoner be denied, so he be worthie of the highest place, for to obtaine the soveraigne dignitie. How then? cannot this citie possible stand any longer? and is our Empire come to an end for ever? And all one it is (belike) and importeth as much, to disabie a Commoner, for being made Consul, as if a man inferred, that a bondman or a freed libertine should become Consul. Perceive you not yet (my Maisters) in what contempt you live? They would, if they might, bereave you in some measure of this day light: that yee breath and speake, that yee have the shapen of men, they thinke much, they repine, and it goes to their heart. And what els? They give it out flatly and say (if God will) it is unlawfull, that a Commoner should be a Consul. I beseech you heare me a litle. If we may not be allowed to read the Chronicles, nor to peruse the Highpriests records and registers, know we not those things then, that even all strangers know? namely, That Consuls entred in place of kings, & succeeded them, and have no other right, preheminance or dignitie at all, than kings had before? Thinke yee that men have never heard, that Numa Pompilius, a man not so much as a cittizen of Rome, much lesse then, as the peoples voices, and the assent of the Nobles, created king of Rome? Also, afterwards, how L. Tarquinius, who was no Romane borne, no nor yet so much as an Italian, but the sonne of Demaratus the Corinthian, a stranger inhabitant at Tarquines, and from thence removing, albeit king Anco his sonnes were living, attained likewise to the crowne? Moreover, how Servius Tullius after him, the sonne of a captive woman of Corniculum, whose father was unknowne, whose mother a bondwoman, through wit and vertue, obtained & held the kingdome? For what should I speake of T. Tatius the Sabine, whom Romulus himselfe, the father and founder of this citie, admitted to raigne together with him? Well, so long as no stocke was disdained, no race rejected, wherein appeared sparkes of vertue, the Romane Empire became mightie, and flourished. Some yee then at this day, a Consul out of the Comminaltie, when our forefathers despised nor kings that were aliens and strangers? No, nor when the kings were expelled, was this citie denied and shut against forreiners, that were valorous, and men of action. The kinred and whole name (I am sure) of the Claudij, after the kings were exiled, we not onely admitted into our citie, from out of the Sabines, but also received into the number of the Patritians and Noble men.

men. And may a meere forrainger indeed become a Nobleman, and so a Consull? And shall a citizen of Rome, if he be of the Communalitie, be wholly disabled and out of all hope for ever being Consull? Tell me I pray you, Thinke ye it not possible, that a valiant and hardie man, approved both in warre and peace, being one of the Commons, may prove like to Numa, L. Tarquinius, or Servius Tullius; and if he doe, whether shall we suffer him to governe the Commonweale or no? And whether will ye have our Consuls, such rather as the Decemvirs (the most wretched and wicked persons under the sunne, who, by your leave, were at that time of the Nobilitie) than strangers and new commers, which of all the Kings were simply the very best? But forsooth, presently after the KK. were depofed and expelled, there was not one of the Com. a Consull. What of that? ought no new thing to be ordained, and which hath not been already taken up afore? For many things have not yet been practised, (as in a state newly incorporat) ought not such then to be put in use, if they be thought expedient? While Romulus reigned, there were no Bishops nor Augurs: by Numa Pompilius they were created. There was no Sessing of the people at all in the citie, no description of Hundreds and Clases. By S. Tullius they were instituted. Coss. were never heard of before: when the KK. were driven out, they were elected. The time was, when neither the absolute rule nor yet the name of a Dictator was knowne. In our fathers daies it first began. Tribunes, Ediles, Questors there have been none: it was ordained they should be made. Within this ten yeares, we have both created and also abolished out of the common-weale, Decemvirs for the making and penning of our lawes. And who doubteth, but in a citie founded for ever to endure, and increasing still infinitely, there will be brought in new governments, new priesthoods and sacerdotall dignities, new privileges both of kindreds and privat persons? And even this one thing in question, to wit, that the Com. and Nobles might not joine in marriage, were not the Decemvirs they that first within these few yeares made that Edict? A most shamefull ensample and precedent in a free state, and tending to the manifest wrong of the Commons. Can there be any greater or more notorious injurie, than that there should be in a citie one part and member, as defiled and polluted, thought unworthie of the bond of marriage? What els is this, but to suffer exile and confining within the same wals, when they debarre us that we should not be either allied in affinitie or knit in kindred? They provide (forsooth) and take order that bloud should not be mixed, nor families confused. How then? If this doe pollute this gentrie of yours, which most of you descended from the Sabines & Albanes, have not by right linc from the Patritians, but by coopration and election into the number of the Nobles, as being chosen either by the favour and grace of the Kings, or els by the peoples voices after the KK. were expelled: could not your wisedomes have kept your bloud uncorrupt by some private meanes and provision: namely by taking heed neither to espouse wives from among the Commons, nor to suffer your daughters and sisters to be married to any other than Nobles? No commoner (ye might be sure) would have forced a daughter of any noble house: no, these insolencies of lascivious lust are appropriat to gentlemen onely of the Nobilitie: none of us would have compelled any of you against his will, to make covenant and contract of matrimonie. But ywis, that by an expresse law it should be forbidden, and that marriage betweene Nobles and Commons should be condemned, that is it, which to the cominaltie is a plaine contumely and open injurie. And why conferre ye not and lay your heads together, that the rich may not marry with poore? That, which at all times and in all places, hath been a matter left unto particular policie & consideration, namely, That into what house soever a woman cast liking & fancie, there she might be married: and into what familie a man obliged himselfe by word, promise and covenant, from thence he might take a wife: even that, restraine ye within the bonds of a most proud and tyrannicall law: whereby ye might breake in sunder all civile societie, and of one citie make twaine. Why forbid ye not by a positive law, that a commoner should not dwell by a Nobleman, or go the same way that he doth, or frequent the same feast, or converse in the same market or common place of assenbly? For in effect what difference is there, if a gentleman marry a commoners daughter, or a commoner espouse a gentlewoman? What right I pray you or condition of state is thereby changed? surely the children still take after the father. Neither seeke we for any thing els by matching with you, but only this, that we may be reckoned in the number of men and of citizens. Neither is there any cause, why you should so contend and stand upon it (unlesse it doe you good to crosse and take a pleasure to exercise your selves in working us disgrace and shame.) Finally I would gladly know whether the soveraigne government of the state resteth

A resteth in you or in the people of Rome? When the Kings were driven out, got you thereby to your selves lordly soveraigntie, or purchased all men equall libertie? It must needs be granted, that the people of Rome may at their pleasure publish and ordaine a law. And will ye then as soone as any law whatsoever, is by them proposed, appoint a muster presently for their punishment? and as soone as I that am Tribune, shall begin to call the wards to give their voices, shall you that are Consuls, by and by swear all the younger sort, presse them to warfare, lead them forth unto the field, and menace the Commons, menace I say, the Tribune also? What? If ye had not twice already good experience, howe little these goodly threats of yours prevailed against the Com. when they agreed and stucke together, it were somewhat. Will ye say, that ye forbore to strive, ye tendered our good, and for pittie spared us? Nay rather, to say a truth, was not this the cause that no fray was made, For that the stronger side was also the more coole and modest of the twaine? Neither (O Quirites) will there now, I warrant you, bee any combat, nor blowes dealt: they will alwaies assay and sound, what stomackes and hearts ye have, but never will they feele your fists, and trie how keene your swords be. Therefore to these wars (be they falsely pretended, or truly indeede reported) O ye Consuls, the Commons are readie prest to follow you: provided alwaies, that by granting them libertie of mutuall marriage, ye will make at length this citie one: that they may be linked, joyned and united unto you, by privat alliance and affinitie: that hardie and valiant men may have hope and possibilitie, to honours and dignities: that they may be allowed fellowship and societie in the Commonweale: Finally, that (which is due unto equall libertie) they may one with another in alternative course, obey annually and as great as ye will. There is not one shall give his name, nor one shall take armes, nor one shall fight for those proud Lords, with whome they can have neither fellowship of dignitie in the common-weale, nor alliance of marriage in privat estate. Now when as the Consuls also were come forth into the open assenbly of the people, and that they fell on all hands from continued and long orations, to short dispute and altercation: the Tribune demanded why a commoner might not attaine to a Consulship? Vnto whom the Consull returned an answer, as to the substance perhaps truly, so for the present contention not very wisely and to the purpose: Namely, because that no commoner had the Auspices: which was the cause why the Decemvirs ordained distinct marriages, least upon a doubtfull and mingled issue, there should follow a troubled confusion of the Auspices. But hereat, the Commons stormed and stamped most of all: that as odious men unto the immortall gods, they were flatly denied and deemed unworthie to observe the flight and singing of birds. And never gave they over their heates of clamorous debate (whiles the Commons had gotten unto them a most sharpe Tribune to set them a worke, and were themselves in obstinacie no whit behind him) untill at length the Nobles were overcome and driven to graunt, that the law as touching marriage should passe: supposing by that meanes especially, that the other Tribunes would either cleane give over their suite for making commoners Consuls, or at least wile put it off, untill the warre were ended: and that the Commons in the meane while being well pleased and contented with marriage among the Nobles, would be willing and readie to levie a muster. Canulius for this his victorie over the Nobles, and for the favours he gat among the Commons, became a great & mighty man. Whereupon, the other Tribunes were kindled to the like combate: and for the proceeding of their law also, indovoured with all their might and maine. And albeit the rumor of the warre encreased daily more and more, yet they hinder the levie of souldiors. The Consuls seeing now that no decree and order could passe the Senat house, by reason that the Tribunes interposed their negative voice: tooke counsaile together with the chiefe of the Nobilitie at home in their privat houses. And wel they saw that they must yeeld either the victorie to their enemies, or the buckler to their own citizens. Of all the Senators that had ben Coss. only Valerius and Horatius were not present at these counsailes. C. Claudius his opinion was, That the Consuls should put themselves in arms against the Tribunes: But the two Quintij, Cincinnatus and Capitolinus, abhorred all bloudshed and violent proceedings against those, whom by a solemne covenant made with the Commons, they had received and accepted for to be as sacrosainct and unviolable. But in these counsailes they grew to this point in the end, that they suffered militarie Tribunes of equall power with the Consuls, to be created indifferently from out of the Commons and Nobles: provided alwaies, that as touching creation of the Consuls, there should be no alteration from the old manner aforetime. And herewith were both Tribunes and Commons well satisfied and contented. A generall assembly therfore was proclaimed for the chusing of three Tribunes in Consuls authoritie, which being once published: forthwith as many as had spoken or done ought tending to sedition, and above all others those that had been Tribunes of the people, began in their whited robes to take hold of men and run too and fro about the common place labouring for this dignitie. At the first, the Nobles partly in dispaire of obtaining the place (seeing the Commons to set a flore) partly for disdain and indignation to beare any honourable office jointly with them of so base condition, were scared and affrighted from standing therfore: at the last (but they were forced thereto first by the heads and the chiefe Lords of the Senate) they were content to be competitous and suiters for the dignitie: least they might seeme to be fully excluded forth of the possession of the Common-weale, and leave it entirely for the Commons. The event and effect of this Court, shewed plainly, that mens minds are otherwise affected in contending about libertie and dignitie, than presently after such contentions laid away, they are in weighing and judging aright without passion and affection. For the people satisfied herewith, that there was some account made of the Commoners, and that they were not shut out, elected militarie Tribunes all of the Nobles. This modestie, this equitie, this noble mind, where shall a man nowadaies find in one person, which then was to be scene in the whole people? In the three hundredth and tenth yeare after the citie of Rome was founded, were the first militarie Tribunes created, that bare office in the roome of the Consuls, to wit, A. Sempronius Aratinus, L. Attilius, and C. Caelius: in whose government, concord at home caused also peace abroad. There bee writers, who affirme, That upon occasion of the Veientian warre, and the rebellion of the Ardeates, because two Consuls were not able to manage so many warres at once, therefore were three militarie Tribunes chosen: without making any mention of the law published, concerning election of Consuls of the Commons: and that they were invested both in the jurisdiction, and also in the ornaments of the Consuls. Howbeit, the exercise of that government, stood not fast and sure, nor continued long. For within three moneths after that they entred, they forewent their office, by a decree of the Augurs, as if there had been some error in their creation. It was alledged that C. Caelius, who was President of that court of Election, had taken his quarters amiss for the observation of the luckie signes by flight of birds, and not according to the Augurs skill.

There came from the Ardeates to Rome, Embassadors, complaining of wrong received, in these termes: That if it might be redressed, and amends made, and their grounds restored, they seemed willing to abide still in league and amitie. Answer was made them by the Senat, that the judgement of the people, already passed, could not bee reversed by the Senate, if it were for nothing els but for concord sake and agreement of the States: besides, they had neither any precedent to lead them thereto, nor law and authoritie to warrant them. Marrie, if the Ardeates would wait their times, and put to the Senates arbitrement and discretion, the redresse and easement of their injurie pretended, it would come to passe, that in proesse of time they should not repent of governing their passions, and brideling their choler: and should well know, that the Nobles had a good regard, that there should no wrong bee offered unto their friends, as they were careful, that if any were offered, it should not long continue. Thus the Embassadors, promising, to make a true report, unto their citizens of the matter, wholly as it was: were friendly dismissed, and had their discharge.

The Senatours seeing now the Commonweale, without any sovereign magistrat of the chaire and of State, went together, and made an Interregent: and whiles they strove whether Consuls or Tribunes should be created, the Interregent continued many daies. The Interregent and the Senate laboured, that there should be an Election of Consuls: the Tribunes on the other side, and their Communitie, were for the Tribunes Consular. But the Senatours prevailed, because both the people seeing they were to conferre the one office or the other, upon the Nobles, furceased to strive any more: and also the cheefe of the Commons, chose rather to have that Election, wherein they should not be once propounded, than wherein they were sure to take the repulse, as unworthie. The Tribunes also gave over to contend any longer to no purpose, and without effect, seeming thereby somewhat to gratifie and pleasure the L.L. of the Senate. So T. Quintius Barbatus the Interregent, chose for Consuls L. Papyrius Mugilanus, and L. Sempronius Aratinus. Whiles these were Consuls, the league with the Ardeates was renewed. And this is the onely evidence and prooffe, that they were Consuls that yeare, for that neither in the auncient yearely records, nor in the kalenders of the magistrates, they are found at all. I take it, because the militarie Tribunes were created in the beginning of that yeare: and therefore, although these Consuls were in their stead chosen, yet their names were left out, as if the other had remained in office the whole yeare.

Licinius Macer affirmeth, that they are mentioned both in the composition with the Ardeates, and also in the linnen bookes or registers in the church of Iuno Montia. Albeit there had ben so many terrors and bravadoes, threatened from the borderers, yet both abroad & at home, all was quiet. And whether Tribunes onely, or Consuls also chosen in the roome of Tribunes governed in this yeare; certaine it is, that the next following, had Consuls M. Geganius Macerinus the second time, and T. Quintius Capitolinus the fifth time. This was the very yeare when the Censors office came up first. A thing that rose of a small beginning: which notwithstanding afterwards, increased to that height, that it had government of the manners and discipline of the Romanes: and under the jurisdiction thereof, the Senate and Centuries of the order of knights, the distinction of worship and shamefull disgrace, were reduced. Likewise, the survey of publicke and private Edifices, yea, and the tributes, revenues & subsidies of the people of Rome were at the disposition, ordering, & discretion of that office. The beginning of which thing arose upon this occasion: For that the people in many years space had not ben affected and numbered, and seeing the Cense could be deferred no longer, nor the Consuls (by reason of warres, from so many nations imminent) had leisure to goe about and accomplish that busines: the Senat therfore made a motion, that the charge being painfull, and not for the majestic of Consuls to busie themselves in, required a speciall Magistrate, and a peculiar officer by it selfe. Under whome should attend the Secretaries and Clarke: who likewise should have the keeping and charge of the rolles and publick records: and at whose discretion should passe the shewes & instruments of all Assesiments. The Senatours therefore accepted gladly of this ouerture, although it were but a trifling matter: yet because there should be the more Magistrates of the Nobilitie. Supposing (I wene) it would come to passe, as (it proved indeed) that shortly the power and wealth of those, who bare the office, should win more authoritie and credite unto the thing. Yea, and the Tribunes also made no great adoe, but suffered it to passe, being an office (as it was in truth, no other at that time) rather of necessitie and attendance, than of shew, port, or honour: because they would not seeme to be cross and peevish in every small matter. When as therefore this dignitie was of the principall of the citie refused, the people by their voices chose to that Office, Papyrius and Sempronius, of whose Consulship there was some doubt: to the end, that by that office they might supplie and make up the defect and misse of a Consulship. And of the exercise and function it selfe, Censors were they called.

Whiles these things were a doing at Rome, there came Embassadors from Ardea, craving as well in regard of their most auncient amitie, as also of the late league renewed, their helping hand for their cittie, welnigh undone and overthrown. For, peace (which wisely and by right good advise they had kept and maintained with the people of Rome) they might not enjoy at home, by reason of inward debate and domestick quarrels. The cause and beginning whereof, as it is reported, arose from siding and factions, which have been and will be to most States more pernicious, than forraine warres, than famine or plague, or other adversities, which men attribute to the anger and wrath of God, as the extremitie of all publicke calamities whatsoever. There was a maiden, a Commoners daughter & no better, by birth, but for her rare beautie of singular note and passing renowne: whom two young men were suiters unto. The one of the same condition or estate that the maiden was of, and who relied upon her guardians and tutors, who also were of that degree and calling: the other a gentleman, enamoured on her, onely for her beautie. As for him, he had the good wils of the best in the citie, by whose meanes the strife of partaking, entred even into the house of the damosell. For the Gentleman in the mothers judgement, was the more welcome and better liked of, whose desire was, that the maiden should be preferred by marriage, and be most worshipfully bestowed. The Guardians also banded themselves, and laboured for their partie. But when as the matter might not be ended within dopes, it came to suit in law. And when the reasons and allegations were heard, both of the mother, and also of the Guardians, the Iudges pronounced sentence of marriage to bee at the disposition of the mother. But might prevailed more than right. For the Tutors aforesaid, openly in the market place of the citie, tie, having amongst those of their bend and faction, complained of that injurious award, with a troupe of men by force, set the maiden out of the mothers house. Against whom arose a stronger power of the gentry, and followed the young Gentleman, who was incensed and set on fire upon this injurie offered. Whereupon ensued a cruell fray. The Commons being defeated, went forth (farre unlike to the Commons of Rome) armed as they were out of the citie, and tooke for their hold a hill, and invaded the lands of the Nobles with fire and sword: and having gathered to them a multitude of Artificers and handicrafts men, whom in hope of spoile they had called forth, they purpose and prepare to besiege the citie also, which aforesaid had been altogether unacquainted with the like sturres. In such sort, as no kind of calamitie that followeth warre, was wanting: as if the poore citie had been tainted, infected, and poisoned with the furious madnesse of two brainesicke young men, seeing a wofull and deadly marriage, with the utter ruin and destruction of their native countrie. And neither part thought it ynough to warre and fight at home among themselves. For the Nobles solicited the Romanes for to rescue their besieged citie: the Commons stirred up the Volscians, to helpe to force and sacke the citie. The Volscians under the conduct of Aequus Cluilius came first to Ardea, and against the walls of their enemies, raised a countermine, and cast a trench, and blocked the towne round about. Which tidings being brought to Rome, forthwith M. Geganius Consul, went forth with an armie, and incamped himselfe three miles from the enemies: and the day being now farre spent & drawing toward night, he commaundeth his souldiours to refresh and make much of themselves, and take their rest: and afterwards at the releefe of the fourth watch, he brought forth his ensignes, set his men to worke, and sped his businesse once begun, so that by the sun-rising, the Volscians might see themselves invested more streightly by the Romanes, then the citie beleagured by them. And on another side the Consull had joined a sconce to the wall of Ardea, by which way his souldiours might go and come in safetie. The captaine of the Volscians, who had to that day prepared no victuals, but sustained his armie onely with the corne which he had for the present from day to day robbed by foraying the countrie, seeing himselfe intrenched, and of a suddain to be destitute of all things, called the Consull forth to emparel, saying. That if the Romanes comming was to raise the siege, he would remove and dislodge from thence. To which againe the Consull made this replie, That vanquished men were to take, and not to make articles of conditions: neither should they, as they were come at their pleasure to assault the allies of the Romanes, so depart againe when they list to Volsci. He commaundeth therefore to yeeld their Generall, to lay down their weapons, confessing themselves overcome, and to be at his devotion. Otherwise he would bee a bitter and mortall enemy unto them, whether they departed or tarried still, and carrie home to Rome the victorie of the Volscians, rather than their faithlesse peace. The Volscians, when they had assailed that small hope they had in their weapons (for all hope else was cut off) besides all other things that were crosse unto them, encountred in a place of great disadvantage for fight, but worse for flight: and seeing themselves on every side beaten downe and slaine, turned from fighting to intreating, delivered up their captaine, yelded their weapons, were driven under the gallows, and in their single doublet and hose with great shame and calamitie, were let go and sent away. And sitting them downe to rest themselves, not farre from the towne Tusculum, the Tusculanes upon an old grudge and hatred against them, set upon them thus disarmed and naked as they were at unawares, and were so meet with them, that scarcely there remained any one to carrie newes of their ill day and unfortunate overthrow. Then the Romanes appeased the troubles at Ardea: beheaded the cheefe captaines of that commotion, and confiscated their goods to the common chift and chamber of the Ardeates. And so by this great favour and benefite of the people of Rome, they supposed the injurie of the former arbitrement was done away and recompensed. But yet the Senate of Rome, thought somewhat behind still for the cancelling of the memorie of a publicke avarice. The Consull returned, triumphing into the citie, leading Cluilius the captaine of the Volscians before his chariot, with the spoile borne afore him of the enemies, whom he had disarmed, and brought under the yoke. Quintus the Consull againe for his part, in his long robe and gowne of peace, countervailed (a thing not usually seene) the glorie of his Colleague in his bright armour: who had so great regard at home to intertaine concord and peace among the citizens, by ministring justice indifferently, as wel to the highest as the lowest, that the Senatours reputed him a severe Consull, and the Commons accounted him as meeke and gentle a person. And more he wooon at the Tribunes hands by countenance and reputation, than

A than by contention and debate. His five Consulships wherein he carried himselfe after one and the selfesame manner and order: the course of his whole life, ever Consull-like, caused his person to be in a manner more revered than his honourable place. By this meanes, whiles these were Consuls, no words were made of militarie Tribunes. Then created they for Consuls M. Fabius Vibulanus, and Posthumius Ebutius Cornicen. These Consuls, by how much greater & more glorious the acts both at home and abroad, were achieved by those, whom they saw they were to succeed (and surely that yeare was right memorable among the borderers, as well allies as enemies, and namely, because the Ardeates in so hard distresse, were by them succoured) so much the more earnestly endeavoured for their part, to rase out of mens minds the infamie of that judgement aforesaid, and made an Act and decree of the Senate in this forme, THAT FORASMUCH AS THE CITIE OF THE ARDEATES, BY REASON OF CIVILE TROUBLES, WAS DISPEOPLED AND BROUGHT TO A SMALL NUMBEER OF CITIZENS, THERE SHOULD BE ENROLLED CERTAINE INHABITANTS TO BE SENT THITHER FOR A GARISON, AND DEFENCE AGAINST THE VOLSCIANS. This was openly ingrossed in publicke Tables, and Instruments, for a policie, that their secret intent and purpose of reverfing and disannulling the arbitrement, might not be perceived by the Tribunes and the Commons. But they closely plotted, that when they had enrolled a farre greater number of Rutilians than of Romanes, for to inhabite Ardea, neither should any other lands be divided, but those which by that infamous and dishonest award were intercepted: nor that one foot or clot of ground should be assigned to any other Romane, before the whole lands were parted among all the Rutilians. Thus the domain that had been in question, returned againe to the Ardeates. The Triumvirs for the conveying of a Colonie to Ardea, were created these, Agrippa Menenius, T. Cluilius Siculus, and M. Ebutius Helva. Who, besides that, they offended the Commons by their readie service, and nothing popular, in regard, that they assigned and set out to their allies, that land which the people of Rome judged their owne, were not well thought of neither, by the cheefe of the Nobilitie: because in the execution of their charge, they did nothing of affection, and for favour. Howbeit they avoided all troubles and dangers that were toward them (albeit they were accused by the Tribunes before the people.) For when they had registred and placed the Coloners, they remained still themselves in the same Colonie, which they had as witness of their innocencie, and just dealing.

D In this yeare and the yeare following, when Cains Furius Pacilius and Marcus Papyrius Crassus were Consuls, there was peace at home and abroad. The plaies which had been vowed by the Decemvirs, according to the Senats decree, during the time of the Commons insurrection and departure from the Nobles, were this yeare set forth. Petilius sought for some occasion of sedition, but in vaine. Who being made Tribune the second time, albeit he harped still upon one string, and threatned the selfe same things that he had before, yet he could not bring about, that the Consuls should propose unto the Senat, concerning the division of lands among the Commons: and when as with great ado he had obtained thus much, that the Senatours should be moved and their opinions asked, whether they would have an election of Consuls or Tribunes (consular) determined it was at length, that Consuls should be chosen. So, that the menaces of the Tribune, that he would hinder the muster, was a ridiculous matter of game: seeing that when the borders were at quiet, there was no need either of warre or preparation for warre. After this great quietnesse of the state, followeth a yeare (wherein Proculus Geganius Macerinus, and L. Menenius Lanatus were Consuls) for sundrie calamities and perils memorable: namely Seditions, Famine, and hazard of receiving upon their necks the yoke of Kings rule againe, and that, by the sweetnes of a Largeesse. There wanted onely forreine warre: wherewith if the common-wealth had been afflicted too, hardly could the helpe of all the gods above, have recovered the State. These calamities began with hunger. But whether it were, for that the yeare was unseasonable for come, or that they were so droned of the plausible & seditious orations, and of the citie itselfe, that they forelet and neglected the Tillage of their ground, it is uncertaine. For both the one and the other is reported. The Lords of the Senat blamed the idleness of the Commons: and the Tribunes of the Commons laid the weight, one while upon the fraud and naughtinesse, another while upon the negligence & remissenes of the Consuls. At the last, the commoners enforced and drave the people (but not against the will of the Senate) to chuse L. Minutius Master of the provision or principall purveyor of come and victuals: a man who in that office proved more luckie to preserve the libertie of the citie, than happy in the exercise or ministerie of his charge: albeit at the latter end, hee deserved and had, both praise and thanke, for bringing downe the price of corne. VVho, notwithstanding many embassages sent both by sea and land to the neighbor nations round about, and all to lide purpose (but that out of Heiruria ther was brought some little (sprinkling of corne) nothing eased and mended the Market: and therefore he turned againe to the dispensing or dealing the present dearth indifferently among all, by forcing every man to confesse what corne he had, to open his garners, to bring it forth, to vent and sell that, which he had more than would serve a month. But whereinby this practise, and by defrauding servants a portion of their daily foode, and by accusing the come-mungers and exposing them to the furious yre of the people, he had with all his hard courses and sharpe inquisitions rather laid open than eased the present neede and necessitie: many of the common people despairing of all hope, rather than they would live thus miserably tormented, pining and wearing away in hunger, covered their heads, and threw themselves headlong into Tyber. Then Sp. Melius, by calling a knight or gentleman of Rome, a man (as in those daies) exceeding rich, enterprised a thing, commodious I must needs say, but a dishonest precedent of dangerous consequence, and proceeding of a worse mind and intent of his. For having with his own money bought up the corne out of Heiruria by the meanes of his friends and vassals, whose ministerie he used: which thing (I beleve verely) was an hinderance that all the publike care and providence, tooke small effect, and nothing helped the generall want and scarcitie, he devised to bring up a free dole and distribution of corne: and to the end that when he had once by this benefit and liberalitie wooon the hearts of the Commons, then he might, what way soever he went carrying a port and majestie with him above the degree of a privat person, draw after him a traine of the people, promising him by their favour of support, undoubted and assured hope of a Consulship. But him selfe (as mans nature is unsatiable) not content herewith, aspired to higher matters than fortune promised him, and those unlawfull, and beyond his reach. And for as much as even the very Consulship was to be wrested from the Nobles against their wils, he plotted to make himselfe a King, and thought that, the only guerdon due for so deepe reaches and designs, and worthy that great contention and bickenment which he was to abide with much toile and sweate of browes. Now drew the Election on a pace for Consuls, which thing prevented him afore he had brought his devises to full ripenes and perfection. Consul was created L. Quintius Capitolinus the first time, a man most unfit for his turne, that should go about innovations and to change the state: & with him was joined Agrippa Menenius, surnamed Lanatus. And L. Minutius was either made again the master victualer, or els created he was at first without limitation of time, to continue so long as the case should require. For there is no certaintie thereof, but only the name of Corre-malter, recorded both years in the linnen Bookes or Registers among other magistrats. This Minutius was vigilant, and as carefull for the common-weale, as Melius for his privat wealth: and upon occasion that men of the same qualitie, to wit, the Commons, were conversant in both houses, namely in his owne and in the house of Melius, he came to the knowledge by their meanes, of Melius his treason: and declared unto the Senat the whole complot. Namely, That there was armour and weapons good store, carried into the house of Melius: that he kept conventicles there, & made seditious Orations, and that it was past all peradventure that he practised to be King. As for the time of working the feat and to put it into action, as yet it was not determined & certainly known: all other things were already agreed upon. Item that the Tribunes were bribed and hired to sell and betraye the libertie of the citie: That to certaine chieftaines of the multitude divers charges were appointed. And herewithall, he excused himselfe (and said) That because he would not be reputed the authour of any uncertaine or vaine intelligence, he uttered these matters somewhat with the least, and later well nere, than might stand with the common safetie of the Weale publike. Which newes after they were heard, and that on every side the chiefe Senatours had given both the Coss. of the former yeare a check, for that they had suffered those Largesses of corne, and tollerated meetings of the Commons in a privat house: and rebuked the new Consuls also, for that they had staid so long and waited till a matter of so great importance was by the come-master detected and declared unto the Senate, which required a Coss. to be not only the reformer, but also the reformer. Then T. Quintius answered, That the Consuls were blamed without just cause, who being bridled with the lawes of appealing, tending to the great prejudice and disanulling of their soveraigne government, had not commission suffi-

A cient by vertue of their place, to punish the thing according to the hainousnesse and qualitie thereof, as they had courage and heart thereto: and that there was need now, not onely of a valiant and stout man, but also of one that was freed from all bonds of lawes and tied to none. And therefore he would name L. Quintius for Dictator: in whom there was courage answerable to that absolute authoritie. When all men liked well thereof: Quintius himselfe at the first refused: demanding what they ment, to object and expose him, an unweldie man and so fast slept in years, to so great a trouble, and manifest danger. Afterwards, when as they replied on all hands, and alledged how in that heart of his for all his age there was more valor, and in his head more pollicie than in all men besides; heaping on him right due and deserved praises, and commendations; and whilst the Consul also importuned him still and gave not over: then Cincinnatus, after he had praised to the Gods immortal, that his decrepit old age in so fearefull a case, might not turne either to the losse or dishonour of the common-wealth, was by the Consul pronounced Dictator. And he forthwith nominated C. Servilius Hala Generall of the horsemen. The morrow after, when he had set and disposed certaine guards, in divers places of the citie, and was come down into the Common place: the common people wondring at the strangenesse of the matter, had their eyes upon him: and the adherents and complices of Melius, and he himselfe their captaine, saw well that the force and power of this so great a magistrate was bent against them. But they that were not acquainted with those plots and designs, that tended to the setting up of a king, asked one another, what tumult or sodaine war, should require either a Dictators majestie, or that Quintius after fourscore yeares of age, should be the onely Ruler of the citie. With that, Servilius the Generall of the horsemen was by the Dictator sent to Melius: Who said unto him, The Dictator calleth thee. Wherat he being affraid, asked again, What he would? and Servilius said, That he was to make his answer and purgation, of a crime that Minutius had enformed against him, before the Senate. Then Melius began to retire himselfe backe into the rout of his followers, and looking about at the first, shrunke onely away from him, and refused to obey. At the last, the Apparitor at the Generall of the horsemens commandement, began to force him to go with him: but he being rescued by the standers by, found his feet and began to flie, & besought the aid of the communitie of Rome: saying, That the faction of the Nobles conspired his overthrow, and persecuted him for the good he had done unto the Commons, and for his liberalitie bestowed upon them: beseeching them to help him in that extremitie, and not to suffer him to be murdered afore their face and in their very sight. As he spake these words, Hala Servilius overtook him, and killed him outright: and being spreit with his blood thus slaine, and guarded with a crew of tall gentlemen of the Nobilitie, he bringeth word to the Dictator, how Melius being cited to come unto him, put backe the Apparitor, and raised the multitude: and now had suffered due punishments for his deserts. Then (quoth the Dictator) On forth in this valour and vertue of thine, C. Servilius, thou deservest great praise, and hast delivered the common-wealth this daie from Tyrannie. Then as the multitude murmured and made a sturre upon some doubt, what they should thinke of the fact, and what might bee the occasion thereof; he commanded them to assemble together, and openly avowed the deed, and pronounced that Melius was justly slaine: yea, albeit he had been cleere from seeking to be king: for that, being summoned and convented before the Dictator, and that by the Generall of the horsemen, he refused and came not: for my selfe (quoth he) was set judicially to examine and inquire of the cause: & upon the trial therof, Melius should have sped no worse than his cause deserved: but because he went about by violence to withdraw himself from judgement, by violence therefore was he restrained. Neither was he to be proceeded against as a citizen, who being borne in a free state, where justice & law were in force: and in that citie, wherout he was not ignorant that the KK. were sometimes expelled: and where in one & the same year, Collatinus sisters sons, and the sons of C. Collatinus Coss. for the detestation only of the name, being commanded to give up his office, suffered exile: in which citie, many yeares after Sp. Cassius for practising and plotting only to be King, suffered condigne punishment: wherein also of late time, the Decemvirs, for a tyrannicall pride, were deprived of their goods, banished their countie, and bereft of their lives. That in the same citie (I say) Sp. Melius should conceive any hope of reaching to a kingdom? And a man (I pray you) of what qualitie and condition? And yet, no gentilitie of birth, no dignities nor de-ferres were sufficient to make way to any for lordly rule and tyrannie. Howbeit, the Claudij and G. Cassij, by reason of the Consulships and Decemvirships of their own, by reason of the honourable estate and reputation of their ancestors, & the worship and glory of their lineage, tooke upon them, became haucie and proud, and aspired to that, wherunto Sp. Melius had no such meanes to induce him: who might have fit him downe, well enough, and rather wished and praised to God, than hoped once for so much, as a Tribunehip of the Commons. And supposed he, being but a rich corne-mudgin, that with a quart (or measure of corne of two pounds) hee had bought the freedome of his fellow citizens? or thought he by casting morsels of bread and victuals afore the common sort, that the victorious people, conquerours of all nations about them, might be allured into thralldome? & whom the citie could hardly brook to be a Senator, him they should indure their King, to have the regall ensignes and the government of Romulus, the first founder of the citie, descended first from the gods, and to them ascended up againe; why, it was a thing not so wicked as monstrous. Neither was this act sufficiently satisfied for, with the shedding of his blood, unless the house and wals, within which so horrible madnes was conceived and forged, were cast down & rased: and unless these goods, which were tainted & infected with the prices and hire that should have purchased the kingdome, were forsaie and confiscate. He commanded therefore the Questors, to sell those goods, & to bring the mony into the common Treasurie. And then he caused forthwith his dwelling house to be overthrowne and made even with the ground, that the plot or floure thereof, might be a monument of a wicked attempt, smothered and stifled in the very hope and hatching thereof. This is the place which was called afterwards Aequimulium. As for L. Minutius he had an ox with gilded hornes given him for an honour and reward, without the gate Trigemina. The Commons therewith were not miscontented, for that to them he devided Melius his corn, at the price of one Asse a Modius. Among some authors I find, that this Minutius forooke the Nobles and went to the Commons, and was taken in to be the eleventh Tribune of the Commons, and appeased the mutinie that arose upon Melius his death. But it was not like that the Senators suffered the number of the Tribunes to be increased: and especially, that such an example should be given and taken up by a man of their coat: or that the comminallie would not keepe it still, if it had ben once allowed, or at least wile attempt it againe. But above al, this consuteth & reproveth the false title of Tribune set upon his image, for that a few years before, it was by a statute expressly provided, That Tribunes might not chuse and take unto them a colleague in office. Q. Caelius, and Q. Iunius, and Sexius Titinius were the only men of all the collidge of Tribunes, that propounded not the law for the honor of Minutius: but rather accused unto the Commons, both Minutius and Sevilius, and ceased not to make complaint of the cruell and unworthie death of Melius: and in fine prevailed so much, that there should be an Election for Militarie Tribunes rather than for Consuls: nothing doubting, but it shuld be chosen (for so many at that time might be created) some of the Commons also, by promising to revenge the death of Melius, might step in and be elected. The Commons for all they were tossed that yeare with many and sundrie troubles, chose no more than three Tribunes with Consuls authoritie; and among them, L. Quintius the sonne of Cincinnatus: Vpon the hard conceit and hatred of whose Dictatorship past, they thought to picke some occasion of quarrell and tumult: and Mamercus Aemilius, a man of great credit and reputation, was by voices preferred afore Quintius, and obtained the first place. And L. Iulius they created for the third.

Whiles these bare soveraigne rule, Fidene the Colonie of the Romanes, revolted to Lars Tolumnius, the king of the Veintians, and to the State of the Veintians. And besides their revolting, a more horrible fact they committed. For at the commandment of Tolumnius, they slew C. Pulcinus, & C. Iulius, Sp. Nautius, & L. Roscius the Roman Embassadors, who came to demand the cause of this their change and suddaine alteration. Some here doe excuse and elevate the act of the king, saying, that upon a luckie cast of dice he uttered a doubtfull speech, which was by the Fidenatians so taken, as though he seemed to bid the Embassadors to bee killed, and that (forsooth) was the occasion of murdering the Embassadors (a thing incredible, that at the coming in of the Fidenatians, his new allies, who were to consult with him and ask his advice, about a murder that should breake the law of Nations, his mind should not be turned away from earnest studying about his game) and so this hainous fact proveth to be but an error. More credible it is, that he had a further meaning and deeper reach: namely, that the people of the Fidenatians should

A should be bound unto him, and onely relie upon him, being attaint with the guiltinesse of so foule a murder, and not to looke and hope for any mercie or meed at the Romanes hands. The Statues of these Embassadors which were at Fidene murdered, were set up openly at the charges of the citie in the Rostra. A publick crosse (as it were) or pulvis in Rome, out of which the Magistrates made Orations to the people, beautified with the beakheads of ships and their brassen pikes, called Rostra. Thus was there like to be a cruel conflict with the Veintians, & Fidenates. Who besides that they were people confining on their frontiers, had also in the beginning of their war given so wicked & horrible a cause of quarell. Therefore when as the common people and their Tribunes, in regard of the care for the publicke State, were at quiet; there was no question, but that M. Geganius Maccrinus the third time, and L. Sergius Fidenas (named (I suppose) so, upon the war which afterwards under his conduct was fought) should be created Consuls. For this man first encountered with the king of the Veintians on this side Anio, & gat the victory: but not without much bloodshed of the Romanes. So that the greefe was greater for the losse of his owne souldiors, than the joy for the disconsisture of his enemies. And the Senate, as in all fearful times and dangerous occurrents, ordained Mamercus Aemilius to bee created Dictator. Who, out of the brotherhood of Tribunes militarie in Consuls authoritie, the yeare before, named for the Generall of his horsemen, L. Quintius Cincinnatus, who had bene a Tribune with him, a toward young Gentleman, and a worthie sonne of so worthie a father. To those souldiors that were by the Consul mustered and levied, were the old Centurions, experienced and skilfull warriors, adjoined: and the number of those, which in that last battaile were slaine, was supplied. The Dictator commanded to follow him as Lieutenants, Quintius Capitolinus, and M. Fabius Vibulanus. This greater power and authoritie, and the man likewise nothing thereto inferiour, drave the enemies out of the Romane ground, & set them farther off, even beyond Anio. Who removing their campe still backward, seized upon the hils betweene Fidene and Anio: neither durst they come downe from thence into the open plaines, before that the Legions of the Faliscs came to succour. Then at length, the Tuscans encamped themselves under the wals of Fidene. And the Roman Dictator likewise rested and abode upon the bankes of the Confluent (where both rivers runne into one) and flanked himselfe thereby. And when he had cast up a trench & rampier afont, reaching across from the one river to the other, the morrow after he brought his power forth, & set them in order of battaile. The enemies were of sundrie minds. The Faliscians, who hardly could away long souldierie farre from home, and trusting withall in their owne selves, that they were good ynough, required battaile. The Veintians and Fidenates had more hope in drawing out the war on length. Tolumnius, albeit the advice of his owne men liked him better, yet because the Faliscians should not indure lingering warfare, sendeth a trumpet, and proclaimeth battaile against the morrow. The Dictator and the Romanes, for that the enemies for the present, shifted off fight, tooke more heart unto them: and on the next morning, when as now the souldiors gave out brave words, and menaced, That unless they might have battaile, they would assault both the campe and the towne: the armies of both parts came forth into the middest of the plaine, betweene the two camps. The Veintians, as being more in number and having to spare, sent covertly out certaine companies to fetch a compasse behind the hils, who in the time of the conflict should set upon the Romane campe. And in this order stood the maine armie of three nations together embattelled. The Veintians kept the right point, the Faliscians the left, and the Fidenates the middle of the battell. The Dictator in the right point advanced his standard against the Faliscians, and on the left Capitolinus Quintius charged the Veintians: and against the maine battell betweene both, marched the Coronell of the Cavallerie, with his cornets of horse. Thus as they stood arraunged in battaile array, for a prettie while was there silence on either side, and all quiet. For neither would the Tuscans begin first, unless they were urged: and the Dictator looked eftsoones backward toward the Capitoll of Rome, that the Augurs should set up a signall aloft (as it was agreed betweene them) so soone as the flight of fowles gave approbation accordingly: which he no sooner espied, but he put out presently the men of armes, with a great shout against the enemies. The armie of the footmen followed hard after in the taile, and seconded them with a lustie charge. But on no hand were the Tuscane legions able to abide the force of the Romanes. The Cavallerie stood hardest to it, and made head still. For the king himselfe, the best horseman and most valiant of them all, when as on every side his enemies charged & pressed fore upon him, rode afront them, held out and maintained fight. There chanced then to be among among the Romane horsemen, a Tribune or Marshall, one A. Cornelius Cossus, a goodly tall man of bodie, and as valiant and strong withall. Who set before his eyes the noble house from whence he was descended, and carried this mind, as it was right honorable already by his ancestors, left him so to recommend the same to his posteritie more glorious & renowned. This man seeing the troupes of Romans, waving to and fro, for fear of the violence of Tullius, which way soever he bent and turned; and knowing him by his rich and roiall furniture, wherein hee bare himselfe like a brave knight, riding all over the battaile. Is this (quoth hee) the forsworne breaker of humane league, is this hee that hath violated the lawes of armes, and renowned. Now will I presently, if it be Gods will that any thing in the world shall remaine wholly and inviolate, be his priest, I will sacrifice & betake him to the ghosts of our Embassadors deceased. Herewith, setting spurs to his horse, with bent speare in rest, he rode full against that one enemy, singled from the rest; smote him, & dismounted him from his horse. Then bearing upon his staffe, alight presently on foot, & as the king was getting up again, he overthrew him backward with the boss of his target, and laid him streaking along, and after many wounds given him, at length fastened him with his speare to the very ground. And when as he was once dead, he disarmed and despoiled him, and strake off his head; and carrying it aloft on his lance, presented a fearefull spectacle to the enemies of their king slain, and so discomfited them. Thus was the strength of the horsemen defeated also, which onely had made the battaile doubtfull. The Dictator having put likewise the legions of footmen to flight, pursued them still, and drave them to their fort, killing them all the way in the chase. Many of the Fidenates which knew the coasts of the countrie, fled into the mountaines, and escaped. Cossus with his horsemen passed over Tyber, and brought home into the citie a great bootie out of the countrie of the Veientians. As this battaile was in fighting, there was a skirmish also in the Romane campe, with that part of the forces, which (as it is aforesaid) was sent by Tullius to surprize it. Fabius Vibulanus first defended the rampier, ordering his men all withinforth, in compasse like a garland; and while the enemies were wholly bent about the assault, he with the Triarii or souldiours of the rereward, suddenly issued forth at the gate, called Principalis, on the right hand, and gave an hot charge upon them. Upon which they were affrighted, but there ensued the lesse slaughter, because the number was smaller. Howbeit, they fled no lesse in disarray, than those in the very battaile. Thus the Dictator having prosperous successe every where, returned with triumph into the citie, by the decree of the Senate, and graunt of the people. In which triumph the greatest shew and goodliest sight of all, was Cossus, bearing the rich and roiall spoiles of the king, slaine by his owne hand. For of him the souldiours chanted diverse rude ballades without rime and metre, comparing him in their songs with Romulus. Which spoiles, with a solemne manner of dedication, he bestowed and hung up in the temple of Iupiter Feretrius, neare unto those of Romulus, which were the first and only spoiles, untill that time, called Opima Spolia. And as he went, he withdrew from the Dictators chariot, the eyes of all the people unto himselfe, and he in manner alone, carried away the magnificence and glorie of that festival day. The Dictator by order from the people, presented in the Capitoll for the honour of Iupiter, a golden crowne, weighing one pound weight, raised out of the common mony of the citie.

Thus have I set downe (as following all other writers before me) that Aulus Cornelius Cossus, a Colonell or Marshall, brought into the temple of Iupiter Feretrius, the second roiall spoiles. Howbeit, over and besides, that those spoiles onely are by right accounted Opima, or roiall, which a Generall hath taken from a Generall, and we acknowledge none for Generall, but him under whose conduct and high Commission a warre is managed, the very title also written upon the spoiles, doth check and reprove both them and me. The words wherof are these, THAT COSSUS BEING CONSVL, VVAN THOSE SPOILES. When I once heard say, that Augustus Caesar himselfe, the founder or repairer of all temples, entered into the house of Iupiter Feretrius, which hee reedified, being by injurie of long time fallen to decay, and read it so written in a linnen jake or curaze: I thought it little better than sacrilege, to discredite and cancell the testimonie of Cossus himselfe concerning his own spoiles, and of Augustus Caesar, the benefactor of that very temple. Which error, if it grow hereon, That so ancient records and Chronicles, and that the books of the Magistrates, which being of linnen, and laid up in the temple of Moneta, Macer Licinius doth estoones quote and cite as his authors, do represent unto us A. Cornelius Cossus, the seventh yeare after Consull, with Titus Quintius Pennus: let every man abound in his owne sence, and have A have his opinion by himselfe freely. For more than all this may be alledged to prove, that so famous a battaile could not bee transferred to that yeare: because that for three yeares space about the Consulship of Cossus, there was no warre at all, in a manner, by reason of pestilence, and dearth of corne: so as some records, as it were, mourning, and bewraying the calamitie of the time, deliver unto us nothing but the bare names of the Consuls. In the third yeare, after that Cossus was Consull, hee was Militarie Tribune in Consuls authoritie, and in the same yeare Generall of the horsemen also: in which government hee fought another notable battaile with horsemen. But hereof a man may conjecture and guesse what he will. But (as I thinke) wee may toss these things of small importance, to and fro, according to every mans opinion: and when all is done, the author of this battaile his owne selfe, having set up these fresh and new spoiles in a holy place, in the sight of Iupiter himselfe standing thereby, to whom they were vowed, and Romulus also, two witnesses, not to bee despised nor abused with a false title, hath written himselfe, A. CORNELIVS COSSVS CONSVL.

When Marcus Cornelius Maluginensis and Papyrius Crassus were Consuls, the armies were led forth; the one into the Veientians countrie, and the other into the Faliscians, and booties both of people and cattail were from thence driven and caried away. As for the enemies themselves, no where in the countrie were they to be seene, nor any battaile was fought: and yet for all that, the townes were not assaulted, because the people at home died of the pestilence. And within the citie, Sp. Melius Tribune of the Commons sought occasions and pretences to move seditions, but without effect. Who supposing by the popular favor of his name to prevale and raise some mutinie, both arrested Minutius to make his answer, and also put up a bill for the confiscation of the goods of Servilius Hala: laying hard to Minutius his charge, that Melius was falsely accused and circumvented by him: and burdening Servilius with the murdering of a citizen uncondemned. All these surmises were with the people of lesse credit and importance, than the author himselfe. But the violence of the sicknesse still increasing more and more, troubled them: besides the fearefull and strange prodigious tokens: but especially, the fresh newes that divers houses in the countrie were by many earth-quakes cast downe. Whereupon the people went in solemne proceffion and made their supplications, whiles the Duumvir going afore pronounced the prayers, and the people said after him word for word. But the yeare following, when C. Julius the second time, and L. Virginus were Consuls, was more contagious by reason of the plague, and caused both in towne and countrie, so great a feare of utter desolation, that not onely there were none set forth in any rodes without the territorie of Rome to raise booties, whiles the Nobilitie and Commons had no mind of making warre: but the Fidenates also of their owne accord, who before time had kept themselves either within their townes, or mountaines, or fortresses, entered now into the lands about Rome, and forraied all the countrie. After this, having gotten also unto them a power of the Veientians (for the Faliscians could not be induced either by the calamitie of the Romaines, or prayers of their confederats, to take arms againe) these two nations passed over Anio, and not farre from the gate Collina displayed their ensignes. So the feare was no lesse within the citie than in the countrie. Then Julius the Consull bringeth the forces abroad, and placeth them upon the rampier and the wals: whiles Virginus assembled the Senate in the temple of Quirinus, for to aske their opinion. Where agreed it was, to create for Dictator, A. Servilius, surnamed (as some say) Priscus, or as other, Struclius. Virginus making no longer staie than untill he had consulted with his colleague, by his permission declared the Dictator in the night season. And he nominated for his Generall of the Cavalierie, Posthumus Ebutius Helus. The Dictator commaunded every man to be readie without the gate Collina, by the breake of day: and so many as were able to beare armes were in a readinesse. The standers and ensignes were taken forth of the treasure or chamber of the citie & brought to the Dictator. While these things were in doing, the enemies were retired and withdrawne to the higher grounds and places of advantage: and thither marched the Dictator with his armie in order of battell. And encountering with them not farre from Nomentum, he discomfited the legions of the Tuscans, and drave them into the towne of Fidenæ, and cast a trench about it. But neither could the towne be scaled for the high site thereof and the strong wals about it; and to laie sege unto it might not avale: for that they had corne not only to suffice the ordinarie need of men besieged, but also plentie to spare, of their old store and provision gathered afore hand. Thus the Dictator being without all hope both of winning it by assault, and also of forcing cing them to yeeld by composition, purposed in certaine places for the neere nesse to him well knownen, at the backside of the citie which was slenderly guarded, most neglected, and for the naturall situation the furest, to undermine unto the castle. And he himselfe in places farthest off from thence, approached close under the wals, with his armie divided into foure parts, to succed one another by turnes in order: and so, by continuall skimming day and night, he kept the enemies at a bay & withdrew them from all perceiving and intelligence of the worke under ground: untill such time as by digging through the hill from the campe, therewas a way and passage made straight up into the castle. And when as the Tuscanes were wholly amused upon the vaine threatnings, and bravados of their enemies before them, nothing minding the present danger wherein they stood: behold, the al'arme of their enemies even over their heads, made an alerie, that the towne was taken. In this yeare Cn. Furius Pacilius and M. Geganus Macerinus, Censors, appointed and dedicated the Large Hall, named Villa Publica in Mars field: and there first by them was held the Sessing and numbring of the people. I find in Macer Licinius, that in the yeare following, the same Consuls were made againe, namely Iulius the third time and Virginius the second time. But Valerius Antias and Q. Tubero, do name M. Manlius and Q. Sulpitius for the Consuls that yeare. Howbeit in so different a report, both Tubero and Macer professe that they followed the linnen Records: and neither of them both conceale, that which the aun-cient writers have set downe, namely, That the same yeare were Tribunes militarie, in Consuls authoritie. Licinius without doubt is addicted to those linnen Registers, & Tubero is uncertaine of the truth. But among other antiquities, not knowne by reason of long time, this also is left in doubt and not cleared.

After the winning of Fidene, great was the feare in Hetruria: whilst not only the Veientians were feared, fearing the like destruction: but the Falisci also, remembering the warre begon first with them, albeit they were not assitant in their rebellion. When as therefore these two States had sent their embassadours abroad to the twelve Cities about them, and obtained a Diet or generall parliament of all Hetruria should be assembled at the temple of Votumna: the Senat, as if some great troubles were like thereof presently to ensue, thought good that Mamercus Aemilius, should be created Dictator the second time. By whom, A. Posthumius Tubero was named Generall of the horsemen. And with so much greater endeavour made they preparation of armes than in the last warre afore, by how much more danger there was from all Hetruria banded together, than had been from two nations combined & no more. But this busines was much more quieter than all men looked for. When as therefore news came by merchants, that the Veientians were flatly denied helpe, and bidden to end that warre by their own meanes and forces, which they had begon on their owne heads: nor seeke to imbarke them in the affociation of their miserie and adversitie, unto whom they had not imparted their mind and hope in their upright state, and when they were in their ruffe: then the Dictator, to the end he should not seeme to be created in vaine, seeing all matter of acquiring renowne by warre was cut off, desirous yet in time of peace, to doe some notable piece of worke for a monument, setteth in hand to abate and diminish the Censorship: either supposing it to be too high an office, or els offended not so much with the greatnesse of the honour, as with the continuance and length thereof. Having therefore assembled all the people together: For as much as the immortall Gods (quoth he) have undertaken to governe the common-weale abroad, and performed all safe and sure: I for my part concerning that which is to be done at home within the wals, will take order and provide for the freedome of the people of Rome. The greatest preservation and defence whereof, resteth in this, when offices of great command are not long enduring: but when they be limited by tyme of time which may not be restrained or gaged in jurisdiction. As for other magistracies they are from yeare to yeare: but this of the Censors continuing five yeares, is very heavy and grievous. And hard it is for men to live so many yeares, even a great part of their life, in danger of the same tulers still. Minded therefore I am, to propose a law, That the Censorship continue no longer than one yeare and six moneths. With great applause and consent of the people, the next day after, he both published the law and enacted it. And now that ye may (qd. he) & Quirites, know in very deed, how I mislike of these long lasting offices, here presently I render up my Dictatorship. Thus having given over his owne place, for a limitation to the rule of others, and absolutely ended one, with exceeding congratulation and favour of the people he was brought home to his house. The Censors taking it grievously that Mamercus had abridged an office of the people

A ple of Rome, displaced him from his own tribe, laying on him an eightfold taxe in the subsidie booke, disfranchised and disabled him from giving his voice, and made him no better than a Tributarie. Which disgrace (they say) he tooke with a noble stomach, looking rather to the cause of this shamefull note, than to the ignominie it selfe. Moreover the Lords of the Senat, albeit they were willing enough that the Censorship nailes should be pared and their power taken downe, were offended yet, with this example of the rigour and severitie of those in place: for as much as they all saw plainly, that they should be both longer time and oftner under Censors, than Censors themselves. But so great an indignation of the people (by report) grew hereof, that by the authoritie of no man but of Mamercus himselfe, could they be restrained from offering violence to the very persons of the Censors. And the Tribunes of the Commons, with their continuall orations and remonstrances, prohibited the Election of Consuls. When as the matter was well neare brought to the point of an interreigne, they obtained at length with much heave and shove, that there should be militarie Tribunes chosen, with Consular authoritie. But reward of this their victorie whereat they shot, could they get none: namely, that a commoner might be chosen for one. They were all of the Nobilitie that were created, to wit, M. Fabius Vibulanus, M. Folius, and L. Sergius Fidenas.

The plague that yeare was the occasion of quietnesse from all other troubles. A temple then was vowed to Apollo for the health of the people. Howbeit, great losse was there both in towne and countrie, by the mortalitie of men & moraine of cattail, one with another indifferently. And fearing least the husbandmen of the countrie should bee famished, they sent for come into Hetruria and the countie of Pomptinum, to Cumes, and at last even into Sicilie. And not a word all this while about the election of Consuls. So there were militarie Tribunes elected, with Consuls authoritie, all againe of the Patritij, namely, L. Pinarius Mamercus, L. Furius Medullinus, and Sp. Posthumius Albus. That yeare the violence of the sicknesse abated: neither was there any danger or feare of scarcitie of come, because they had made provision aforehand. Great sitting and consultation there was in the generall Diets of the Volscians and Aequians, and in Hetruria at the foresaid Temple of Votumna about making war. There, the matter was put off for one whole yeare: and by an act or decree it was provided, that no assembly or parliament during that time should be held: notwithstanding the people of the Veientians complained, but all in vaine, that the same fortune was like to happen unto Veij, which had fallen already upon Fidene, even the utter subversion of the state. In this meane season, at Rome the chiefe heads of the Commons having aspired and gaped now a long time, but still in vaine, after higher place of dignitie and honor, tooke their vantage whiles all was quiet abroad, and began to have their conventicles and meetings in the houses of the Tribunes, and there entertained secret counsels. Some complained that they were much despised of the common people: for whereas in so many yeares, there were Tribunes militarie created with Consuls authoritie, yet never was there any one of the comminatie advanced to that dignitie. Our forefathers (say they) in great wisdom and deep forecast, have done well to take order, that none of the Nobilitie at any time should have access to any office of the comminatie: for if that were not, the Commons should have had ere this, some of the Patritij for their Tribunes: so odious are we become to those of our owne cote, and are as little set by of the Commons as of the Nobles. Others excused the people, and laied the fault upon the Senators: by whose ambition, by whose craftie fetches and subtilt policies it came to passe, that the Commons were stopped from the high way to advancement and promotion. But if the Commons might have any respite or breathing time, and not be solicited and tempted by their praiers interlaced with threats: they would remember themselves and those of their owne calling, in giving of their voices: and having once gotten assistance unto them, would also winne the highest pitch and soveraigne type of authoritie. For the abolishing therefore of this ambitious seeking and standing for offices, they agree and resolve, that the Tribunes should preferre and publish a lawe, that no man might weare white more than ordinarie, or refresh the bright hew of his upper garment, while he sued for any dignitie. A small matter now a daies and may seeme scarcely worth the debating in serious counsell, which notwithstanding at that time, set both Nobles and Commons in a great heate of contention. Yet obtained the Tribunes so much, that this law passed: and it appeared, that the Commons when their bloud was once up, would affect their owne, and wholly incline to them in their suffrages. But to the end that they might not have their full scope and put it in practise, an Act of the Senat was, that there there should be held an Election of Consuls. The occasion thereof, was a tumult or commotion: which, as the Latines and Hernicks advertised them, arose from the Equians and Volscians. T. Quintius Cincinnatus, the sonne of Lucius (surnamed also Pennus) and C. Julius Mento were elected Consuls. Neither was this fearefull newes of warre entertained any longer. For the enemies having by a sacred law (which amongst them was of greatest force to levie an armie) mustered their power, set forth two mightie armies from both parts, into Algidum, and there met. Where the Equians and Volscians, severally by themselves encamped strongly, and more earnestly studied the captaines to fortifie their camps, and to traine and exercise their souldiours, than at any time afore. Whereupon, the newes was more fearefull that the messengers brought to Rome. So the Senat agreed to create a Dictatour. For, although those nations oftentimes had been vanquished by them, yet now they rebelled in more forcible maner, and with preparation, than at any time before. Also, by reason of the late sickness, the youth and flower of the Romans was fore diminished. But above all, the private discord of the Consuls one with another, and the debate and difference in all their counsels, terrified them most. There bee that write, how these Consuls had but unluckie fortune, and lost a field in Algidum: and that it should be the cause of making a Dictatour. But this one thing is certaine, that howsoever els the Consuls disagreed, yet they jumped in one to crosse the wils of the Senatours, in that they would not nominate a Dictatour, untill such time as, after newes brought, still worse and worse, and yet the Consuls would not bee ruled by the Senatours: one Quintus Servilius Priscus, a man, who right worthily and honourably had borne the highest offices, made this speech: My Maisters, yee that are Tribunes of the Commons (quoth hee) in this exigent and desperate case, the Senat

The speech of Q. Servilius Priscus.

calleth for your assistance, that in so great hazard of the Commonweale, yee by vertue of your authoritie, would force the Consuls peremptorily to make a Dictator. Which speech being once heard, the Tribunes supposing now they had good occasion offered, to stretch and extend their power to the full, departed aside: and in the name of their Colledge or societie, pronounced, That it was their pleasure and will, that the Consuls should be obedient unto the Senat: and in case they proceeded to doe farther, than the consent of that most honourable house would beare them out, they would command them to ward. The Consuls chose rather to bee overruled of them than of the Senat: saying yet withall, that the prerogative of the highest government was by the Senatours betrayed, and the Consulship made thrall and subject to the Tribunes power, if so be the Consuls might be compelled to doe ought by vigour of the Tribunes authoritie, and (than which, a private person could feare no more) bee sent also to ward, or committed to prison. The lot fell to T. Quintius (for in this also they could not agree betwene themselves) to nominate the Dictator: who named A. Posthumius Tubertus, his wives father, a grim sir, and a man of most severe and sterne government. By whom was L. Julius nominated for Generall of the Cavallerie. Herewithall was proclaimed a vacation or lawsteed, and that throughout the whole citie they should goe in hand with nothing but warre. The taking knowledge of such, as pretended to bee freed and exempt from souldierie, was put off untill the war was ended. So that they that were before doubtfull, suffered themselves to be enrolled: and souldiours were levied out from the Hernikes & Latines, who from both places obeyed the Dictator to their uttermost. All these things were dispatched with exceeding expedition. Then the Dictator having left C. Julius the Consull, for the defence of the citie, and L. Julius the Generall of the horsemen for all suddaine occasions incident unto warres, that they might not be to seek for any thing, whereof they had need in the campe, tooke with him Aulus Cornelius the High priest, and saying after him certaine prayers, word for word, he vowed great and stately plaies, in regard of this tumultuous and troublesome warre: and thus departing from the citie, and deviding his whole armie between himselfe and Quintius the Cos, at length he approached the enemies. And like as they had discovered the two camps of their enemies, a little space distant one from another, so they also, about a mile from the enemy, intrenched themselves: the Dictator nere to Tusculum, and the Consull to Lanuvium. So these four armies, and as many fortified camps, had a spacious and large plaine in the middle, sufficient not onely for small excursions to skirmish in, but also to display their armies of both sides. And all the time that they lay encamped one against another, they ceased not to make light skirmishes: for the Dictator was well content, that his men by making proofe, and comparing their strength and puissance with their enemies, and assaying by little and little to trie the event of these bickerments, should conceive aforehand some hope of the

A the entire and generall victorie.

The enemies therefore having no hope left, to speed well in a set field and pight battell, assailed by night the Consuls campe, and put all to the hazard of a doubtfull issue. The suddaine crie and al'arme, awakened not only the Consuls Sentinels, his corps de gard, and so his whole armie, but the Dictator also, out of their sleepe. And where need was of present helpe, there failed not the Consull, either in courage or counsell. Some souldiours ward & defend the gates, others compassed the trench, ranged in a round array. In the other campe of the Dictator, looke how much lesse stirre there was, so much more leasure had they, and studied what was most needfull to bee done. Forthwith aid was sent unto the Consull his campe, under the leading of Sp. Posthumius Albus, a lieutenant. The Dictator himselfe in person, with part of his power, fetching a small compass about, gained a place most apart from all noise and tumult, and from whence he might charge upon the backe of the enemies. And leaveth as Vicegerent in the leaguer Q. Sulpitius: and to M. Fabius a Lieutenant, he committeth the conduct of the horsemen, commanding him not before day to stirre with his horse, as being unrulie and hard to bee managed in tumults and troubles of the night. And all things els, that a provident and industrious captain in such a case might command and doe, that commanded hee, and did orderly. But for one thing above the rest, he shewed singular proofe of policie and courage, and worthie no meane praise: in that hee sent out first M. Geganius with certain chosen squadrons to assaile that campe of the enemies, from whence hee knew by his espials there was departed a greater part of the forces. Who after that hee surprised the enemies there, amused wholly upon the event of other mens danger, careless and secure for their own selves, and therefore neglecting their skouts and guards, wan their hold, in manner before the enemies knew well it was assailed, from whence the Dictator having descried a smoke (which was the signall agreed between them) crieth aloud, that the enemies campe was woon, and commaunded newes thereof to be carried everie way. Now it waxed broad day light, and all was clearly to bee seene: by which time both Fabius with the horsemen, had given the charge, and the Consull also had made a sallie out of the campe, upon the enemies that now already were feared. But the Dictator on the other side, charging upon the reward and the middle battaile, came on everie side with his footmen, and horsemen in traine of victorie against the enemies: who were forced to turne round and fight everie way, according to the dissonant outcries, and suddaine al'armes. Thus being environned round about, they had in the midst died for it everie one, and suffered punishment due for their rebellion, had not Pectius Mestius, one of the Volscians, a man more renowned for his valiant acts, than noble by his parentage, rebuked with a lowd voice his fellowes, being readie now to cast themselves into rings, & said: What will ye here without making your defence, without revenge, offer your selves to be devoured of the enemies sword? What do you with your armor and weapons? Why began yee warre first? Are you troublesome & unrulie in peace, & cowards in war? What hope have yee in standing still? Doe you looke for some god from heaven to protect and deliver you? You must make way by dint of sword. Go to then, and sticke to it like men, and that way whereas yee shall see me goe afore, follow yee after, as many of you as mind to see againe your home, your parents, your wives and children. It is neither wall, nor rampier and trench, but armed men that must withstand armed men. In valour yee are their matches, but in respect of necessitie, (which is the last and strongest engine of all other) ye are the better. When he had these words spoken, and done accordingly, with a fresh shout they followed after, and made head to that quarter whereas Posthumius Albus had placed against them his cohorts: and compelled the victors to lose ground, untill such time as the Dictator came to succour his men, thus distressed and now readie to recule: and so hee bent thither all the force of the whole battaile. In one only man, Mestius, rested all the hope and fortune of the enemies. Many a man was there hurt on both parts, and many a one slain outright, and left dead in the place. So as now the verie Roman Commanders, fought not without bloudshed. Onely Posthumius being smitten with a stone, which had broken and brused his head, went out of the medley: for neither the Dictator, wounded as he was in the shoulder, nor yet Fabius, albeit his thigh was almost nailed to his horse, nor the Consull, for all his arme was quite cut off, once retired or departed out of that dangerous combat. But Mestius amidst the enemies that there lay dead on the earth, with a guard about him of most hardie & tall men, passed through in forcible maner, and escaped clear to the Volscians leaguer, which as yet was not lost: and so the whole battaile enclined thither. The Consull, after he had chased them, scattered in plumpes here and there, even as farre as to the trench, assailed the very campe and the rampier. Thither also bringeth the Dictatour his power on another side. Neither was the assault lesse hote there, than the fight was sharpe afore. It is said moreover, that the Consull threw an ensign within the rampier, to animate the souldiours, that they might more eagerly get up after it: and so by recovering the banner againe, was the first breach and entrance made. Thus the Dictatour having broken through the mure, came to close fight and handstrokes even within the campe. Then began the enemies every where to fling from them their weapons, and to yeeld themselves prisoners. So being themselves and their pavillions taken, they were all sold, but those of Senators calling. Part of the pillage was restored to the Latines and Herniks, namely, to as many as knew their own goods: part therof the Dictatour sold in portsale. And leaving to the Consull the charge of the campe, rode himselfe triumphing into the citie, and gave over his office. Of which his noble and famous Dictatorship, they blemish the memoriall, who write, that A. Posthumius (the Dictatour his sonne, for that upon advantage offered of a fortunate service, he departed without leave from his quarter and guard) was after his victorie achieved, by his fathers commaundement beheaded. But I list not to beleve it. And lawfull it is for me so to doe, among so diverse opinions: and a good prooffe it is on my side, that such imperious and rigorous proceedings were called Imperia Manliana, & not Posthumiana. For like it is, that he who had given the first example of such crueltie, should have gotten afore all others, that noted title of crueltie. Besides, Manlius it was, that was surnamed Imperious. But Posthumius is not marked with any odious note at all.

C. Iulius Consull, in the absence of his Colleague, without any casting of lots, dedicated the temple of Apollo. Quintius having discharged his armie, when hee was returned into the citie, took not that well. But it was no boot to complaine in the Senate house. Moreover in this notable yeare, so full of brave and worthie acts, there is recorded one thing, that was thought in those daies nothing pertinent to the state of Rome, namely, that the Carthaginians (so great & mortall enemies in time to come) passed the seas then first: and (upon the occasion of civile dissention and discord among the Sicilians) with a power landed in Sicilie, for to take part with a side and faction. In the citie of Rome the Tribunes of the Commons laboured, that Militarie Tribunes might be with Consuls authoritie chosen: but it could not be obtained. Consuls were made, L. Papyrius Crassus, and L. Iulius. The Aequians Embassadours suing to the Senate for a league, and for that league, pretending excuses to yeeld themselves, and bee in subjection, obtained a truce onely for eight yeares. The Volsicians after their overthrow in Algidum, fell to continuall debate and contention, whiles some perswaded peace, and others war: so long, untill at length they grew to brawles and mutinies. So on everie side the Romanes were at rest. The Consuls understanding that the Tribunes of the Commons were complotted (for one false brother among them bewraied and detected all) to put up a bill, and make a law, concerning the estimation of fines and penalties (a thing right pleasing and acceptable to the people) they themselves prevented them, and preferred it. Then were Consuls, L. Sergius Fidenas, the second time, and Hostius Lucretius Tricipitinus. In whose yeare nothing was there done worthie of rehearse. After them succeeded Consuls, A. Cornelius Cossus, and Titus Quintius Pennus the second time. The Veientians made rodes into the lands of the Romanes. And a rumour went, that some of the Fidenatian youths were accessarie unto them, and had their hands therein. For which were appointed as Commissioners to make inquisition, L. Sergius, Quintus Servilius, and Mamercus Aemilius. Some of them were confined to Hortia, for that they could make no found excuse, and justifie their absence for certaine daies out of Fidene. So the number of the inhabitants there, was encreased; and their lands, who were slaine in the warres, assigned unto them.

In that yeare hapned an exceeding great drouth. For not onely there wanted raine water from above, but also the very earth lacking her naturall moisture, scarcely sufficed to maintaine the running streame in maine rivers. The scarcitie of water besides about springs that were dried up, and the small rills and brookes caused a great death and mortallitie of cattail for default of drinke: whereof some died of the scab: by contagion whereof the people also were diseased generally. The maladie first began among the rusticall sort, the bond-slaves and hines: and afterwards spread into every corner of the citie. Neither were men onely taff and diseased with this infection: but their mindes also were troubled and possessed with sundrie sorts of superstitious religions, and those for the most part strange and forraigne: whiles upon vaine and foolish prophe-

lies, they brought new rites and ceremonies of sacrificing into mens houses; and made good gaine of such as were given to superstitious devotion, and made conscience of every little thing: untill such time as now it grew to a publike offence, and the chiefe of the citie were ashamed to see in every streete and chappell, strange and unaccustomed purgatorie sacrifices and expiations, for to procure the favour & mercie of the Gods. Whereupon the Aediles had in charge and commission, to looke streightly to this disorder: and that no other gods were worshipped, than those of the Romanes: nor after any other manner than had been usuall in their native countrie. So their anger against the Veientians and desire of revenge, was put off unto the next yeare following, when C. Serrilius Hala, and L. Papyrius Mugilanus were Consuls. And even then they made some scruple to proclaime warre immediatly, or to make out any power against them: but they thought good to send their Heraulds afore, to make claime for their owne and challenge restitution. For whereas of late yeares there had beene a field fought with the Veientians before Nomentum and Fidene: whereupon there followed no peace but onely a truce concluded: both the time was now expired, and also before the daie they had rebelled. Yet were there Heraulds sent unto them. And when they had demanded a mends by a solemne oath and other ceremonies according to the auncient manner, they might have no audience, neither were their words regarded. After this, there arose some question, whether the warre should be proclaimed with the peoples allowance and suffrages, or the Senates decree were alone sufficient. The Tribunes by giving out and threatening that they would stop the musters, obtained in the end, that Quintius the Consull should propound this matter concerning the warre unto the people. And it passed cleare through all the Centuries. Herein also had the comminaltie the better of it, for that they prevailed that there should be no Consuls chosen the yeare following. So there were foure Tribunes militarie created with Consuls authoritie, T. Quintius Pennus immediatly from his Consullship. C. Furius, M. Posthumius, and Cornelius Cossus: of which Cossus had the charge and government of the citie. The other three after they had mustered, tooke a journey to Veij, and made good prooffe how hurtfull in warre is the rule of many Commanders. For whiles every man was inclined to his owne counsaile and advice, and tooke divers courses one from another, they made way for the enemies and gave them advantage. For the Veientians taking their opportunitie and time, entred upon the armie thus diffacted, whiles some commaunded to sound the retreat, others the alarme and to strike up the battaile. Whereupon they were disordered and put to flight. But for as much as the campe was neare at hand, thither they retired themselves in safetie: so, as the shame they gat was more than the harme in this diffeature. The citie was pensive and hereupon sorrowed, as not used to take foiles and overthrowes. The Tribunes they hated, and required a Dictatour: in whom rested ever the whole hope and stay of the citie. And when as even in that behalfe, they made a matter of conscience, because there might not be any Dictatour nominated, but by a Consull, the Augurs were consulted withall: who resolved them of that doubt and rid them of their scruple. So A. Cornelius (a consular Tribune) nominated Mamercus Aemilius Dictatour: by whom he was himselfe also pronounced Graund Master of the horsemen. At such default was the citie then, of right valour and true vertue, that notwithstanding the prejudice by the Censors, yet there was no remedie, but the whole government of the state should rest upon that family, which had been wrongfully disgraced and unworthely noted by the Censors.

The Veientians proud of their late good successe, albeit they sent their Embassadours about all the nations of Hetruria, boasting and vaunting that in one battaile they had discomfited three Romane Generals: yet could not they with all their solliciting, perswade any to be seene to take part with them in publike action: but they procured divers from all parts for hope of spoile, voluntarily to aid and assist them. The people of Fidene onely agreed to rebell. And as though it had been in no wise lawfull, to begin any warre but with some wicked, heinous and execrable fact: like as afore they had embrude their hands, & bathed their swords in the blood of Embassadours, so then, they began with murdering their new received Coloners: & so banded themselves with the Veientians. Then consulted the Princes and States of those two nations, whether they should make Veij or Fidene the seat towne of the warre. Fidene was supposed the fitter and more commodious. So the Veientians passed over the Tyber, and translated the warre to Fidene. Great feare was there at Rome, to see the armie of their enemies removed from Veij, & emplaned at Fidene. And being shrewdly danted by their late overthrow besides, encamped even before fore the gate Collina. On the wals were armed souldiours placed, vacation in all courts of lawe was ordeined, shop windowes thurte up; and all more like a leager than a citie. Then sent the Dictatour the criers about into all streets and carrifoules; to summon the citizens: thus terrified to a generall assembly. Where he rebuked them for carrying such wavering and doubtful hearts upon so small accidents and events of fortune, having received but a slight losse and small foile: and that, not through the manhood of the enemy, or cowardise of the Romanes armie, but onely through the disagreement and difference of the leaders. Also for that they were afraid of the Veientian enemy, whom five or six times afore they had put to the word and vanquished: and especially of Fidene, which had been oftner in a manner won; than assailed: As for the Romanes and their enemies (saith he) they are even the same still that alwaies for so many hundred years, they had been: bearing the same minds, the same bodily strength, and the same armour: and even my selfe am the same Mamercus Aemilius, and no other, who heretofore discomfited at Nomentum, the Veientians and Fidenations, with the Faliscians power also adjoined unto them. And as for A. Cornelius, he will no doubt be the same. Generall of horsemen in this battaile, as in the former warre he was: at what time he being a Knight Marshall, slew L. Tolumnius the King of the Veientians, in the sight of two armies: and brought into the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, the rich armour of him despoiled. Wherefore ye ought to remember this, that we have on our side triumphs, spoiles and victorie: whereas with the enemies remaineth the wicked and detestable fact of killing the Embassadours, against the law of all nations: also the massaker of the Fidenation inhabitants, in time of peace: the breaking of truce, and their revolting now seven times, to their ruine and overthrow. Take weapon therefore in hand like men: for I trust assuredly, that so soone as we shall joine our camps together, and encounter these most wicked enemies, they shall have no long joie of the late shamefull discomfiture of the Romanes armie. And the people of Rome shall understand, how much better they have deserved of the Common-weale, who made me Dictatour now the third time, than those, who for clipping the Centors wings and abridging them of their kingly rule, had dissteined and disgraced my second Dictatourship with the shamefull blot of ignominie and reproch. After this speech, when he had made his vowes accordingly: he encamped a mile and an halfe on this side Fidene, flanked on the right hand with the hills, and on the left with the river Tyber. And commanded Quintus Pennus his lieutenant, to gaine the hills afore, and be possessed secretly of that cape or hill, which was on the backe part of the enemies. Himselfe the next morrow, when as the Tuscanes, (tull of pride and stomack for the prosperous successe of former daies, which was much better than their service in fight) came forth into the field: after he had staied a while, untill the scouters and espials brought word, that Quintus was gotten safely unto the hill top neare adjoyning to the castle or fort of the Fidenations, he advanced forth his standers: and with his footmen ranged in battaile array, marched against his enemies with full pace: commanding his Generall of the horsemen not to charge without his warrant: for that he himselfe as need should: equire, would give the signall for the aide of his cavallerie to come in, willing him then, to quit himselfe like a brave Knight in remembrance of his glorious combat with a King: of his rich present and obligation: and of Romulus and Jupiter Feretrius. Thus the legions assaile one another and encounter right hardily. The Romanes kindled and enflamed with rancour and malice, termed the Fidenations, wicked and godlesse wretches: the Veientians, robbers and thieves; trucebreakers both, polluted with the abominable murder of Embassadours: steined with the execrable massaker of their cohabitants: faithlesse and treacherous allies, cowardly and dastardly enemies: thus both in word and deed they satisfied their hatred to the full. And at the very first shock forced their enemies to thrinke. At which instant all at once, there issued out of the open gates of Fidene a strange armie, nor heard of nor usuall before that day. A mightie number armed with fire-works, and thining all over with burning lights, after a fanaticall and mad manner, ran as if they were carried with spirits, upon their enemies: and with the uncouth sight of this kind of fight, amazed the Romanes a pretie while. Then the Dictatour busie in fight, having sent both for the Generall of the cavallerie with his troupes of horsemen, and also for Quintus from the mountaines, hastened himselfe to the left point: which being terrified with a scarefire more like than a battail, had given place unto the flame, & stepped backe. Where with a loud voice he thus spake: What wil ye be overcome with smoak like a swarm of bees, & leese your ground, & recule from your naked & unarmed enemies: wil ye not put out this fire with redoubled stroke of brandishing swords? And

A And will ye not every man for his part, if we must needs fight with fire, and not with weapons, pull from them their torches and firebrands, and fling them againe at their owne heads? Go to, I say, like hardie men, mindfull of the renoune of Romanes, remembring the prowesse of your fathers, and your owne selves. Turne this fire upon your enemies citie, and consume Fidene into ashes with her own flames: this disloial Fidene, which by no favours and good turns of yours, ye were ever able to win & pacifie. The blood of your Embassadours, the blood of your Coloners thither sent to people their citie, your frontiers and borders by them wasted, put you in mind of no meaner revenge. At the Dictatours commaundement, the whole battaillon was moved and encouraged. Some latched the firebrands as they flew, others by force snatched them from them, so that now both battailes were armed with fire. The Generall of horsemen for his part, renewed the horse service: commanding them to plucke the bitts out of their horses mouths, and was the first himselfe, that setting spurs to, rode with bridle in horse necke, into the midst of the fire: and the other horses also being pricked forward, and eased of their bridles, carried the riders with full carriere against the enemy. The dust rising together with the smoke, took the light from mens eyes, and horses both: And that sight which had terrified the souldiours, nothing at all affrighted the horses. Wherefore the men of armes rode, they bare down all afore them as if some houses had come tumbling upon their heads. Herewith happened a new arme to be heard, which having caused both armies to wonder and listen thereunto, the Dictator crieth out aloud, That Quintus the Lieutenant and his regiment, came upon the back of the enemies: and himselfe reenforcing the shout, advanceth his ensignes forward more fiercely. When as now two armies, and two divers battailes, preased sore upon the Tuscanes, and environned them both before and behind: and that the enemies could neither flie backe to their campe, nor yet retire or withdraw themselves unto the mountaines, from whence a fresh supplie of enemies, made head, and affronted them: and that the horses being unbridled, carried the riders every way, hither and thither: the most part of the Veientians ran scattering in disorder, and highing them apace, toward the Tyber: & the Fidenations that remained, to the citie Fidene. But in that fearfull flight they ran upon their owne death. Some were killed on the bankes of the river, others were driven into the water, and the stream and whirlepits carried them away. And even they that were cunning swimmers, what with wearinesse, and what with faintnesse of their wounds & with fright, sincke and were drowned: so that few of many swam over in safetie. The other armie fled through their campe into the citie. The same way also the Romanes followed forcible after: and Quintus especially, together with them who erewhile came downe from the mountaines, and were the freshest souldiours for fight (as who came last into the battell) & so afterwards eured pell mell among their enemies into the gate, climed upon the wals, and from the wals set up a banner to their fellows, in token that they had woon the towne. Which as soone as the Dictatour espied, (for now by this time had hee made an entrance into the forlome, and abandoned campe of his enemies) he brought the souldiours, upon desire to run to a spoile, and hoping of a greater sacage in the citie, straight unto the gate. And being gotten within the wals, marcheth directly forward to the castle, whereinto he beheld the multitude to flie for refuge and safetie. The execution in the citie was no lesse than in the field: which continued untill they threw away their weapons, and craving nothing but life, yeelded themselves to the Dictator. So both citie and campe was spoiled and sacked. The morrow after, the Dictator disposed of his prisoners thus, He drew them by lot, and gave to every horseman and Centurion one, and to as many as had done more valiantly than other, two apeece: the rest he sold in portsale. And so with triumph brought home to Rome his victorious armie, enriched with a great bootie: and having commaunded the Generall of the horsemen to resigne up his office, himselfe also surrendreth his owne, upon the fixteenth day after his creation, yeelding up his government in peace, which in time of war, and in a searefull state he had received.

There be some that have recorded in their Chronicles, that there was a battaile fought with the Veientians at Fidene by ships upon the water. A thing verily, no lesse impossible than incredible. Considering that even at this day, the river is not broad ynough for such a purpose: and at that time, (as by auncient men we have learned) it was farre narrower than now it is. Vnlesse haply in crossing over the river some vessels or bottomes, that were put out to meet and to receive them, were staied. And so, men making the matter greater (as usually it cometh to passe) have desired a vaine title of a navall victorie at sea. The yeare following, there were militarie Tribunes,

The Tribunes
Orations to the Commons.

with Consuls authoritie, C. Sempronius Atratinus, L. Quintius Cincinnatus, L. Furius Medullinus, and L. Horatius Barbatus. Then was there a truce graunted unto the Veicentians for twentie yeares, and to the Æquians for three yeares, whereas they had made suit for more. Kest there was also from all seditions and broiles in the citie. The yeare following, having neither warre abroad, nor yet sedition at home, was famous yet for the plaies which in time of warre had been vowed: both in regard of the great preparations that the Militarie Tribunes made, as also for the frequent resort and concourse of the Nations adjoining. The Tribunes with Consuls authoritie, were Cl. Crassus, Sp. Nautius Rutilius, T. Sergius Fidenas, and Sextus Iulius Tullus. The sight of these games and pastimes, whereunto those strangers were come by publick consent of their States, was unto them more acceptable, in regard of the courtesie of those friends that gave them intertainment. After these plaies, there ensued seditious Orations of the Tribunes of the Commons, who rebuked the common multitude, for that they being besotted with admiration of those whom they had so hated, kept themselves in perpetual thraldome. And not onely durst not attempt to put forth themselves for to bring in againe the possibilitie to have Consuls of their part, as in times past: nor so much as in the creation of Militarie Tribunes (the Election of whom was indifferent as well for Commons as Nobles) were mindfull or thought either upon themselves or their friends, and those of their owne bodie. And therefore they should surcease to marveile, why no man pleaded for the benefit of the commonaltie. For travail: is well bestowed, and danger well adventured, where profit & honor might be hoped and looked for. And nothing is so difficult but men would employ themselves to enterprise the same, if for the adventuring of great exploits, there might be proposed as great rewards. But, that any Tribune of the Commons should run desperatly and blindly into a world of brangles and troubles, with great hazard of his person, and no hope at all of fruit and profit in the ende: for which contumacious, he might be sure that the Nobles against whom he strived, would persecute him with deadly and irreconcilable malice: and at the Commons hands, for whom he thus contended, he should be honored and advaunced never the more, it was a thing neither to be expected, nor required. The onely meanes to get courage and magnanimitie, is advancement to high place of honor and dignitie. And as for them, they would not disdain the meanest commoner that was, if they themselves might be no more despised. To conclude, the matter were worth the triall in one or two, whither any commoner were sufficient to beare a great office of state; or whether it were a wondrous thing and strange miracle, that a valiant and hardie man should arise out of the commonaltie. With much a doe (say they) we got and obtained, that Tribunes militarie with Consuls authoritie might likewise be chosen out of the commonaltie: and men approved both in warre abroad and in affaires of State at home, had sued therefore. In the first yeares they being nipped by you, and so having the repulse, were had in derision of the Nobilitie: so that at length they forbore to give themselves thus contumeliously to be misused and made fooles. Wee see no cause therefore, why that law also should not be repealed, wherein a dignitie was graunted, and never like to be obtained. For lesse shame would there arise, if the law were not indifferent nor respective unto them, than as unto respect persons and unworthie, thus shamefully to be passed by and take the repulse. These & such like speeches were heard with so good an care and generall applaus, that some of them were incited forward to sue for the Militarie Tribuneship: whiles every one promised in the time of his office to doe great matters and to propose, some one thing some another, for and concerning the benefit of the Commons. Pretending great hopes of deviding the common lands, and planting of colonies abroad, and laying tributes and impositions upon landed persons, for to paie souldiers wages. But the Tribunes militarie then in place, devised to spie out a time, when upon some occasion of the absence of much people departed out of the citie, the Senators by a privie and secret warning, should at a certaine day be called home: and then, whiles the Tribunes of the Commons were away, an Act of Senate should passe in this forme: That for as much as it was noised that the Volsicians were entred into the lands of the Hernicks to forray and rob, the militarie Tribunes should go to see whether it were so or no, and that in the mean while there should be held a generall assenbly for the Election of Consuls. The Tribunes militarie tooke their journey accordingly, and left Appius Claudius the Decemvirs sonne, governour of the citie, a stout young gentleman and a forward, who from his very cradle bare an inward grudge and hatred against the Tribunes and the Commons. And bootlesse it was either for the Tribunes of the

A the Commons to find themselves grieved with those, who made the decree, now that they were absent, nor yet had they cause to quarrell with Appius Claudius, because the thing had been contrived and past afore his time. So, Consuls were created, C. Sempronius Atratinus, and Quintus Fabius Vibulanus.

A forreine matter, but yet worthie to be remembred and here inserted, is reported to have happened that yeare: to wit, that Vulturnum a citie of the Tuscanes, which now is Capua, was by the Samnites taken: and that it came to be named Capua of one Capis their captaine, or (which foundeth more like a truth) of the champion field. But they wan it by this meanes. For upon occasion that the Tuscanes were wearied with former warres, they were admitted into the societie of their citie and territorie. And on a solemne feastivall day, when as the citizens had filled their bellies, and were found asleep, these new Coloners the Samnites, set upon the old inhabitants, and in the night season slew them all.

But now to returne. Things passing thus (as I said before) the Consuls abovenamed upon the *Ides of December, entred their government. By which time not only they which were of purpose sent to learne the newes of the Volsicians, brought word that warre was at hand, but Embassadors also from the Latines and Hernicks, gave intelligence of the same. And namely, that never at any time afore, the Volsicians were more busie and occupied, either in chusing of good captaines, or in levying an armie, giving out these speeches abroad and in every place, That the time was now come, either to forget warfare, and lay away souldierie, and for ever make account to beare the yoke of thraldome; or els not to give one foot, nor come behind those with whom

C they strove for soveraigntie, either in manhood or in painefull travell, or in discipline of warfare. And surely they were no vaine tidings that those messengers reported. But the Senatours would take no such knowledge, nor be greatly moved at the matter. And withall, C. Sempronius, unto whom the charge of that war was allotted, presuming upon fortune, as if she were alwaies tight constant and at commaund, and leading an armie of a people used to victorie, against those that were wont to be overcome, did all things rashly and negligently. So as to speake a truth, there was more Romane discipline in the Volsician host, than in the Romane. And so, fortune (as oftentimes els) went with vertue. At the first encounter, which by Sempronius was unheedfully and unadvisedly begun, before that either the battailions were reinforced & strengthened with fresh supplies of succour, or the horsemen raunged in convenient place, they ran together, and came to

D handstrokes. And the first token which way the victorie would encline, was the manner of shout at the first charge; which by the enemy was more lowd, more shrill and continuall: but by the Romanes dissonant, unequall, dead and cold, often begun, and often renewed: and by their uncertaine and variable noise, they bewailed the inward feare of their hearts. Whereupon the enemies so much the more eagerly charged them, pressing upon them with their shields, and laying at them thicke with their bright swords: on the other side, the Romanes helmets wag, and their crests nod everie way as they looke about them: and as they were to seeke what to doe, so they tremble and run together on heapes: one while the ensignes stand still, and were abandoned of the foremost fighting in the vaward, another while they retired in againe amongst their own squadrons. Yet was not the flight certaine, nor yet the victorie. The Romanes sought more to cover and throwd themselves than to fight: to ward blowes rather than to strike. The Volsicians set forward their ensignes, preased upon the maine battail, and saw more enemies under foot slaine than running away. And now in all places the Romanes reculed, notwithstanding Sempronius the Consull both rebuked and also exhorted them to stick to it: for neither his commandement nor the authoritie and majestie of his countenance availed ought. And immediately had they all turned their backs on their enemies, if Sex. Tempantius a Decurion of horsemen, had

The valor of Sex.
Tempantius.

E not in this desperat case, with a resolute courage and readie advise, helped at a pinch. Who cried with a loud voice, that those horsemen which would the safetie of the common wealth, should dismount off their horses. And when the Cornets of horsemen bestirred themselves at his words, no lesse than if the Consull had given commaundement, Volesse (saith hee) this troupe of men of armes, staie the violence of the enemies, wee see the last of the Romane Empire. Follow therefore in stead of banner displayed, the point of my launce: let both Romanes and Volsicians see, that no nation is comparable to you, either for foote or horse. Whose encouragement being approved and received with a shout, hee advanceth forward, bearing his staffe aloft: and what way soever they goe, they enter and make roome with forcible cible way: and where they see their fellows in greatest distresse, thither they make speed, opposing their targuets afore them. And thus in every place whereas they thrust themselves forcibly, was the fight renewed: and doubtlesse the enemies had turned their backs, if possible it had been, for so few to have performed every thing at once. Now when as the Generall of the Volscians, saw his men not able to withstand them, he gave a signall and charge to give way to this new band of enemies, to wit, these Targattiers: untill such time as they had put themselves so forward, that they might be excluded from their fellows. Which being done, these horsemen were enclosed on every side: neither could they break through that way which they went; because the enemies were there thickest, where they had made their lane before. The Cos, then, with the legions of the Romans, having lost the fight of those that had been a shield of defence and bulwarke erewhile to the whole armie, least that so many hardie men thus invironed, should be overpressed by the enemies; resolved to adventure any perill or hazard whatsoever. The Volscians were likewise diversly occupied & troubled. For on the one side they bare off the Cos, and legions: on the other side they affronted Tempanius fore, & the horsemen: who seeing that after many assaies and offers they could not breake forth to their fellows, gat up unto a certaine little hill, and cast themselves into a ring and stood to their defence, not without doing some mischief to their enemies: neither gave they over fighting untill night. The Consull also maintained the battell so long as he could see, and kept the enemie play. So the night parted them a sunder, and uncertaine it was who had the upper hand. And for that the event was unknown, who sped the better, so great a terror came upon both parts in their camps, that leaving the wounded and a great part of their cariages behinde, both armies as taking themselves loofers, recovered the mountaines that were next unto them. Howbeit the hill or banke aforesaid, continued still beset round about, untill midnight. But when word was brought thither to the Assailants, how that their campe was abandoned: they thinking their fellows vanquished, were also for their part affrighted, & made thilt and fled in the darke as well as they could. Tempanius, fearing an ambushment, kept his men there together untill day light. Then went he downe with a few to discover the coasts: and finding by enquire made of the wounded enemies, that the tents of the Volscians were left and forsaken: he was full glad thereat, and called downe his souldiours from the mount, and entred into the Romane campe. Where seeing all void and forlorne, and finding the same desolation which was amongst the enemies: before that the Volscians upon knowledge of their error should returne again, he tooke with him those hurt souldiours that he could: and not knowing to what quarters the Consull was gone, marcheth forward the next way to the citie of Rome. And thither alreadie the bruit of this unluckie fight, and of abandoning the tents, was arrived. But above all the rest, those horsemen were bewailed, & great mone & lamentation was made for them as well in privat as in publike. The Cos, Fabius, seeing the citie also terrified with this news, kept ward before the gates: by which time, they might discover the horsemen aforesaid a far off: but not without some feare of their parts, doubting who they were. But being soone knowne, they caused fo great contentment after former fear, that in most joyfull maner, the noise went through the citie, how the horsemen were returned safe with victorie. And out of those mourning and sorrowfull houses, which a while afore had bid adieu to their friends and kinsfolke, and bewailed their death, they ran into the streetes and high waies by heapes. The fearefull dames also & wives, forgetting, for joie, all decent and womanly modestie, went out to meete the armie, fell every one with open armes upon their owne husbands and sonnes, tooke them about the necke, clipped and kissed them, and with all their hand and heart received them, yea and for exceeding joy were almost past themselves.

The Tribunes of the Commons, who had challenged & accused M. Posthumius and T. Quintius, for that by their default, there was an unluckie fight before Veij: seemed to have good occasion and opportunitie offered now, by bringing the Consull Sempronius into fresh and new hatred and disgrace, for to reneue the conceived displeasure and malice of the people against them. Having assembled therefore the people together, with open mouth they declared, that the Common-wealth was betrayed first, at Veij by the leaders, and afterwards, because they went cleare away withall, and unpunished, therefore the armie in Volsci was likewise lost by the Consull: and that a troupe of most valiant knights were thus cast away and given to be murdered, and the campe shamefully left and forsaken. Then C. Julius, one of the Tribunes, commanded Tempanius the horseman to be called, and before them all said, I would know of thee

A Sextus Tempanius, whether thou thinke that C. Sempronius the Consull, either began battaile in good time, or strengthened his battailions with good succours and supplies? or whether thou thinkest, when as the Romane legions and footmen were discomfired, of thine owne head and pollicie, causedst the horsemen to alight on foote, and thereby reenforced the fight? Afterwards, when thou and thy men of armes were shut out from our battaile, whether either the Consull himselfe came to rescue, or sent any succour unto thee? Last of all, whether the morrow after, thou haddest any aid or rescue at all? Whether thou and thy troupe of horsemen brake through into the campe by your own hardinesse and valor? And whether ye found in the campe any Consull or armie, or rather the pavilions abandoned, and the souldiours left behind, hurt and wounded? To these premisses and pointes, halt thou to speake this day upon thy verue, and the faith of a souldior: by which onely, in this warre-service, the Commonweale hath stood preserved. Finally, where C. Sempronius, and where our legions be? Whether thou wert forsaken thy selfe, or whether thou forsookest the Consull and the armie? And to conclude, whether we have lost or woon the field? To these demands, Tempanius made (as they say) no fine Oration, but a grave pithie speech like a souldior: not full of selfe-praises, nor shewing any gladnesse for the fault of another, and answered in this wise: How great skill (quoth he) of martiall feats, and what sufficiencie is in C. Sempronius; it is not for me a souldior to judge, nor yet to make any estimate of my Generall: but it was for the people of Rome to determine thereof, at what time as by their suffrages and voices, in a solemne Election, they chose him Consull. And therefore yee are not to enquire of me, and to be informed, either of the pollicies of a General captain, or vertues and duties of a Consull: deepe points to be examined, weighed, and discoursed by great wits, reaching heads, and high mindes. But for that which I with mine eie sawe, I am able to make report and testifie: namely, That before himselfe was excluded out of the battaile, I beheld the Consull fighting manfully in the vaward, encouraging his men earnestly, and even amongst the Romane standards, and pikes of the enemies, busily employed. After which I was carried from the sight of my fellows: howbeit by the stirre, noise and shouting, I well perceived, that the conflict continued until night. Neither was it possible (as I thought) for them to breake through unto the hill which I kept, by reason of the multitude of enemies betwene. As for the armie, what is become of it, I know not: But I suppose, that as I my selfe in an extremitie and fearefull case, defended myselfe and my men, by advantage of the ground: so the Consull for to save the armie, tooke some more safer place to encampe in. Neither thinke I verely, that the Volscians stood in better termes than the Romanes fortune was. And the darknes of the night (no doubt) caused error and confusion on every side, and in all places. After which speech when as he besought them, not to hold him any longer, wearied with travaile, and faint of his woundes: he was with exceeding praise both of his valiant service and also of his modest speech, licenced to depart.

Whiles these thinges thus passed, the Consull by that time, had marched by the way of Laticum as farre as to the Temple of Quies: thither were waines, draught-beasts and sumpter horses sent from the citie, to receive and ease the armie, toiled out with fight, and tired by journeying all night. Within a while after, the Cos, entred into the citie: who endeavoured not more, to put the fault from himselfe, than to extoll Tempanius, and give him his due deserved praises. Now whiles the citie was sad and heavey for this hard hap, and angrie also with the captaines: behold, M. Posthumius, who before had been accused, was now presented unto the people, for to wreke their choler & malice upon. He had been a Tribune Militarie in place of a Cos, at Veij, and now was condemned, and a fine set on his head of ten thousand Asles of brasse. But as for Titus Quintius, his fellow in government, because that among the Volscians he had served fortunately as Consull, under the conduct of Posthumius Tiberius the Dictator: and likewise at Fidene, as Lieutenant of the other Dictator Mamercus Aemilius, and laid the whole fault of that other time from himselfe, upon his colleague before condemned: he was found unguiltie & acquitted by all the Tribes. It is said that the fresh remembrance of his father Cincinnatus, late a right worshipfull citizen, helped him much: Yea and Capitolinus Quintius a very aged man, did him no hurt, who humbly besought them that they would not suffer him, having but a while in this world to live, for to be the carrier of so heavey newes unto Cincinnatus. The Commons made Tribunes of the comminalltie, Sex. Tempanius, A. Silius, Sex. Antistius, & Sex. Pomptius in their absence: whom also the horsemen had chosen for their captains or Centurians, in the former exploit, plot, by the advise and counsell of Tempanius. But the Senatours, because now for hatred of Sempronius, the name of Consuls misliked and offended them, determined that military Tribunes with Consuls authoritie, should be created. So there were chosen L. Manlius Capitolinus, Q. Antonius Merenda, L. Papyrius Mugillanus.

In the very beginning of the yeare L. Hortensius the fift Tribune of the comminalltie, accused C. Sempronius the Consul of the former yeare. And when as his other foure fellows in office, in the sight of the people of Rome besought him, not to trouble their guildes captaine, in whom nothing could be blamed or found fault withall, but aduerse fortune: Hortensius could hardly abide, but thought it was but to prove and trie his resolute constancie: and that the partie accused, trusted not upon the praier and intercession of the Tribunes, which only for a shew was pretended, but upon their support & assistance. And therefore turning one while to Sempr. himselfe, he demanded what was become of that haucie courage and stomack, so ordinarie in those of Senatours calling? and where was that magnanimitie which rested and relied upon innocence? since that he having been a Consul, was faine to shelter and shrowd himselfe under the shadow and protection of the Tribunes? Another while directing his speech to his fellow Tribunes: but you my Masters (quod he) what will ye do? if I prosecute mine action against him still, and convict him in the end; Will ye take from the people their right, and overthrow the authoritie of the Tribunes among the Commons? When they again said and inferred, that the people of Rome had absolute power to doe what they would, both with Sempronius, and all others: and that they neither would nor could abridge the people of their judgment. But if (say they) our praier in the behalfe of our Generall, who was to us in steed of a father, may not avails, then will we together with him change our weede for companie. Nay God forbid (quoth Hortensius) The Commons of Rome shall never see their Tribunes arraied in soiled & mournfull apparell. And as for C. Sempronius, I have now no more to say to him, since that he hath carried himselfe so, whiles he was generall, as that he hath gained thus much, as to be so dearly beloved of his souldiors. Neither was the kindnesse of those foure Tribunes more acceptable to the Commons and Nobles, than the good nature of Hortensius, who at their reasonable request, was so easie to be pacified and intreated.

It was no long time that fortune fawned upon the Aequians: who embraced the doubtfull victorie of the Volscians, and tooke it as their owne. The next yeare after, when Cn. Fabius Vibulanus, and T. Quinctius Capitolinus, the sonne of Capitolinus, were Consuls: by the leading of Fabius, unto whom was allotted that province, nothing was done there worthe of remembrance. For when as the Aequians had made semblance of a battell, & brought their armie only in sight, they were in fearfull wise soon discomfited, and shamefully fled, ministring no matter of great honor to the Cos. And therefore was he denied triumph. But yet because the ignominie of the losse which happened by Sempronius, was partly allaid, it was granted that he might enter Ouant into the cittie. [A Generall was said to enter Ouant into the cittie, when ordinarily without his armie following him, he went on foot, or rode on horsebacke only, and the people in their Acclamations for joy, redoubled Ohe, or Oho. So that Ovatio is as much as Ohatio: Howsoever, some thinke that Ovatio took the name of sacrificing a sheepe. But he rode in triumph, when his souldiors attended him in his chariot, crying Io Triumphe. In this he caried a branch, or wore a garland of lawrell, in the other of Myrtle. So that the Ovation was a lesse honour than the Triumph. And it was granted to inferior persons, & for meaner desert. Whereas, none usually might triumph, unlesse he were Dictator, Cos. or Pretor, & had slain in field 5000 enemies at the least, won much spoile and pillage, & augmented the State of the Roman Empire.] Like as the war was dispatched with lesse ado than they feared: so in the cittie, after a calme & peaceable state, there arose between the Com. and Nobles, a world of discords & troubles more than they expected. Which began upon occasion of doubling the number of Questors. For when the Consuls had propounded, that besides two Questors or Treasurers of the cittie, there should bee other twaine readie to attend upon the Consuls, for all services and charges belonging to warre: and when the Nobles also with all their power had approved it, the Tribunes of the Commons entred into a contention with the Consuls, and required that some of the Questors (for untill that time they had been created from out of the degree of the Patrij onely) might be likewise of the Commons. Against which demand, at the first, both Consuls, and also the Nobles, laboured with might and maine. But afterwards having graunted thus much, That as the use and practise was in creating of Tribunes,

- A bunes with Consuls authoritie, so in like manner, in the Election of Questors, the people should have their free libertie to chuse. And seeing they gained little thereby, and could effect no good, they wholly let fall their former matter, about increasing the number of the Questors: But although it were thus by them given over, the Tribunes tooke it in hand againe, and set it on foot: yea, and other seditious actions besides estoones sprang forth, and among the rest, those also should be Consuls rather than Consular Tribunes created; and by reason of the Tribunes stepping betwene with their negative voice, no decree of the Senate could passe, the government of the Commonweale was devolved from Consuls to an Interregne; but not without exceeding great debate: for that the Tribunes kept the Patrij from meeting and packing to ether.
- B Now when as the greater part of the yeare following was spent, with much strife and contention betwene the new Tribunes and certaine Interregents, whiles one while the Tribunes staid the Nobles from assembling together about the chusing of an Interregent, and another while crossed the Interregent for granting out any Act of Senate or warrant, for the election of Consuls: at the last, L. Papyrius Mugillanus, being declared Interregent, sometimes rebuked the Nobles, and sometimes blamed the Commons, and said: That the Commonwealth neglected and forsake of all men, was taken into protection of the gods, and guided by their care and providence: standing upright and safe only, upon the truce observed by the Veientians, and the slow speed or small hast that the Aequians made to warre. From whence, if any trouble should happen to arise, it is your will (quoth he) and pleasure belike, that the state should bee surprisid and assailed.
- C whiles it is without any Magistrate of the Nobilitie. For neither is there an armie readie, nor yet a captaine to raise an armie. What? thinke ye to put backe forraigne war abroad by civile discord at home? Which if they both should come together, there were no other remedie, though all the gods in heaven should set to their helping hand, but that the Commonweale of Rome should utterly be subverted. Yet rather remit every one of you somewhat, of the rigor of your full jurisdiction, and (for the love of God) take some indifferent course to joine in unitie: the Nobles for their part, by suffering Militarie Tribunes to be created in lieu of Cos. the Tribunes again, by no more thwarting and interposing their negative, but that four Questors may be chosen by the free voices of the people, from out of the Commons & Nobles, one with another. First therefore was the High court held for choosing soveraigne Tribunes: and Tribunes there were created in
- D Consular authoritie, all of the Nobilitie, namely, L. Quintius Cincinnatus the third time, Sex. Furius Medullinus the second time, M. Manlius, and A. Sempronius Atratinus. When this Tribune last named, was president of the Election for Questors, and the son of Antistius a Tribune of the Commons, and a brother besides to another Tribune, one Sex. Pompilius stood for the dignitie, among certaine other of the Commoners: neither all their owne meanes that they could make, nor all the voices they could procure, were able to prevail, but that the people preferred persons to the place, according to their gentrie and high birth: namely, whose fathers and grandfathers they had seene Consuls. All the Tribunes of the Commons stormed and chafed at this, but especially Pompilius and Antistius, being set on fire at the repulse of these their friends. What should this meane (say they) that none of the Commons, neither in regard of their owne merites, nor considering the injuries at the Nobles hands, ne yet for desire they might pretend to the first hanfell of that authoritie, which now was lawfull, and never heretofore: that none of the Commons (I say) was created, if not a Militarie Tribune, yet not so much as a Questour? What? that neither the fathers praier in the behalfe of his sonne, nor a brothers suit in favour of a brother, being Tribunes both of them, invested in that sacred authoritie, and which first was erected for the maintenance of common freedome, could ought at all prevail? Surely there is some fraud and juggling in the matter: and A. Sempronius, hath in the Election used more art and cunning than truth and fidelitie. Complaining that by his injurious and indirect dealing, their friends had taken the foile. When as therefore they might not by any violence touch his owne person and attach him, being fenced with innocence in this Action, and secured by vertue of the office which then hee bare: they wreaked their selves and discharged their choler upon C. Sempronius, the cousin germaine of Atratinus by the brother: and with the helpe of M. Canuleius, one of their colleagues, arrested him for the ignominious service in the Volscian war. Estoones also the same Tribunes made some words & motion in the Senat house, concerning the division of lands, and revived the law Agraria (which C. Sempronius at all times most sharply sharply and eagerly had withstood. Supposing, as it fell out in deede, that the accused person should either by giving over the cause, be lesse esteemed of the Nobles: or if he stood to it still untill the time of judgment drew neare, he should displease and offend the Commons. But he chose rather to be the object of the displeasure and malice of the people, that were opposed and bent against him, and so to wound his owne privat estate: than to betray the common and publicke cause: and persilled resolute in the same minde still, that there should no bribing donative be granted, that might winne and procure favour unto those three corrupt Tribunes. For it is not land and living (quoth he) that they shoot at, for the benefit of the Commons; that is not their seeking: but their drift is to worke and procure displeasure unto me: and therefore I will for my part, abide that storme and tempest with a resolute mind. And the Senat ought not to esteeme either of me, or of any cittizen els so highly, as to buy the sparing of one man so deare, even with the harme and dammage of the whole state. The day of iudiciall triall came. When as he had pleaded for himselfe, and seemed nothing daunted at the matter: yet, for all that ever the Nobles could doe, who tried all meanes, but in vaine, to mitigate and delay the heat of the Commons, condemned he was in *fifteene thousand Assees. The same yeare Posthumia a Vestall Nun, was called in question for incontinencie and incest, and came to her answer. A Virgin guiltlesse for any deede done: but scarcely of good name and fame: by reason that she was suspected for her apparell and going more light & garish in her attire: yea, and for her wit, more conceited & pleasant, than became a maiden, and nothing respective of the speech of the world. Her triall was put over to a farther day, and she (after she had twice pleaded) in the ende was acquit: onely the high priest by the advice, and in the name of the whole colledge: schooled her, and gave her warning to leave her sports, taunts, and merry conceits: and in her raiment to be seene not so deist as devout, and weare her garments rather saintly than fightly. The same yeare was Cumæ, a cittie inhabited at that time by the Greekes, taken by the Campanians.

The yeare following had militarie Tribunes with Consuls authoritie, Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, P. Lucretius Tricipitinus, Sp. Nautius Servilius. A yeare, by the happinesse and good fortune of the people of Rome, more notable for a danger escaped, than for any harme received. Certaine bond-servants had conspired to fire the cittie in divers places farre asunder: for this intent, when the people should be busily occupied, here and there, to save their houses, then by force and armes to surpris the Castle and Capitoll. But Jupiter turned away and disappointed their wicked designs. For by the preaching and information of twaine, the rest of the malefactors were taken and executed. But those that disclosed and revealed the conspiracie, had ten thousand pound in brasse mony (which was in those daies thought to be a great riches) weighed them out of the Cittie chamber, and freedome besides, for their reward.

After this, began the Æquians to tenue warre: and word was brought to Rome by credible persons, that certaine new enemies also, to wit, the Lavicans, joyned together in counsell with the olde. These Æquians, were good neighbours: for once a yeare ordinarily, they used to put the cittie of Rome to the paines of warring with them, and not misse. Embassadors then were sent to Lavicos, who brought doubtfull answeres from thence: whereby it appeared that neither at that instant they were readie to warre, nor yet were like to continue long in peace. The Tuscullanes were charged, to take good heede, and have an eie that way, that no new sturs and troubles should arise at Lavicos. There came Embassadors from Tuscullum, to L. Sergius Fidenas, M. Papyrius Mugillanus, and C. Servilius, the sonne of Q. Servilius Priscus: (by whom being Dictatour, Fidene was won) who were Militarie Tribunes in Consuls authoritie the yeare following. These Embassadors brought news that the Lavicans were out, and in armes, and joyning with the Æquians armie, had forraied the countrie of Tuscullum, and encamped themselves in Algidum. Then was warre proclaimed against the Lavicans. And when by a decree made by the Senat, that two of the Consular Tribunes should go to warre, and one manage the affaires of Rome: there arose a contention on a fundaine, among the said Tribunes. Every one thought himselfe the meekest and most sufficient man, to be generall of the warre, refusing the charge of the cittie, as a base, dishonourable, and thanklesse office. As the Senatours mused and wondered, to see amongst those that were fellows in government, so undecent a strife and contention; then Q. Servilius: Seeing that (quoth he) there is no reverent regard, either of this honourable house, or of the common-wealth: the father his countenance and dread majestie, shall end this debate. My sonne without any lot casting, shall governe the cittie as President. God grant, that they

the Lavicans

A they which love warre so well, may manage it with more discretion and concord than they will it. As for a generall multer to bee levied out of all the people indifferently, that was not liked of. So ten Tribes were drawn by lot, out of which, the yonger sort were pist forth to war under the conduct of the two Tribunes. The strife which began to be kindled among them in the cittie, through the same desire still of soveraigntie, brake forth and grew much hotter in the campe. In nothing agreed they, striving whose opinion should stand: each one would have his owne way: his owne commandements obeyed and none els: one despised another, and were despised one of the other: untill at length, upon the Lieutenants reproofe, they grew to this point, and this order was taken: That they should each other day, rule one alone by himselfe absolutely. Which newes being brought to Rome, it is reported that Q. Servilius, a man for his yeares and long experience right skilfull, praied of the immortall gods, that by the variance and discord of the Tribunes, the common-wealth sustained not more harme, than they had received at Veios. And as if there were no doubt, but that some great losse and overthrowe was readie to happen, he was instant upon his sonne, to levie souldiours, and to provide munition for warre. Neither proved he a false and vaine prophet. For by the leading of L. Sergius, whose day it was to rule, when as the enemy under a colour of feare, withdrew unto the trench, and to trained them thither upon a foolish hope to win the campe, even under the very campe of the enemies in an uneven ground of disadvantage, they were sodainly charged by the Æquians, discomfited and chased downe the valley: and many in their fall, which was greater than the flight, were trod under foote and slaine, and with much adoo that day kept they their owne tents. The morrow after, when as now the enemies had beset a great part of the camp, they shamefully fled away, at the backe gate, and forooke the campe. The Captaines, Lieutenants, and the strength remaining of the armie, which kept to their ensignes and colours, went to Tuscullum. Other that were scattered here and there about the fields by sundry waies, made hast to Rome, and reported there the overthrow to be greater than indeed it was. Lesse was the trouble and sorrow, because men looked for better issue and successe: and also for that, there was helpe and succour (which they were to have an eie unto in so fearefull a case) provided by the Tribune aforehand. At whose commandement, when as the tumult was by the inferiour magistrates appeased in the cittie, espials were sent out in hast: who brought word that the captaines and the armie was at Tuscullum: and that the enemy had not removed his campe. And then (which encouraged them most of all) by the Senats decree, Q. Servilius Priscus was chosen Dictatour, a man whose providence over the common-weale, the cittie as manie other times afore, so in the event of that war had experience of: for that he only suspected the contention of the Tribunes afore this unhappy foile. Who having nominated Generall of the horsemen, his son (as some say) by whom being militarie Tribune, himselfe was declared Dictatour (for others there be that write howe Servilius Hala was that yeare Generall of the horse) went forth with a fresh armie to war, and having joyned unto him those which were at Tuscullum, he pitched his tents, two miles from the enemy. But see the fruit of good successe. The pride and negligence which had been amongst the Romane Captaines, went from them to the Æquians. Therefore in the first beginning of the conflict, when the Dictatour with his horsemen whom he sent against them, had disordered and put out of array the foremost rankes of the enemies, then commanded he the ensignes of the legionario footmen with all speed to follow hard upon: and one ensigne-bearer of his owne, who made some stay, he slew with his owne hand. Then were they so earnestly set to give an hoat charge, that the Æquians could not abide their force: and being in fight overthrowen, when as they fled all amaine to the campe, the assault thereof was both shorter and with lesse adoe, than was the battaile. When the campe was taken and spoiled, and that the Dictatour had given the pillage unto the souldiours: and that the horsemen, which chased the enemies from the campe, had brought word backe, that all the Lavicans were overthrowen, and a great part of the Æquians were fled to Lavicos: the day following was the armie also led thither, and the towne compassed and beset round about, skaled, and sacked. The Dictatour having brought home to Rome his victorious armie, upon the eight day after he was chosen, gave over his office. And in very good time, before there was any sedition stirred up about the law Agraria, by the motion of the Tribunes of the Commons, for the division of the Lavicanes lands: the whole bodie of the Senat appointed that a Colonie should be sent to Lavicos. So there were sent from the cittie a thousand and five hundred to inhabite there, and two akers a peece given them of land.

After

After the winning of Lavicos, there were created Militarie Tribunes with Consuls authoritie, to wit, Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, and L. Servilius Structus, with P. Lucetius Tricpitinus (all three the second time) and Sp. Velurius Crassus: and the yeare following A. Sempronius Atratinus, the third time, and these twaine, M. Papyrius Mugillanus, and Sp. Nautius Rutilius the second time: for these two yeares there was peace abroad, but discord at home about the lawes Agraria. They that troubled the people, were Sp. Mucilius, who now the fourth time, and Metilius, who the third time were made Tribunes of the Commons, both absent. And when they had published their Act, That all lands conquered from the enemies, should be divided by the poll: by which Ordinance, the possessions of a great part of the Nobilitie became confiscate, (for since their cittie was situate and built in a straunge ground, there was in a manner no land lay to it, which had not been purchased by the sword, neither enjoied the Commons any, but that which either had been sold or assigned to the Commons) this seemed to bee a bone cast betwene the Nobles and the Commons, to set them together at strife and contention. Neither knew the Militarie Tribunes any way to take counsell in this case, albeit one while they assembled the Senate, and another while met in private conference with the Nobilitie. Then Appius Claudius, (the nephew or grandsonne of notorious Appius the Decemvir, created for the making of lawes) the punie of all the counsell of the Nobilitie, made (as it is reported) this speech, and said, That hee would impart unto them that which he had received by tradition from his auncestours, to wit, an old devile, and appropriate to his house, for that his great grandfire App. Claudius, had shewed unto the Nobles the onely way, to abate and take down the Tribunes power, namely, by the coming betwene and negative voice of their fellowes. For men new come up, and risen to promotion, might soone by the authoritie of the cheefe rulers be brought from their purpose, & made to change their mind, if otherwhiles those great men in place would use some speech unto them fitted and framed rather to the time and present occasion, than respective to their owne high place and dignitie: for evermore the heart and courage of such, is according to their degree and wealth. And when they see once their fellowes possessed first afore them of the cause, and thereby crept wholly into all the favour with the Commons, and that no roome is left for themselves to have any part thereof, they will bee willing enough to encline and condescend unto the Senate, and take their part: by meanes whereof, they might wind into the love and good grace of that universall state, and particularly with the principal lords of the Nobilitie. Which speech, when they all had approved, and especially Q. Servilius Priscus, who praised the young Gentleman, for that he was not grown out of kind, nor degenerate from the flock and rafe of the Claudij, then every man was set about this businesse, to see whome of the Colledge or companie of Tribunes, they could win and draw to crosse and stop the Act for going forward. The Senate now being broken up, the cheefe of the Nobles caught hold of the Tribunes, and were in hand with them, perswading, exhorting, and assuring them, that they should every one in private gratitie not onely, but also the whole bodie of the Senate in generall: and never gave over, until they had procured sixe of them to interpose their negative, and to crosse the law. The morrow after, when as of purpose a matter was propounded afore the Senat, about the sedition which Mucilius & Metilius had raised, by a Largeesse of dangerous consequence; such speeches were by the principall of the Nobles delivered, that each one for himselfe confessed, that now they were to seeke for counsell, and saw no other helpe nor remedie but in the authoritie of the Tribunes: to the protection and safeguard of which Magistracie, the Commonweale betooke herselfe, and fled for succour, as being beset with daunger, like some poore private person, and had no other means to save her selfe: saying, That it would be both for themselves, and also for their authoritie, an honorable thing, if it might appeare, that the puissance of their Tribuneship were not more imploied in molesting the Senate, and making discord among the States, than in resisting the peevish wilfulness of their colleagues. Whereupon arose a great noise through the whole companie of the Senatours, whiles out of all parts of the Court there assembled, they called upon the Tribunes for their helping hand. Then after silence made, they (who for the favour of the Lords of the Senat, were made aforehand to their cause) declared and confessed, that they were readie to crosse that act, by their fellowes published, seeing the Senate judged it to be prejudiciall to the Commonwealt. These Tribunes for the offer of their good service, were by the Senate highly thanked. But the authours and patrones of the Act aforesaid, calling together an assemblee of the Commons, when they had inveighed against their fellows most sharply, rearming them betraitors

A traitors of the Commons wealth, and slaves to the Nobles: and using other bitter speeches, gave over their action and suit.

Two greivous warres had continued all the yeare next following (wherein P. Cornelius Cossus, C. Valerius Potitus, Quintus Cincinnatus, and M. Fabius Vibulanus, were militarie Tribunes in Coss. authoritie) but that the Veientian war was deferred by the superstitious feare of their owne princes, whose grounds, Tybris (overflowing the banks) had spoiled, & overthrown also the villages & houses that stood therupon. The Aequians likewise by reason of their losse received three yeares before, made no great hast to aid and assist the Volanes, a people of their own nation. For they had made certaine rodes into the Lavicanes countrie, confining upon them, and warred upon the inhabitants, lately there planted. Which trespass by them done, they hoped to have been able to maintaine, by the banding and assistance of all the Aequians: but being forsaken of their allies, they lost both their towne and territorie, onely by siege, and one light skirmish, and never fought for it any memorable war. L. Sextius also Tribune of the Commons, assaied to make an Act, that there might be sent to Volæ as well as to Lavicos, Coloners to people it: but by the negative of his confreeres, who shewed, that they would not suffer any Statute of the Commons to passe without the assent of the Senate, it came to nothing.

In the yeare following, the Aequians having recovered and woon againe Volæ, and brought a Colonie thither, fortified the towne with a fresh power, at what time were Tribunes Militarie in Consuls authoritie at Rome, Cn. Cornelius Cossus, L. Valerius Potitus, & M. Fabius Vibulanus the second time, and M. Posthumius Regillensis. The warre against the Aequians, was committed to this Posthumius, a man of a crooked disposition, as his victorie shewed more than the whole course of the warre. For having levied an annie in hast, and brought it before Volæ, after some small skirmishes, hee tamed the Aequians, and at length entred the towne. And when he had done with the enemies, hee began to quarrell with his owne souldiours: for whereas during the time of the assault, he had given out by proclamation, That they should have the saccage after the town was once woon: he brake promise with them. For I am induced to beleieve that this was the cause rather why the annie mutined and was discontented, than for that in a towne lately sacked before and in a new Colonie, there was found lesse spoile than the Tribune made boast of. But this displeasure and anger once conceived, was made the worse, after that he returned into the cite: for being sent for by his fellowes, upon occasion of the Tribunitian seditions, there escaped him an indiscreet speech, I must needs say, yea, and without all fence, wit, and honestie. Which he let fall in an assemblee of the Commons: wherein it happened, that as Sextius, a Tribune of the Commons, was preferring the law Agraria, & saying withall, That he would propose an Act, that Coloners should likewise bee sent to Volæ, for that they were worthie to have both the towne and lands of Volæ, who had by sword and speare conquered the same. Posthumius caught the word out of his mouth: And that shall my souldiours deere abie (quoth hee) unlesse they bee more quiet. Which word being overheard, offended not so the Com. presently there in place assembled, as the Lords of the Senat a while after. Moreover, the Tribune aforesaid, an active man, and eloquent withall, having among his adversaries met with a prowd humourous spirit, and an insolent and intemperate tongue, which walked so freely and so long by his provocation, that hee uttered these speeches, which bred not onely ill will and displeasure to himselfe, but also wounded the cause, and the whole state of the Patriij. This Sextius (I say) was busie, and quarrelling with none of all the Militarie Tribunes, more than with Posthumius. And even at that time, taking advantage of the same cruell and unhumane speech of his: Here yee not, o yee Commons (quoth he) how hee threateneth mischeefe unto his souldiours, as unto bondslaves? And yet this beast yee will thinke more worthie of so great dignitie wherein yee have placed him, than those that induce you with house and land, that send you abroad to inhabite Colonies, that provide habitation for you against old age, that tendering your wealth, take part and defend you against so cruell and prowd adversaries. Begin now henceforth to mervell why so few take in hand to maintain your cause. For what may they looke for, and hope at your hands? for honours? which yee bestow rather upon your adversaries, than those that are affectionate defenders of the people of Rome. Yee sighed even now and groned again, at the words uttered out of this foule mouth. But what matter makes that? If yee were now to goe to an election, and to give your voices, ye would no doubt for all that, presente this man (who threateneth to mischeefe you) afore them that are willing and desirous to establish your lands, your dwelling places, and the whole state of your substance and living. But when that leaud language of Posthumus was reported once to the souldiours, it bred a farre greater indignation (besure) within the campe. How now? (say they) is hee, who hath intercepted our bootie, and defrauded us poore souldiours of our due, not content therewith, but must menace mischeefe besides unto us, as his varlets? When as therefore they openly mutered thereat, and the Questor or Treasurer P. Sestius thought that the mutinie might be restrained with the same violence by which it was first raised, he sent an Officer to one clamorous souldior, that kept a yauling above the rest. Whereupon arose an outcrie and a brawle: and he got himselfe a good rap with a stone for his labour, that he was faine to goe out of the prease. And he that smote him, spake alowd besides, and bad the Questor take now that for his paines in a mischeefe, which the Generall had threatened his souldiours. Posthumus in this hurlyburly was sent for, and he when he was come, made all worse and worse with his sharpe examinations, tortures, and cruell punishments. At the last, when he could not see to make an end, nor bridle his cholier: they all ran on heapes together, at the lamentable crie of those whom he commaunded to be choked in the mire, and killed under the hurdle: and he halfe besides himselfe, full foolishly slept downe in more hast than good speed from the Tribunall seat, to chastise one that contested with him, and made a great brawling. Now when as the Licitors and Centurions every where laid about them to make way, and ill intreated the multitude in the throng, they mooved their patience so much, that in that furious fit of the souldiours, the Militarie Tribune was by his owne armie stoned to death. Which horrible act, after it was noised at Rome, and the Militarie Tribunes by the Senats authoritie, were about to sit in commission for the examination of the death of their colleague, by way of rigour and torture: the Tribunes of the Communalitie opposed themselves, and resisted them. But that contention depended upon another quarrell. For the Senate doubting least that the Commons for feare of those examinations intended, would in their anger create Tribunes militarie from out of their owne bodie and degree; were very carefull, and studied all they could, that Consuls might bee chosen againe. But when as the Tribunes of the Commons would not suffer an act of the Senate to passe, and hindered also the election of the Consuls, the matter came to an Interreigne. But in the end the Nobles had the upper hand. For when as Q. Fabius Vibulanus the Interregent, held a Court for the said Election, there were created Consuls A. Cornelius Cossus, and L. Furius Medullinus.

In the beginning of these Consuls year, the Senate made a decree, that the Tribunes with all speed possible should propose unto the Commons, concerning the inquisition of Posthumus his death: and that they should make cheefe Commissioner and Iudge, whom they would. The Commons by the consent of the whole people, gave the Consuls commission to see it done, and performed accordingly. Who notwithstanding, that with exceeding moderation and lenitie, they dispatched and ended the matter, by punishing a few, who (as it was credible thought) made themselves away: yet could they not for all that bring about, but the Communalitie tooke it very hainously, and in the highest degree, saying, That the Acts & Ordinances, which had ben propounded concerning their weale & commodities, those lay a long time asleepe in the deck, and nothing done: but an order graunted for their bloodshed and death, that was presently put in execution. Of so great force and importance was it. Now this had been the fittest time, that after these iniquitous souldiours were chastised, the division of the Volane territorie, should have been offered unto them, for to comfort their poore hearts again. By which deed (no doubt) their hore desire and longing after the law Agraria, had been abated, which tended to dispossesse at length the Nobles of the common grounds, which they injuriously were seized of. But this indignitie sticke in their stomakes, and was taken neerer to the heart, when they saw the Nobilitie so stiffely bent, not only to keepe the common grounds in their hands, which they held by force: but also unwilling to deuide among the people so much as the wast and voide ground, lately gotten by conquest from the enemies: but that it was like, within a while (as all the rest) to bee a bootie, and dividend, to be shared among a few.

The same yeare, were the legions led by Furius the Consull, against the Volscians: who harried the borders of the Hernicks. But finding not the enemy there, they wan Ferentinum, whether a great number of the Volscians had retired themselves. The bootie there, was lesse than they hoped for: by reason that the Volscians, seeing small hope of keeping the towne, trussed up and carried away both bag and baggage in the night, and quit the towne: which was won the morrow after, being left well neare deserte and empie. All the lands were given freely to the Hernicks.

When

A When this year now was passed in good quiet by the modestie & peaceable carriage of the Tribunes, then in place: there succeeded another Tribune of the Commons L. Icinius, when Q. Fabius Ambustus and C. Furius Pacilius were Consuls. Whiles this man in the very beginning of his yeare, was busie in stirring new seditions (as if it had been a taske imposed upon his name and lineage) by proposing of the Agrarian laws: behold, there arose a pestilence, more fearefull than hurtfull, which turned away mens mindes, from their publicke assemblies and accustomed contentions, to tend their houses, and to care for the cherishing of their bodies. And (as men verily thinke) the sicknesse was lesse dangerous than the seditions were like to have been. When as the citie was now excused, as it were, & well escaped, with the sicknesse only of many, and death of very few: presently after this pestilent yeare, followed (as it is commonly seene) a great dearth of come, by reason of the neglect of tillage. M. Papyrius Atratinus, and C. Nauius Rutilius being Consuls. This famine would have been more grievous than the plague, had they not provided well for come, by sending forth their Embassadors to the neighbour nations all about, inhabiting along the Tuscane Sea & the Tyber, for to buy graine. Proudly were the Embassadors prohibited all commerce and traffique with the Samnites, who held at that time Capua and Cumes: but contrariwise bountifully were they releevd by the tyrants or potentates of Sicilie. And such was the willing endeavour of Hetruria, that great store of victuals came down the Tyber. In what desolation the citie was, during this affliction, the Cons. tried by this: that when they could not furnish an Embassage, but with one Senator, they were compelled to adjoine two Knights unto them. And setting a side the sicknesse & dearth, there was no trouble either at home or abroad for those two years. But when these storms were once overblown, & that care past: then began againe the old troubles wherewith the citie had usually bin disquieted: dissention at home, & war abroad.

When M. Aemilius and C. Valerius Potitus were Consuls, the Aequians made preparation for wars, and banded with the Volscians. Who albeit they tooke armes by no publicke commission; yet such as would of themselves serve for hier or wages, followed the wars. At the bruit of which enemies (for they were already come over into the countrie of the Latines and Hernicks) whiles Valerius the Consull mustered his men and levied souldiours: M. Menenius a Tribune of the Commons, & a publisher of the Agrarian laws, opposed himselfe against him. And when as by reason of the protection and assistance of the Tribune, no man would be compelled to take a souldiours oath against his will: sodeinly newes came, that the Castle of Carventus was by the enemies forced. This dishonour thus received, as it was a cause that Menenius was hated among the noblemen, so it gave to the rest of the Tribunes, who were already framed and prepared to withstand the law Agraria, more just cause to resist their colleague. The matter being thus for a long time protracted by much debating, the Consuls called both God and man to witnesse, that whatsoever shame or losse, either had been already received, or were like to be sustained by the enemies: the blame should be imputed to Menenius, who hindered the mustering. And Menenius protested againe aloud, that if the unlawful landlords, would surrender the tenure of the common fields which they unjustly deteined, he would not stay the musters. Then the nine Tribunes, by setting down a decree between them, made an end of the strife: & pronounced by authority of their colledge, that they would assist C. Valerius the Cons. (all contradiction of their colleague notwithstanding) to award any penaltie restraint or chastisement, upon them that refused to be enrolled for warfare. The Cons. being armed with this decree and warrant, after he had caused some few to be had away by the necke & laid fast, that called upon the Tribune for helpe, the rest for feare were sworne to serve. Thus the armie was led forth to the Castle of Carventus. And although the souldiours were as odious to the Consull, as wickedly bent against him, yet at the very first comming, having manfully and lustily dispossessed the garrison, they recovered the fort. The souldiours who were slip away from the hold, and gone a boothailing, by their negligence gave the Romanes a fit opportunitie to enter and to surprise it. And a good bootie there was: by reason that they had continually gotten prizes, and laid up all there as in a place of safetie. Which being sold in portsale, the Consull commanded the treasurers for to bring the mony into the common chamber of the citie: giving out these words withall, that the armie should then have part of spoile, when they denied not their service in warre. Hereupon both Commons and souldiours were more angrie with the Consull. And therefore when as by a decree of the Senate he entered the citie Ovale, in a petie triumph, the souldiours according to their licentious manner (in that case permitted) followed after with songs and sonnets, answering one another in rude time and grosse meeter, by alternitive staves. Wherin the Consull was greatly blamed, but Menenius the Tribune, his name was set out to the height, his praises were blasoned and extolled aloft: and at every time that he was named, the affectionate favour of the people that stood in the streets appeared, by clapping of hands and great applause, striving avie to exceed the songs chanted by the fouldiors. Which caused the Nobles to looke to it, and troubled them more than the malapert saucinesse of the fouldiors with their Consuls, which is an ordinarie and usuall fashion among them. And Menenius (who doubtlesse had ben one of the Militarie Tribunes, if he had lived for it) was excluded from that dignitie by an Election of Consuls. So there were created Consuls, Cn. Cornelius Cossus, and L. Furius Medullinus the second time.

Never took the Com. the matter more to the hart, that the Election of Tribunes escaped their hands: which grieve of theirs in the Election of Questors, they both shewed & revenged. For this was the first time that the Questors were made of the comminalltie: so that in chusing of 4, there was but one place left for C. Fabius Ambustus, a Nobleman: and 3 of the comminalltie, Q. Silius, P. Aelius, & P. Papius, were preferred before yong gentlemen, of most noble houses. I find that the persuaders of the people to use their full libertie in bestowing their voices, were the three Teily, (descended of that house, which ever was most maliciously bent against the Nobles) who were for that year chosen Tribunes of the comminalltie, & possessed the peoples heads with a world of great matters, after which they gaped greedily: but so, as they slady gave our and said, They would not stirre at all, if the people had not courage enough, so much as in the election of Questors, which onely the Senat had left indifferent to the comminalltie and Nobilitie, to effect that which so long they had desired, and now by law was warranted. Thus the Commons assured themselves hereby of a mightie great victorie: and esteemed not the dignitie of Questourship to be the end and type of honor, but that thereby they seemed to have made a way and ouerture for new risen upstarts, to be advanced to Consulships and triumphs. The Nobles contrariwise stormed, not for that their dignities were made common and imparted to other, but for the utter lulle thereof: protelling that if things went so on end, they would neither get, nor bring up children any more: who being put from their Auncestours place, and seeing others in possession of their dignitie, should be disabled for bearing rule and authoritie in the state, and be good for nothing but onely to be made priests for Mars, and Flamines for Jupiter, imploied about nothing els but to sacrifice (for sooth) for the people. Thus on both parts were their mindes netled and provoked, whiles the Commons tooke heart, and had three champions of great reputation to back them, and maintaine their cause: and the Nobles, seeing all would prove like to the Questors Election (if it lay in the peoples choise) addressed themselves to the Election of Consuls, which as yet was not so free, and indifferent both for Commons and Nobles. Contrariwise, the Teily persisted still, and urged the point, that in any hand Tribunes Militarie should and must be created. For now it was more than time that the Commons had their part in offices of state. But no Action hitherto belonging to the offices and charge of the Consuls had been presented unto them, by the hindering whereof they might wring from them, that which they desired and sought for. But see, how even then, in wonderfull good opportunitie, word was brought that the Volscians and Aequians were departed out of their owne Confinnes, and made an expedition into the Latine pale for to rob and spoile. To the which warre, when as by vertue of an order from the Senat, the Consuls began to muster: the Tribunes laboured tooth and naile to hinder it: giving out that this occurrent fortunited happily on their sides and the Commons. Three there were of them, and all most quick active and couragious men: yea (and for commoners) of good birth, and worshipfully descended. Whereof twaine tooke in hand, by their continuall travaile to attend and watch the Consuls, to keepe them a worke, and either of them to hold one occupied: the third, was appointed to intertaine the comminalltie: and in all assemblies, with their Orations, one whiles to reine them in, another while to give them the head, as occasion required. But all this while, neither Consuls went through with the musters, nor the Tribunes with the election which they desired. But afterwards when fortune began to incline to the Commons side, messengers came with newes, that whiles the fouldiors that lay in garrison at the Castle Carventana, were slept aside to get a bootie, the Aequians having slaine a few warders that kept the hold, entred it: and that all the fouldiors were slaine: some as they ran into the fort againe, others as they were scattered in the fields. This thing falling out so crosse against the whole State, gave strength yet unto the designments of the Tribunes. For being dealt withall, that now

A at length they would surcease from hindering the warre, nothing would prevaile: for that they neither gave place to the publike calamitie and necessitie, nor yet regarded their owne privat perill of displeasure: & they obtained in the end that an Act of Senat was granted for to chuse Tribunes Militarie. Howbeit with this expresse proviso, it was capitulated; That none of them who had ben Tribunes that yeare of the Commons, should be eligible and propounded: no, nor chosen againe Tribunes of the Commons for the year following. Whereby, no doubt, the Senat noted and pointed at the Teily, whom they charged to seeke to be Consuls, for a reward of their seditious Tribuneship. Then went the mustering forward, and preparation of war, by consent of all the States.

Sundrie authors write diversly and make doubt, whether both the Consuls went to the Castle Carventana, or whether one of them staid behind in the cittie for to hold the foresaid Election. In this they disagree not, but set downe for certaine: that when they had assailed the Castle a long time without effect, they were compelled from thence to remove: and that Verrugo in the countrie of the Volscians by the same armie was recovered, and that great forraying there was, and drying of booties, both in the countrie of the Aequians and also of the Volscians. Now at Rome, as the victorie of the comminalltie rested in this, that they had the Election which they desired: so in the issue and successe of the Election, the Nobles had the better. For besides all mens hope and expectation, there were three Tribunes Militarie chosen with Consuls authoritie, all of the Nobilitie, C. Julius Tullus, Cn. Cornelius Cossus, C. Servilius Hala. Men say that the Nobles used a subtilie practise and cunning devise, which even then the Teily charged them with: C to wit, that by intermingling a many of unworthie and unmeet competitorrs with others of marke and qualitie, they had alienated the peoples heartes from the commoners, seeing them to be men of no worth, and loathing the notable basenesse that appeared in their persons.

After this, tidings came, that the Volscians and Aequians (were it that the castle of Carventus which they held and guarded full, put them into some hope: or their garrison & fort lost at Verrugo drave them into anger) were up in armes, with all force readie to make warre: that the Antiates were the principall and cheefe in this intended action: that their Embassadours had sollicitated the people of both Nations, rebuking their cowardise, for keeping within their wals, and suffering the Romans the year before, to harrie and drive booties in their territories, and the garrison of Verrugo to be surprised and lost. Moreover, that not only hosts of armed men were sent against them, but Colonies also were planted in their frontiers and marches: & that the Romans not content to devide their lands and goods among themselves, had bestowed upon the Herniks the towne Ferentinum, which they had woon from them. At these speeches they were kindled and set on fire: and in all places whether they went to sollicite, the younger fort and able men in great number were levied. So the youth and manhood of all those Nations, gathered together to Antium, where they encamped themselves, and expected the enemy. Which tidings being brought to Rome, caused more feare than need was. And the Senat presently (which in all fearefull occurents was ever their last remedie & refuge) gave order that a Dictator should be created. Which thing Julius and Cornelius, two militarie Tribunes (they say) took in great displeasure. And hereof ensued much hartburning & dissention: whiles the LL. of the Senat of one side complained in vain of their grievances, That the Tribunes Militarie would not be ordered by the authoritie of the Senat: & at the last had recourse to the Tribunes of the Commons for help: alledging withall, that the very Consuls power upon the like occasion had been by their authoritie overruled and set downe. And the Tribunes of the Commons on the other side, rejoicing at the discord of the Senatours, made answer againe, and said, That for their parts, they were not able to yeeld any succour at all, who were of no reckoning themselves, being reputed neither in the roll of citizens, ne yet so much as in the number of men. But if so bee (say they) dignities and honours were communicated to us, then would wee provide and take order, that by no pride of any magistrate whatsoever, the Senats decree should be made frustrate and disannulled. And in the mean whiles, seeing the Nobles were exempt from all reverence of laws, and regard of Magistrats, let them of themselves also exercise the Tribunes authoritie if they would. This discord falling out so unfriendly, when so great warre was in hand, occupied and possessed mens heades a long time: whiles Julius and Cornelius one after another, thus reasoned and discoursed: That seeing they themselves were captaines good enough for the conduct of such a warre, it was not meete, that the honour once bestowed upon them by the people, should be made voide and taken from them.

them. Then Servilius Hala, who also was a Tribune Militarie spake and said: I have been silent thus long, not for that I was doubtfull in mine opinion, or to seeke what to say, (For what good citizen (quoth he) would have his advise by himselfe, and go from the publike counsell?) but because I had leiser, that my brethren of their owne accord should give place to the Senats authority, than to suffer the Tribunes power to be called for, against them. And even now also, if the case would permit, I could willingly give them time and space to retract againe their too too obstinate, perverse and peremptorie opinion. But seeing that the necessities of war, waite not upon humane counsell, I will have more respect and consideration of the weale publicke, than of the favour of my brethren. Wherefore, if the Senat persist still in that mind and resolution of theirs, I will the next night following nominate a Dictatour. And if any one withstand me, I will aske no more, than the power and vertue of the Senates Act. By which speech of his, having woon deserved praise and thanks of all men, he declared Publius Cornelius Dictatour, and was himselfe by him nominated Generall of the horsemen. A singular example to teach as many as beheld him and his Colleagues, That otherwhiles favour and honour soonest fall to them that least desire the same. The warre was small and nothing memorable: for in one case and slight battaile were the enemies overthrowne and slaine at Antium. The armie upon this victorie wasted the Volscians countrey, wan by force the castle upon the lake Fucinus, and within it took three thousand prisoners: having chased all the rest of the Volscians within their walls, not able to keepe their frontiers. The Dictatour, after he had performed this warre in such sort, as onely he might not seeme to neglect his wonted fortune but keepe it still in ure, returned into the citie with greater felicitie than glorie, and resigned up his place.

The Tribunes militarie, making no words at all of the chusing of Consuls (for anger, I suppose, that a Dictatour had been created) published the Election of Tribunes Militarie. But then the Senatours were in greater care and perplexitie, seeing their cause betraied even by those of their owne companie. Wherefore, as in the former yeare, by foisting in the basest of the Commons for competitors, they had caused even men of good worth to bee despised: so, now by procuring the principall of the Nobilitie, both for honour and for favour, to stand for the dignitie, they obtained all the places to themselves: so as no one Commoner could bee chosen. So there were created foure, all having afore born that Magistracie, L. Furius Medullinus, C. Valerius Potitus, Gn. Fabius Vibulanus, & C. Servilius Hala. This man was chosen again to the place, as well in regard of other vertues and worthie parts, as for the late favour which he woon by his rare moderation, and singular carriage of himselfe.

In that yeare, for as much as the time of truce with the Veientian Nation was expired, they began by Embassadors and Heraulds of armes, to challenge of them amends and restitution. Whom, as they entred into their territorie, the Embassage of the Veientians encountered in the way, requesting them not to goe forward to Veij, before they had presented themselves to the Senate of Rome. Who being thither come, obtained of the Senate, that for as much as the Veientians were at civile discord among themselves, they would not claime any Almendats at their hands. So, how far they were from seeking their own vantage by other mens distresse & calamitie. Also at the Volscians hands they sustained dammage by losse of their garison at Verrugo. But (see what a thing it is to slack the time) For whereas the soldiours besieged there, by the Volscians, and sending for aid in due time, might have been rescued if speed had been made, the armie which was sent for succour, came too short, and after the fray was ended. Onely this exploit they did: The enemies, who after their fresh massacre committed upon the garison, were gone abroad stragling for to raise booties, were by them overtaken and put to the sword. The cause of this slackenisse was imputed to the Senat, rather than the soveraigne Tribunes: who because intelligence was given, that they in the garison resisted and defended themselves most manfully, little considered, That there is no prowesse of man whatsoever, but by valour againe it may bee over-matched. Most brave and valiant souldiours they, that neither whiles they lived, nor after death were unrevengeed.

The yeare following, when P. and Cornelius, both surnamed Cossus, C. Fabius Ambustus and L. Valerius Potitus were Tribunes Militarie in Consuls authoritie, began the Veientian warre, by occasion of a proud & arrogant answer returned by the Senat of the Veientians: Who commanded that the Embassadors which came to claime amends, should take this for their dispatch: That unless they departed presently out of the citie and countrey, they would serve them as

- Lars Tolumnius* had done others before. The Senatours of Rome hardly could digest that: and therefore decreed, that the Militarie Tribunes, should propose unto the people as speedely as might be, even the day before to morrow, concerning proclamation of open war, and sending defiance to the Veientians. Which as soone as ever it was noised and published, the younger sort and men of service, murmured and muttered in this manner: That as yet they had not fully ended the warre with the Volscians: that even of late two whole garrisons were lost, and their throats cut, and the forts kept still with danger and great hazard. There is not (say they) a yeare passeth over our heads, but one field or other is fought: and as if we had not worke and trouble enough already, there was now intended newwarre with a most mightie nation confining upon them, and which was like enough to raise against them all Hetruria. And as they were forward enough of themselves to conceive thus, and utter these speeches, so the Tribunes of the Commons were not behind to buzze more matters into their heads, and set all on a light fire. Who gave out stillestfoons, That when al was done, the greatest warring was between the Nobles and Commons: and that the Commons for the nonce were to be toiled out with travaile or warfare, and exposed to the enemies for to be murdered: and that they were to be kept far off from the citie, and as it were confined and sent out of the way: least by being quiet at home, & minding their freedome and colonies, they should consult and devise, both how to dispose of the common grounds, and to give their voices freely. And ever as they could meete with any olde beaten souldiours, they would hold them with talke, take them by their hands, reckon up how many yeares they had done service in warre, fall to telling of their gashes and skars, asking them what whole place they had left in their bodies for to receive new wounds, and what bloud was behind to spend and shed, in the quarrell of the common-wealth? When as by iterating these and such like speeches, both in their private talke and conference, and also other whiles in their publike assemblies, they had turned clean away the hearts of the comminatie from taking war in hand: the foresaid Act propounded, was put off untill a farther day, and lay still for the time. Which no doubt, had been nipt in the head, and never would have passed farther, in case it had been referred and subject to the hard opinion and conceit of men, as then they stood affected. In the meane whiles agreed it was, that the Militarie Tribunes should conduct an armie into the Volscians countrey. Cn. Cornelius alone was left at Rome. The three Tribunes, after that they perceived the Volscians in no place encamped, and nothing minded to trie a battaile, parted themselves three waies to waite and harrie the frontiers. Valerius hee marcheth to Antium, Cornelius to Ecetre. And everie way as they went, they spoiled all before them, both house and field, and all to amuse and keepe the Volscians occupied that way. But Fabius without any forraying at all, came directly to assault Anxur, which was the service most desired. Now Anxur was that, which at this day is called Tarracine, a citie seated upon marishes. And on that side Fabius made shew of assault. But there were foure cohorts under the leading of C. Servilius Hala sent out to fetch a compass: who having gained the hill that overlooketh and commandeth the town, from that higher ground, with a mightie shout and outcrie assailed the wall, where it was disurnished of guard to defend it. At which suddaine arme, they were amazed who manned the wall of the base towne against Fabius: and suffered them to set ladders to, and to skale. By which meanes every place was full of enemies. And upon the walles for a good while there was nothing but killing, as well those that fled, as those that resisted, armed and unarmed, one with another. So that, albeit they were too weake, yet forced were they to fight: because in yeelding they saw no way but one. But upon proclamation once made, that none but armed men should be killed: all the multitude besides willingly were disarmed. Of which number there were upon two thousand & five hundred taken alive. From the sackage Fabius kept the souldiours, untill his Colleagues were come: saying, that Anxur was taken as wel by those armies, which had driven away the rest of the Volscians from the defence of that place, as by themselves. Who being come, the three armies jointly ransacked it, & had the pillage for their labor of that rich town, that had gathered wealth a long time. Which courtesie & bountifulnes of the commanders, was the first thing that reconciled Commons and Nobles together. Over and besides this munificence of the Rulers, the Nobles also began in a most happie hour to be liberal unto the multitude. For before that either the Commons or Tribunes made the motion, the Senat decreed, that souldiours might have their paie out of the citie chamber: whereas before that time, every man in that service had borne his owne charges. Never was there any thing, by report, so joyfully accepted of the Commons: who ran by heapes together together to the counsell house: tooke the Senators by the hands as they came forth, and said, G They were now truly called Patres, i. Fathers, confessing that now the day was come, that in the quarell of so bounteous a citie, there was no man would so long as his breath lasted, spare either him or life. Seeing that this commoditie they should have to helpe them, namely, that during the time that their bodies were imploied, & busily occupied in the defence of Commonweale, their privat estate should stand at one yer, and not decay. And for as much as it came of themselves, and never moved by any of the Tribunes of the Commons, nor called for and craved importunately, by their importune speeches; that was it, that multiplied their joie, and made the boon it selfe much more acceptable. But the Tribunes of the Commons (who onely had not their part in this common joy and concord of all States) came in with their vie, and said, that it would not prove so joyous and happie to the Nobles all in generall, as they supposed: that this H course and order taken, was at the first sight better than it would be found in the practise and execution. For how could that monie possible be made and raised, but by levying a tribute or pai-ment of the people: they were therefore liberal, but of other mens purses. But admit or say that the rest would beare it, yet those neither could nor would endure it, who were past warre-service, and lived upon their pensions and annuall salarie: who would grudge and repine, that others hereafter should serve in warre for more gaine than they had in their time done; who having bene charged with the pay of their owne service, should now againe bee put to contribute to the wages of others. With these words they moved part of the Communalitie. Last of all when there was a levie exacted, the Tribunes also proclaimed, That they would beare as many out, as would not contribute to the souldiours pay. The Nobles continued still to maintain that which they had so well begun, and were the first that opened their purse, and for that as yet they had no silver coine, some of them carried grosse peeces of brasse in waines to the treasure house, and made a goodly shew of contribution. When as the Nobles had most faithfully paid according to the rate of their wealth: the cheefe of the Commons also, friends of the Nobilitie, as it was afore agreed, began to lay their pennie to theirs: whom when the common sort saw both to bee commended of the Nobles, and to be admired and revered of the souldiours as good citizens: they all upon a suddaine, refusing the Tribunes assistance, began to strive who should pay first.

 And the decree or act being once passed, of proclaiming war against the Veientians, the new Tribunes Militarie led an armie to Veios, consisting much upon voluntarie souldiours. Now the Tribunes were T. Quintius Capitolinus, P. Quintius Cincinnatus, C. Julius Tullus the second time, A. Manlius L. Furius Medullinus the third time, and M. Aemilius Mamercus. And these were the first that besieged Veij.

About the beginning of which siege, when the Tuscans held a counsell in a solemne assembly at the temple of Volumna, they could hardly agree upon this point, Whether the Veientians should be defended by generall warre of the whole Nation, or no. The yeare following was the siege not so hote, by reason that some of the Tribunes, and part of the forces, were called away to the Volscian war. The Tribunes Militarie in Coss. authoritie, that yeare were C. Valerius Poti- tus the third time, M. Sergius Fidenas, P. Cornelius Maluginus, Cn. Cornelius Cossus, C. Fabius Am- bulsus, Sp. Nautius Rutilus the second time. With the Volscians there was a pight field fought be-twene Ferentinum and Ecetra. Wherein the Romanes had the day. Then the Tribunes began to lay siege to Arrena a towne of the Volscians: where, by reason of a falling forth by them attempted, the enemies were driven backe into the towne, and the Romanes tooke occasion and vantage thereby, to breake in with them pell mell, and so they woon all, save only the castle. Into this fort naturally fenced, a good companie of armed men betooke themselves: but beneath the castle, many a man was either slaine or taken prisoner. Afterwards was the fortress besieged also: Neither could it by assault be forced, for that there was a guard sufficient to man it, considering the bignesse of the place: nor gave the assailants any hope of yeelding, for before the towne was lost, they had conveyed all their publicke provision of corne into the castle. So that the Romanes had for very wearisomnesse departed from thence, but that a bondslave betrayed it unto them.
 Who let in certaine souldiours at a steepe high place, and those were they that woon the fortress: for when the warders were by them slaine, the rest of the multitude with suddaine fright were soone overcome, and yeelded. Thus, when both the castle and town of Arrena was sacked and spoiled, the legions were brought backe from the Volscians, and all the Romanes power imploied against Veij. To the traitour afore said, there was given besides libertie, the pillage of two households

A households for a reward. And he was named ever after Servilius Romanus. There be that think Arrena was a towne of the Veientians, and not of the Volscians: the occasion of which error is, for that there was a towne of that name betwene Cere and Veios. But that towne the Romanes kings destroyed: and it belonged to the Ceretes, and not to the Veientians: but this other, wher-of we have reported the destruction, was in the countrie of the Volscians.

THE FIFTH BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIVS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the fifth Booke.

AT the siege of Veij, the souldiours had holds made them for to winter in. Which being a newe kind of service, strooke an heat in the Tribunes of the Commons, who complained that they had no rest from warres, so much as in the winter season. Then the Gentlemen of Rome began first to serve upon their owne horses. When the Albane lake overflowed, a certaine pyraphet or wisar was taken captive from the enemies, who should interpret that strange wonder.
 Eurius Camillus, after ten yeares siege, won Veij: he translated the Image of Iuno from thence to Rome. The tenth part of the spoile and saccage besent to Apollo at Delphi. The same Camillus being Tribune militarie, whiles he laid siege unto the Falisci, sent backe againe to the parents, his enemies sonnes that were betrayed unto him: Whereupon the Falisci yeilded themselves, and so by his righteous and iust dealing, obtained victorie over them. When one of the Censors C. Julius was deceased, M. Cornelius was substituted in his place: Which was never done againe after wards, because in that five yeares space, Rome was taken by the Gauls. Eurius Camillus, being indicted by L. Apuleius a Tribune of the Commons, departed into exile. When as the Senones a people of the Gauls, besieged Clusium, and the Embassadors sent from the Senat to conclude a peace be-twene them and the Clusines, sought themselves in persons against the Gauls in the Clusines armie. The Senones hereupon made quarrell, and with a cruell armie came against the cittie of Rome: and after they had defeated the Romanes at the river Allia, they were Masters of the cittie, all but the Capitoll, into which the able and serviceable young men of the cittie betooke themselves. The elders with their ornaments of state belonging to the offices that each one had borne, they flew sitting in the porches and entries of their houses. And when they were now gotten up to the toppe of the Capititoll, by the backe side of the hill, they were discovered by the gagling of geese, and were turned downe, principally by the valour of M. Manlius. Afterwards when through famine the Romanes were forced to covenant and grant for to give them the sum of 1000 pound weight of gold, and for that to buy their redemption from the siege: Eurius Camillus, who was created Dictator in his absence, came with an armie, whiles the gold was in weighing: and drove the Gauls out of the cittie, after they had been possessed of it six moneths, and slue them. A chappell was built to Locutius in that place where before the taking of the cittie, there was a voice heard, that the Gauls were coming. Wheras it was proposed and propounded to remove to Veij, because the cittie of Rome was burnt and wasted: that comf by the advice and authori-tie of Camillus was crossed and dispatched. The people was moved thereto the rather, by occasion of the offe of a word spoken by a Centurion, who being come with his band of souldiours into the Forum, was heard to say thus, STAND SOVLDIORS, HERE WILL BE OVR BEST ABIDING PLACE.

WHEN peace elsewhere was obtained, the Romans and Veians were at war, with such mutuall malice & hatred, that it seemed, whether part were vanquished, should come to finall destruction. The assemblies for the Election of the rulers of both nations, far differed one from the other. The Romanes augmented the number of Tribunes Militarie in Consuls authoritie: for eight of them (so as never afore) were created: M. Aemilius Mamercus the second time, L. Valerius Potitus the third time, Appius Claudius Crassus, M. Quintilius Varus, M. Julius

M. Julius Tullus, M. Posthumus, M. Furius Camillus, and M. Posthumus Albus. The Veientians contrariwise, being wearie of suing for dignities every yeare (a cause sometimes of civill discord) made themselves a King. Which offended the people of Hetruria: who as they abhorred all regall government, so they hated the person of the King himselfe. He had aforetime oppressed that nation, in regard of his greatnesse and pride withall: in that he had violently put downe their solemne plaies, the intermission whereof was held unlawfull and detestable. For upon a time, in an anger that he received a repulse, and by the Suffrages of the twelve nations, another was preferred before him to bee high Priest, in the very midst of their solemne Games and sports, he tooke from them the very plaies and actors, whereof a great sort were his own servants. That people therefore, given to superstition above all other, and so much the rather for that they excelled in the skill of religious observing the same, decreed to denie the Veientians their aide, so long as they were governed under a King. This decree was suppressed and not spoken of at Veij for feare of the King, who would have accompted him that should report such a rumour, for a sower of sedition, rather than an authour of newes. The Romanes, albeit they heard that all was quiet from Hetruria: yet because they were advertised that in all the diets and counsels of that nation, the question was on foote and much debated, made their fortifications at Veij, so as they stood two waies: some looked towards the citie against all sallies and eruptions of the townsmen: others fronted Hetruria, to stop all succours that haply might come from thence. But the Romane captaines having greater hope in long siege, than in quick assault, began to build wintring harbours (a strange thing to Romane souldiours.) Their intent was all winter time to keepe continuall warre. Which after it was told at Rome to the Tribunes of the Commons (who now a long time could finde no matter and occasion of troubles and alteration) they leapt forth into the assembly of the people, founding and folliciting the minds of the Commons, and eftsoones saying, That this was the onely matter, why a set paie was appointed for the souldiours: and that they were not ignorant, That the gifts of enemies would prove to be belinced with poison: That the freedome of the Commons was bought and sold: That their young men were sent away farre off, and as it were banished from the citie and common-wealth, so that now they had not so much spare time as winter, nor any season els of the yeare, for to visit home and see unto their estate. What thinke yee (say they) is the cause of continuing this warfare? No other verily should they find it but this, least by reason of the frequent number of those young men, in whom the whole strength of the communitie consisted, there might bee something dealt in, and effected, concerning their commodities. Over and besides they complained how they were much more hardly used, than the Veientians. For as for them, they spent the winter within their owne houses, defending their citie, fortified both with goodly walles, and also by naturall situation of the place: but the Romane souldiours abode by it still in labour and travaile, throwed under booties of poore hides, overwhelmed with snowes and frosts, nor laying away their harnesse and weapons, so much as in winter: the ordinarie time of rest from all wars both by sea and land. This manner of hard bondage, neither the Kings, nor those proud and imperious Consuls (before the Tribunes authoritie was ordained to take them downe) ne yet the Lordly ruling Dictatour, nor the insolent and unsupportable Decemvirs, ever enjoyed: thus to dwell in in continuall soulderie, as these Tribunes Militarie doe: who exercise upon the Commons of Rome, an absolute and kingly authoritie. What would they doe another day, when they were Consuls or Dictators indeed, who now but representing onely the Consuls government (as vice Consuls) are so cruell and unreasonable? But we are well enough served, and justly have deserved no lesse. For that there was not so much as one place for a commoner, amongst eight Tribunes. Aforetime, the Nobles were wont with much heave and shove, to fill but three rowines: and now they goe eight in a rancke together, to obtaine all charges and dignities of State and government: and in that throng, a Commoner cannot have a place amongst them, to put his colleagues in mind (if he did nothing els) that they that goe to warfare were freemen yet, and citizens with them, and not bondslaves. Who in Winter at the least, ought to be brought againe to their houses and homes, and once a yeare visite their loving parents, their sweet children, and best beloved wives: to make some use of their libertie, and chuse their Magistrates. These and such like speeches, whiles they broadly uttered and multiplied, they met at length with an adversarie that was able to match them, Appius Claudius, left for the purpose at home by his brethren in office, to restraine the Tribunes seditions: a man ever from his tender youth trained

A trained up in the broiles and contentions of the Cominons. Who certain yeares before, (as wee have said) gave shrewd and unhappie counsell to dissolve and put downe the Tribunes. authoritie, by the contradiction and inhibition of their owne Colleagues: This man being not onely in wit prompt and readie, but also exercised by long practise, made at that time this or such like speech: If ever doubt were made, O Quirites, whether the Tribunes of the Communitie have for love of your good or their owne particular vantage, been alwaies the authors and beginners of discord and dissention, this yeare I know assuredly, yee need no more to stand in doubt. And as I reioice that yee are at length come to an end of this your long wandering, so I congratulate both you, and the Commonweale for your sake, that this error is cleared, and especially in the middest of your prosperitie. Is there any man maketh question now, that the Tribunes of the Commons were not offended, nor tooke fault so much at the injuries at your hands received (if haply there have sometimes been any) as at the bountie of the Nobles, towards the Commons, in allowing pay to those that serve in war? What thinke ye els, either they feared then, or would at this day disturbe and disquiet: but only the concord and agreement of the States? Which they suppose tendeth most, and is sufficient, to abolish and overthrow the Tribunes authoritie. And verily, as naughtie Artificers or lowd leeches, seek for work still, and would be ever doing: so they likewise desire to have some thing or other out of frame and amissle, in the Commonweale, that to the repaire and cure thereof, they might be ever sent for and employed. For whether doe yee, (and speake truth) maintain or impugn the communitie? Are you the adversaries or the advocates of them that serve in the wars? Vnto what peradventure this be your saying, Whatsoever the Nobles doe, it misliketh us, be it for the good of the common people, or to their prejudice and damage. And even as maisters forbid their owne servants and slaves, to have any dealing at all with strangers, and thinke it meet and reason, that they meddle neither hot nor cold with them: even so forwarne yee the Nobles from all commerce and entercourse with the Commons: to the end, that neither we by our civillitie and liberalitie, should allure and winne them; nor they againe become dutifull and obeyant to us. How much more ought you (I pray you) if there were any sparke (I say not) of civillitie, but of common humanitie and good nature in you, rather to favour, and as much as lieth in you, foster and cherish, as well the gracious kindnesse of the Nobles, as the willing service and obedience of the Commons? Which accord, if it were perpetuall, who would not undertake to warrant, that this Seignorie and Empire, within a while, might prove the mightiest and most renowned of all those States that border hard upon our confines? As for this purpose intended, and plot devised by my Colleagues, whereby they would not have the armie withdrawne away from the siege of Veij, before the service were brought to an end: how it would be not onely profitable, but also necessarie, I will hereafter argue and prove. Now for this time, I list rather to treat and speake of the present condition and state of those, that are employed there in warfare. Which Oration of mine, if it were pronounced, not before you only, but also in the camp, and there canvassed & skanned of, by the very armie itselfe, I suppose, would seeme equall, and be received for good and reasonable. Wherein, if nothing els should come in to my head to speake; I would content my selfe, and rest satisfied with the onely speeches given out by the very adversaries. They said of late, That pay was not to be allowed to the souldiours, for that never before it had been allowed. How then can they now be offended, and so malecontent, if they who have some new commoditie comming to them, be enjoined also new labour proportionable? For never lightly is there travell any where without gaine, nor gaine commonly without travell and employment. Paines and pleasure, things of themselves in nature most unlike, yet by a naturall kind of societie (I know not how) are linked together. The soldier (aforetime) thought much to bestow his labour and service upon the Commonweale, at his owne proper charges: yet was he glad with all his heart, that one part of the yeare, he might looke to home, husband his land, and get maintainance to find himselfe and his, both at home in citie, and abroad in warre. Now, taketh he contentment, and is well pleased, that the Commonweale is gainfull to him: and with joyfull heart receiveth his wages. Let him likewise bee content, with patience to forbear his house and familie (since hee is at no great charge) somewhat longer than ordinarie. Might not the Common-wealth, if shee would call him to a reckoning, justly say: Yearly pay thou hast, performe therefore thy yearly service? Doest thou thinke it reason, to receive full wages for the whole yeare? and to bee employed but fixe moneths for it? Much against my stomacke, O Quirites, enforce I this point, and dwell still in this one part of my Oration.

tion: for in this wise ought they to reason that have mercenarie and hired fouldiours: but we will use them as fellow citizens, and thinke it meet likewise that they entreat us kindly, and speak unto us as to their native countrie. Either it behoved us, not to have begun the warre at all: or els to proceed forward, now it is begun: yea and for the honour of the people of Rome, to finish it with all speed possible. And finished it will be, if we presse upon our enemies thus besieged: if we depart not afore we have accomplished our hope, by the winning of Veij. And surely, ifther were no other cause but this, even the very shame and indignitie of the thing, might force us to continue siege unto the end. In olde time, the whole power of Greece laied siege full ten years to one cittie, and that for one only woman: How farre (good god) from their owne home? how many lands and seas betweene? Are we then loth and weary being within 20. miles of our dwelling place, and almost in the sight of our owne cittie, to endure the toile of one yeares siege? Being cause (forsooth) we have but small cause given us to warre: and not griefes enough that might justly provoke us to abide and see the end. Seventines already they have rebelled: In peace never were they true. Our countrie have they spoiled and wasted a thousand times. The Fidenates they have caused to revolt from us. Our inhabitants there by us placed, they have slaine: and against all law of nations they were the principall instruments of that unworthie and unhumane murder of our Embassadors. All Hetruria would they have raised up against us, and at this day about it they go. And when our Embassadors came to demand amends, they had like to have runne upon them and killed them. And ought we then with these kind of men to stand at abay, and to warre coldly and by leisure? But if so just an hatred as this move us not: doe these things (I pray you) nere a whit move you neither? Their cittie is environed and beleagured with deep trenches: blocked with mightie skonces, whereby the enemy is pent up and pinned within his owne walls. His fields he cannot till, and whatsoever was afore tilled, hath been destroyed by war. If we dislodge and withdraw our armie backe, who doubteth, but that they (not for desire only of revenge, but upon necessitie also and constraint to prey of other mens goods, having lost their owne) will invade and overrun our countrie? So that by this meanes we defer not the war, but bring it within our owne borders and confines. But now as touching that which properly indeed concerneth fouldiours (of whom our good Tribunes of the Commons would now in all the hault seeme to have so great regard, from whom ere while they would have wrested their wages): but what is that (I say)? A trench they have cast, a rampier and platforme they have raised, matters of exceeding travaile and labour) so far about: skonces at the first a few, but after as their armie increased, they have erected very thicke in every place. Forts they have built, not only to commaund the towne, but also looking toward Hetruria, to impeach the avenues if any aid should from thence come. What should I speake of the rolling frames and toures, the mantlets and other Fabricks? What should I speake of the tarraces, tortises, rams, and all other engines of assault and batterie? Thinke yee it meet, that after so great toile and paines taken, now that the workes at length are brought to an end, these things should be left and abandoned, that against summer we should be newe to begin againe, and sweate a fresh about the same? How much lesse travaile rather is it to keepe these munitions already made? to be instant, and constant to endure, and abide? yea and to rid our hands of all the care at once? For surely we may soone dispatch the service, if it be plied thoroughly and followed on still without stay; and if we our selves by these intermissions and respites betweene, make not a long piece of worke of it, and drawe our hope a length. Thus much of the labour and losse of time. What els? Considering these so many parliaments, these diets and Councels continually in Tuscanie, about sending aid to Veij, can we forget the danger that we incur by deferring the warre? Indeede (as things now presently stand) I confesse the Tuscans with the Veientians are angrie, they hate them and denie to send: and for any thing by them done, we might win Veij out of hand. But who dare warrant, that if the warre be delayed, they will hereafter be of the same mind? Seeing that if the Veientians have any rest and breathing time given them, they are like to send oftner their embassages, and those more honourable than heretofore. Also the King who newly is set up and created at Veij (the onely thing that now offendeth the Tuscans) in proesse of time, may be changed for another governour, either by agreement of the State (thereby to reconcile the hearts of the Tuscans) or of his own accord: who will not peradventure that his princely regiment should be hurtfull to the safetie of his subjects. See how many things, how many inconveniences follow and ensue upon that course and manner of proceeding. The losse of the fabricks and fortifications

Acations, with so great labour already prepared and achieved: the imminent and present wasting of our owne borders: the Tuscans warre in steed of the Veientians. These your devises, o ye Tribunes, are much what like to his, that offering a sicke man some kinde of meat or drinke, for the very present to gratifie him withall, to please his palate and to content his talage, maketh his disease long and peradventure incurable: who might have been recovered out of hand, in case at once, he would have resolutely endured the right cure of a skilfull physitian. And certes, if it were not materiall to the managing of this warre in hand, yet would it import much to martiall discipline, that our fouldiours should be acquainted, not onely with the sweet fruit of a victorie achieved, but also if occasion required longer time, to abide this tediousnesse: and to wait for the end of their hope, be it never so long: and if war be not finished in summer, to stay for winter: and not as sommer birds, by and by in the fall of the lease, to looke about and seeke for housing, harbour and covert. Consider, I beseech you, and see. The love and pleasure of hunting, carrieth men into mountaines, woods, and forests; through frost and snow, after their game: shal not we then use the like sufferance in the needfull exploits of warre, which pastimes, sports, and delights, are wont to draw and fetch out of us? Thinke we the bodies of our fouldiours so effeminate, their hearts so tender and delicat, that they cannot for one winter abide in campe, and forbear their home, but must needs warre as men at sea, watching times and seasons, and observing the quarters of the year? Cannot they endure both parching heat and chilling cold? They would blush and be abashed verely, if a man should therewith charge them: and they would stand stiff in this and avouch, That they had both in bodie and mind manlike sufferance and patience: and that they were fouldiours as well for winter as sommer: and that they set not the Tribunes a worke for any patronage of cowardise & shelter of idleness: but remembered wel enough, that their forefathers were not under shade for feare of sunburning, nor had their houses over their heads for taking cold, when they first created and ordeined that magistracie of Tribunes. This rather is becoming the valour of your fouldiours, this fitteth well the name of Romanes, not to have their eye upon Veij onely, and this warre now in hand, but to seeke for fame and glorie both by other exploits, and also with other nations in time to come. And thinke yee that there would ensue hereupon a small crack of credit, and hazard of reputation? Would ye have the neighbour nations confining upon us, conceive thus of the people of Rome, That if a cittie could receive their first brunt, and abide their assault for a very small while, it neede not after to feare any more? Or rather should not this dread and terrour of our name spread all abroad, both far and neare, That no wearisomnesse of long siege & assault, no violence of bitter winter, is able to raise the Roman armie from any towne once by them invested? as knowing no other ende of warre but victorie? and whose manner of service is not by way of violent force more than of obstinate continuance, which (as in all other militarie occasions) so in besieging of citties is most needfull: the greatest number whereof, being either by strong bulwarkes and other fortifications, or by naturall situation impregnable, yet by famine, by hunger and thirst, proesse and tract of time only doth force and overthrow. As it will (I doubt not) Veij at length: unlesse the Tribunes of the commonaltie succour our enemies: unlesse that the Veientians find that reliefe and aid at Rome, which they seeke in vaine throughout all Hetruria. For can there ought happen to the Veientians so wished for, as that first the cittie of Rome should be full of variance, and then the campe (as it were by a contagion from thence) as full of mutinies? But contrariwise I assure you, amongst the enemies, so good order there is and government, that neither the tediousnesse of long siege, nor yet the loathing of kingly rule, hath caused any stir or garboile among them. No nor the deniall of helpe from the Tuscans hath one whit troubled and dis tempered their mindes: but die he shall forthwith, that is the author of sedition. Neither shall any man there be suffered to speake those words, which are spoken here amongst you without any punishment or controuling. He deserveth the bastinado, to be drie, beaten and well cudged, that forsaketh his colours, or departeth from his guard and quarter. But here, in open assemblies, they that perswade and counsel not one or two fouldiours, but whole armies to leave their standers and ensignes, and abandon the very campe, have audience with applause. In so much, that whatsoever a Tribune of the Commons speaketh, although it were to betray the cittie, and undoe the whole state, ye are used to hearken and give good care to him: and being ravished and carried away with the sweetnesse of that authoritie, yee suffer under it to lurke any mischief whatsoever: There remaineth now no more but this, that the words they give out here with open mouth, the same they might iterate in the campe among the souldiors, to corrupt the armie, and not suffer them to obey their capitaines. For to such licentious libertie they are growne at Rome, that they feare and reverence neither counsell nor magistrate, neither lawes nor aunient customes, neither decree of Sena-tours, ne yet the discipline of militarie service.

Now was Appius with his orations good enough for the Tribunes, & able to meet them at everie turne: But see; (a thing that no man would have thought) a losse and foile received before Veij made Appius to have the better hand of the cause, wrought a greater unitie among the states, and kindled an ardent desire to assaile Veij more hotelie, and to beseege it with more resolution. For when they had raised up a mount neere to the citie, and approached in a manner to the wals thereof, with their rolling towers & roused mantlets, whiles (I say) they were not so vigilant in the night season to tend and watch these Fabrikes, as they were busie and earnest in the day time to reare and plant them; behold, all of a suddain the enemies opened a gate, and armed in great numbers, especially with burning firebrands, set all on a light fire: and in the space of one hower consumed both the mount and the mantlets, which had cost so long time in making. And many a man besides that came to helpe (but in vaine) by sword and fire lost his life. Which being reported at Rome, made all men heave and sad, and caused the Senators to take care and feare, how upon this accident, they might possible prevent and stay, either commotion in citie, or mutinie in campe: doubting least that the Tribunes would have insulted over the Commonweale, as if they had gotten a great conquest. At what time, they that were by calling Gentlemen and so assayed, and had no horses of service assigned them from the citie, after some consultation together among themselves, suddainly came into the Senate: and having libertie granted of speech, promised to serve in the warres with horses of their owne. After that the Senate had right honourable thanked and given them most gracious words, the newes thereof was no sooner bruited through the market place and whole citie, but behold, all on a suddaine the Commons came running unto the counsell house, saying, that as they were then to serve as footmen, so they offered their service to the Commonweale extraordinarily without mustering, whether they should be led, either to Veij, or to any other place whatsoever. And if they were conducted to Veij, they would not returne againe (they say) from thence, before they had woon that citie from their enemies. At which words, the Senatours so exceedingly joied above measure, that hardly they could temper themselves. For they took not order, as they did by the Gentlemen and horsemen afore, that they should be praised by the mouth of the Magistrates thereto appointed, nor called them into the counsell house, there to give them an answer, neither could they keepe themselves within the counsell house dore. But every one of them in his own behalfe so well as he could, signified from aloft, both by word of mouth, and gesture of hand, unto the multitude standing in the Comitium, a generall joy conceived: saying, That the citie of Rome in that concord and unitie would be happie, invincible, and perpetual: commending the horsemen, praising the footmen, extolling and magnifying that very day, and confessing that now they had surpassed the courtesie and bountie of the Senate. So that Nobles and Commons both, for joy wept againe who could weep most, untill the Senators were recalled into the court: where a decree was made, That the Tribunes Militarie should assemble the people, and give thanks both to horsemen and footmen, and promise in the name of the Senate, that they would be mindfull of their affectionate kindnesse to their countie: and to signifie that it was their pleasure, that they all, who had offered extraordinarie service so willingly, should have their pay notwithstanding: yea, and for the horses also there was assigned a certaine rate and proportion of wages. This was the first time that the Gentlemen began to serve on horsebacke for money. This voluntarie armie marched to Veij, and not onely repaired againe the workes which had been destroyed, but also went in hand to erect new. And from the citie was provision of victuall brought, with greater care of convoy than afore, that nothing might be wanting to an armie so well deserving of the Commonweale.

The yeare following had for their Militarie Tribunes in Consuls authoritie, C. Servilius Hala the third time, Q. Servilius, P. Virginius, Q. Sulpitius, A. Manlius the second time, and M. Sergius the second time. In these Tribunes time, whiles every mans care was bent to the Veientian war, The fort of Anxur being neglected, by occasion that the garison souldiors were disbanded and raunged much abroad, and commonly received Volscian marchants into the town, was suddainly surprisid, by reason that the warders of the gates were betrayed. Lesse companie of souldiors

A there were slaine: because that all of them (besides those that were sicke) found themselves occupied and traded all the countie over, and in the cities adjoyning, like to lawlesse lackies that follow the campe. Neither was there better successe at Veij, wherein rested the chiefe care now, of all their publicke affaires. For not onelie the Romane captaines were more angred one at another, than couragious against the enemy: but also the forces of the enemies were increased by the suddain coming of the Capinates & the Falisci. Which two nations of Hetruria, because they inhabited next, supposing when Veij should be forced and lost, that their turne would be next to be warrd upon by the Romanes: and the Faliscians besides, upon a speciall grudge and old quarrell of their owne, for that afore time in the Fidenate warre, they had intermeddled and interested themselves: sent their embassadours to and fro, and by binding themselves by a solemn oath one to the other, came unlooked for with their power to Veij. And by chance they assailed that side and quarter where M. Sergius a militarie Tribune had the charge of a skonce. Who gave a great al' arme and caused exceeding fright: because the Romanes supposed certainlie that all Hetruria was raised out of everie part, and there present with all the power they could make. The same imagination animated the Veientians also within the citie, to make a sallie. So was the campe of the Romanes assailed on both sides. And whiles they ran together up and downe, and turned their ensignes everie way, and could hardlie keepe the Veientians within the strength of their fortresse, nor yet repulse the violence from their owne fortifications and rampiers, and defend themselves from their forraigne enemies behind: their onely hope was to have helpe from the greater leaguer: that the legions in sundrie places might make head, some against the Capinates and the Falisci, others against the fallie of the townmen. But Virginius had the charge of that maine campe, one that bare a privat grudge and inward malice against Sergius, and was hated againe of him. This man, when word was brought that most of the Fabricks and bulwarkes were assaulted, that the ramparts & trenches were won, and that the enemies on both sides charged lustily, kept his souldiors wel appointed in armes: saying, that if there were any need of helpe, his Colleague should send unto him, if he would. And he for his part was not so arrogant & insolent, but the other was as peevish and willull. Who because he would not seeme to seeke unto his adversarie, nor crave aide at his hand, chose rather to be vanquished of his enemy, than to overcome him by helpe of a fellow citizen. Thus betwene them for a good while the poore souldiors went to wrecke, and were slaine. At the last, forsaking their rampiers, a verie few of them escaped into the maine campe. But the most part, with Sergius himselfe, went through to Rome. Where when he had laid all the fault upon his fellow in government, it was thought good that Virginius should be sent for out of the campe: and that in the mean while their deputies & lieutenants should command the forces. Herupon was the matter debated in the Senat, & the two Tribunes kept a taunting & reviling: & many hard termes were delt between them. Few there were that tendred the common good, but took part either with the one or the other, as each of them were fancied & beloved. Howbeit the L.L. of the Senat thought good, howsoever that so shameful chance hapned either through the default, or unluckie fortune of the captaines, not to expect the ordinary full time of the election, but that presently ther should be new Tribunes militarie created, to enter into their office on the *kalends of October. To which E opinion when they were all agreed, the other Tribunes militarie nothing gain said it. But Sergius and Virginius (for whose sake it appeared that the Senat was weary of the magistrats that yeare) at the first made meanes and besought them not to disgrace and discredite them so: and afterward assaid to crosse the decree: denying that they would give over their place, before the *Ides F Tribunes of the Commons, in good faith, I would gladlie see once, that there were no more power and authoritie in these here, than will and stomach in you. But who seeth not that there is no striving against the authoritie of the Senat? And therefore hold ye content: and forbear ye you to seeke oportunitie and occasion upon our variance to offer wrong. And my brethren for their parts shall either do that which the Senat thinketh good: or els if they shall continue stubborn still in their contumacie, I will presentlie nominate a Dictator, to force them to leave their office. This speech was approved with a generall accord. And the Senatours being glad that without their tedious and fearefuls of the Tribunes authoritie, there was found out another greater power to bridle magistrates: the two militarie Tribunes aforesaid, were overweighed with the consent of all parties, and held a new election of militarie Tribunes, to begin their government on the * Kalends of October: and before that day they resigned up their places. Thus were L. Paletius Potitus the fourth time, M. Furius Camillus the second time, M. Aemilius Mamercus the third time, Cn. Cornelius Cossus the second time, C. Fabius Ambustus, and L. Julius Tullus, Tribunes militarie in Consuls authoritie.

In whose time many worthie Acts were performed both at home and abroad. For not onelie they had war in sundrie places at one time, namely at Veij, at Capena, against Falerij, & with the Volsci, to the end that Ansur might be won again and recovered from the enemies: but at Rome also, what about musters and paying the tribute for soldiours pay, there was much trouble. Besides there was some variance, about taking in certaine Tribunes of the Commons to the rest: and the two arraignments of those, who a litle before had governed in Consuls authoritie, caused no small stirre. But the principall care of the Tribunes militarie, was that the muster should go forward. Neither were the yonger sort and servicable men only prest forth, but the elder also compelled to give their names, and to keepe watch and ward in the citie. But looke how much greater was the number of soldiours, so much more money they needed for their paiement. And the same was levied by a contribution: but unwillinglie of as manie as taried at home. For that besides the levie, they were enjoined to become soldiours also, in defence of the citie & to serve in person for the Commonwealth. These things, grievous as they were of themselves, so by the feditious Orations of the Tribunes in their assemblies, they seemed more grievous and heavie.

Who argued and discoursed thus, That wages was appointed for soldiours to this end, only that what by warfare, and what with exactions and impositions, they might undoe the Commons, and make an end of them at once for ever. One warre (say they) hath now continued three years, and the same, for the nonce, ill managed, that it might be drawn out the longer. Againe, in one muster there were armies enrolled for no fewer than foure wars, wherunto beardless boyes and old crasemen, were taken up and haled forth. Now there was no difference of winter or sommer: so as the poore Commons at no time can have any rest. Who now at last are taxed also and racked to the uttermost, so that after they have brought home with them their bodies overtoyled with travaile, weakened with wounds, and last of all, wasted and spent with age: and finding all things at home unhusbanded by reason of the long absence of the masters and owners, they must be faine to pay Tribute even out of their poore decayed quicke stocke, and repaie againe with great usurie to the Commonwealth, their wages received in warre, as it were upon interest.

Betweene the musters of one side, and the leavie of soldiours pay on the other side, and their mindes occupied about greater affaires, at the Election of Tribunes of Commons, the number could not fullie be made up: Wherupon there was great labour made, that into the rowmes that were void, there should be some of the Nobilitie taken in and admitted. When that could not be obtained, yet to impeach and overthrow the Tribunes law, it was effected or brought to passe that they should assume unto them for Tribunes of the Commons, C. Lacerius, and Marcus Atilius, by the might and practise no doubt of the Patritij. It hapned, so that the same yeare C. Trebonius was a Tribune of the Commons, who would seeme to undertake the patronage and defence of the law Trebonia, and discharge it as a duetie to that name and house belonging. He spake aloud and said, that whereas the Tribunes Militarie had wonne that, wherof some of the Nobles had borne the repulse in their first suit, and that the law Trebonia was disannulled, in that certaine Tribunes of the Communitie were taken into their fellowes, not by suffrages and free voices of the people, but by the rule and commandment of the Nobles: and that the matter was come to that passe, that either Noblemen, or their favourites and followers were to become Tribunes of the Commons: that their sacred lawes were taken from them perforce, and the Tribunes authoritie wrested from out of their hands by violence: All these inconveniences he complained to have hapned through the fraudulent practise of the Nobles: and the mischievous leawdnesse and treacherie of his owne companions in office. Thus whiles there grew great hart-burning among them, and that not the Nobles onely, but also the Tribunes of the Commons, as well they, which were elected, as they that were electors, were hardly thought of by the people:

Then

A Then three of the companie, P. Curiatius, M. Metilius, and Minutius, searing some shrewd turne like to fall upon Sergius and Virginus, (the Tribunes militarie of the former yeare) and by serving processe, giving them a day to answer, turned from themselves the anger and displeasure of the commons, upon those two persons: publishing openly, That whosoever were grieved for the musters and the Tribute, whosoever thought the warre long, and the continuall soulderie tedious, whosoever forrowed for the dammage and discomfiture received at Veij, whosoever for the losse of their children, brethren, kinsfolke, or any of their alliance had heavie and mournfull houses: to them they offered libertie and power to wreake their publicke and privat greefe, upon these two guiltie persons and offenders, Sergius & Virginus, the very causes of all the mischeefes and calamities that were hapned. For why? the adversarie charged them with no more than was confessed by the very parties: who finding themselves both faultie, laid the blame one upon the other: whiles Virginus reproched Sergius with running away, and Sergius laid treason to Virginus his charge, in that hee denied his helpe in time of need. For to say they were both of them so inconsiderate and foolish onely, were to speake beyond all compass of beleefe. But much more likely it was, that there was some packing rather, and that the matter was contrived, and practised of set purpose, and by an ordinarie and common fraudulent plot of the Patritij. By whose meanes, both at the first the Veientians gat opportunitee to fire their workes, thereby to draw out and prolong the warre, and also now the armie was bought and sold, and the Romane campe betrayed to the Falisci. And all this, to no other end, but that the youth and flower of the citie might wax old at Veij, & that the Tribunes might not propose and consult with the people about the distribution of lands, or any other commodities of the poore commons, or in frequent & full assemble of citizens intend and follow their publicke actions, and withstand the conspiracie of the gentrie and Nobles. Moreover there is already (say they) a prejudice passed against these offenders, both by the Senate and people of Rome, and also by their colleagues. For as they were displaced and deposed from their office, by an Act of the Senate: so when they refused to give over, they were for feare of a Dictator forced by their owne companions to resigne up their government: and the people of Rome had created other Tribunes militarie to enter into their charge, not upon the usuall day which was in the * Ides of December, but forthwith in the Kalends of October: as who would say, the common-wealth had not been able to stand any longer, if these men had remained still in place. And yet for all this, these persons thus convicted and fore-condemned by so many prejudices, come now to be judged of the people: thinking they are sufficiently quit, and discharged, yea and have suffered punishment enough, in that they were two moneths sooner than ordinarie, made privat persons; and perceive not, that thereby was taken from them the power onely to doe any harme, and no punishment inflicted upon them. For as much as, even their very colleagues, who had not offended, were likewise discharged as well as they. Let the Quirites therefore & people of Rome, take that heart to them again, which they had upon the late overthrow, fresh and bleeding new, when they beheld the armie running in fearfull flight, fore wounded and agast, arriving at the gates, blaming no fortune, nor any of the gods, but onely these their two brave leaders. And as for us, we know assuredly that there is not one of all them here presently assembled, who that day cursed not in his heart and detested the head, the house, and whole estate of L. Virginus and M. Sergius. Neither is it convenient, that upon whom, ere while every man praised that the anger and vengeance of God would light, against them now when they both may and ought, they should not extend their full power with rigour. Since that even the very gods never lay hand themselves upon sinners and offenders: but it sufficeth that they arme the wronged and oppressed persons with meanes and opportunitee of revenge. The Commons upon these speeches moved with indignation, condemned these two offenders in * 10000 brazen Asses a peece: notwithstanding that Sergius pleaded for himselfe, blamed the common fortune of warre, and laid all upon fortune: and Virginus besought them (but both in vaine) that he might not be more unhappy, and speede worse at home, than abroad in warre. Thus the peoples wrath being diverted upon these two, obscured and darkened the remembrance both of the assumption and admitting of the Tribunes aforesaid, and of deluding and disannulling the law Trebonia. The Tribunes thus having gotten the upper hand, to the end that the communitie might have a present reward for awarding this dome, publish the law Agaria, and forbid the levying of the Subsidie for souldiours pay: seeing there was neede of pay for so many armies: and sped so well they had, in the managing ging of warfare, as they were like to come to an end, without any warring at all. For at Veij the petic campe which was lost, being recovered againe, was fortified with strong bulwarks, and furnished with good guards. The Tribunes Militarie, M. Aemilius and Q. Fabius, had the charge there. And as for M. Furius in the Faliscan, and Cn. Cornelius in the Capenate countrie, they could meet with none enemies without their towne wals. But they drave away booties, and waited their marches, by firing their villages and their corne: but as for their townes, they neither assaulted nor besieged them. But in the Volscian countrie, after their territorie was walled, Anxur also was assaulted (but in vaine) for that it was situate on high. Whereupon Valerius Potitus, who had the charge of that province, seeing that force would not prevaile, began by trench and rampier to laie siege to it, and invest it round. The affaires of war abroad standing in these termes, there arose domesticall strife and sedition at home: and the same was followed more earnestly and with greater adoe, than the wars were managed without. And when by reason of the Tribunes there could no subsidies and exactions be gathered, nor mony for souldiours pay sent to the Generals, and that the souldiours called on them hard, and were hastic for their wages: the campe also had like to have beene troubled and infected with the contagion of those civill mutinies. During these heates and angrie fits of the Commons against the Nobles, albeit the Tribunes of the people said, That now the time was come of establiishing their freedome, and translating the chiefest dignitie from the Sergij and Virginij, to the Commoners, such as were men of valour and action: Yet they prevailed no more than thus, that one onely of the communalitie, (as it were) to make entrie & take possession in the right of that dignitie to wit, P. Licinius Calvus, should be created Tribune Militarie with Consuls authoritie: the rest were all of the Nobilitie, Pub. Manlius, and P. Titinius, P. Melius, L. Furius Medullinus, & L. Popilius Volscus. The very Commons themselves marvelled, that they had obtained so great a thing, and not he onely who was created, a man that aforetime had never been in place, and borne no magistracie, yet an ancient counsellor of State, an elderly person, and well stept in yeares. Neither as yet is it for certaine knowne, why he first and above all others was counted a meet man to take hansell, or take seye of this new dignitie and promotion. Some thinke, that for his brother Cn. Cornelius his sake, who had been the yeare afore a Tribune Militarie, and had given to the horsemen triple pay, hee was through favour drawne in, and called to so great honour. Others, for that himselfe had picked out a convenient time, and made a plausible Oration, that both Nobles and Commons liked very well, concerning the agreement and unitie of the States. The Tribunes of the Commons rejoycing highly for this their victorie in the Election, remitted and called in the Inhibition of the subsidie or imposition aforesaid, the thing that most of all prejudiced the service of the C.VV. By means whereof paiment was made in all dutifull obedience, and sent it was unto the armie. Then within short time was Anxur (in the Volscians countrie) recovered: by occasion that on a feastivall holyday, the watch and ward of the citie was neglected. This was a yeare notable and famous for the cold and snowie winter, so as the high waies were choked up, and Tyberis was unnavigable. Howbeit, by reason of provision brought in aforehand, the price of comarose not. And for because P. Licinius, as he entred his government without any troubles, & with greater joy and contentment of the Commons than indignation of the nobles; so also ruled and executed it all the yeare long accordingly: therefore their teeth watered the next election also, to make Tribunes militarie of their owne bodie. One'y M. Veturius, of all the Nobilitie that stood in suite for the dignitie, had a place among them. But as for the other Tribunes militarie in Consular authoritie, all the Centuries in a manner chose Commoners, to wit, L. Titinius, P. Menenius, Racilius, Cn. Genutius, and L. Atilius.

After this hard Winter, either by reason of a distemperature and disposition of the weather, suddainly chaunging to a contrarie; or upon some other hidden and unknowne cause, there followed presently a contagious and dangerous summer, by occasion of a pestilence, noisome to all kind of living creatures. Of which incurable maladie, when as neither the reason could be found, nor any end thereof seene, the bookes of Sibylla, were by a decree of the Senate perused: and Duumvirs appointed for divine rites and ceremonies, by celebrating a Leisterne, (then first instituted in the citie of Rome) to appeale and pacifie Apollo, Latona, and Diana, Hercules, Mercurie, and Neptune; feasted them (as it were) for the space of eight daies together, and for that purpose they set out three beds or banquetting tables; with as magnificent and stately furniture as could be for that time possible devised. Vvhich solemnities was privately also performed

A med. All the gates and doores through the citie stood wide open: all sort of viands were set out abroad to be used in common open house kept for all commers, one with another, as wel known strangers as their acquaintance with all friendlie welcom & intertainment. Kindlie, & courteouslie would they talke and devise, even with their adversaries: all chiding and brauling was laid aside and put under foot. The prisoners also for that time were enlarged, yea & conscience made afterwards, that any should be laid or kept in yrons, unto whom the gods had vouchsafed that gratiuous meede.

But all this while much trouble there was, and many al'armes before Veij, by reason that three warres were joynd now in one. For when as all at once the Capenates and the Falisci came (in manner as afore, about the fortifications and trenches of the Romans) for to rescue the besieged, they were forced to make head, and hazard a doubtfull battaile against three armies. But the best helpe they had, was the remembrance of the late condemning of Sergius and Virginus. Therefore having conducted by a neerer way, their forces from the greater campe (which before lay still and would not come to succour) they set upon the Capenates backs, as they turned against the rampier of the Romanes. The battaile there begunne, made the Falisci also afraid: in which affright of theirs they suddainlie sallied out of the lesser hold, in so good time that they forced the enemies to turne their backs, all quaking for feare. And having gotten the upper hand, they followed the traine of the victorie, and in the chase made a verie great slaughter & carnage of them. And not long after, the forraiers that wasted the land of the Capenates, as they raunged abroad heere and there, encountered the residue and remnant of this battaile, as if fortune of purpose had presented them to their hands, and swoopt them up cleane. Also many of the Veientians as they fled backe into the citie, were cut in peeces before their verie gates: whiles they within for feare least the Romanes at once should rush in, made the gates fast & so shut out the himmost of their owne men. These were the achievances of this yeare.

And now approached the Election of the Tribunes militarie, whereof the Nobles had in a manner a greater care than of the warre: as who saw now that the soveraigne rule was not onlie parted with the communalitie, but welneer on their own behalfe quite lost. Therefore albeit of set purpose they had prepared most noble and excellent men to stand in suite, whom to passe by and overhip, they thought the people would have bene ashamed; yet nevertheless they themselves (as if they had bene the parties that stood) tried everie way, and not onely sought the helpe of men, but also craved it at the hands of the gods: making it great scruple & a matter of conscience: and alleadging that the elections for two yeares past were not according to the will of God: as appeared by this, say they, that in the former yeare, there was an intollerable winter, and such as portended some heavie judgements from above; how also the yeare following, there were no prodigious tokens shewed aforehand, but even the verie events and effects thereof, were seene and felt: namelie the pestilence both in countrie & citie, through the verie indignation, no doubt, of the gods, for that in the farall bookes of Sibylla it was found out, that they ought to have bene pacified, for the diverting away of that pestilent influence. As if in those solemn assemblies which ought in the name of the gods and religioustie to be held, the gods thought it an indignitie and unseemelie thing, that the honourable offices of state should be made common: no distinction of degrees, no difference of houses observed, but all confused and shuffled together. The people therefore being driven into a maze, not onelie in regard of the majesticke and dignitie of those that were competitors, but also of a verie remorse of conscience, chose for Tribunes militarie in Cons. authoritie, all of the Nobilitie: & a good part of them, the most honorable personages of the rest, to wit, L. Valerius Potitus the first time, M. Valerius Maximus, M. Furius Camillus the third time, L. Furius Medullinus the third time, Quintus Servilius Fidenas the second time, Quintus Sulpicius Camerinus the second time. Howbeit in this yeare no great exploit worthe of record, was performed at Veij under these Tribunes. All the service that was, consisted in forraying and wasting. The two Lord-generals raised huge booties, to wit, Potitus from Falerij, Camillus from Capena: leaving behind them nothing whole and untouched, that might be spoiled by fire or sword. In this meane time, many fearefull prodigious tokens were reported, the most part whereof were slenderly credited, for that of each there was but one onely author: and because there were no soothsayers, by whom they might make procuration therefore (since that the Tuscanes were now professed enemies) they were altogether neglected. But one especially there was, which all men had an eie and regard unto, namelie, for that a certaine poole within the Alban bane Forrest, without extraordinary raine from above, or any other occasion which might make the thing seem lesse miraculous and wonderfull, was risen unto an unusuall heighth. Certain Orators therefore were sent to the Oracle of Delphi, to know what the gods foresignified by that prodigious token. But they, as God would, met with an interpreter of the Destinies neerer home, to wit, an auncient Veientian. Who (upon a time, when as the souldiours, both of the Romans and Tuscans, let flie one at the other taunts and scoffes from their stations and guards) thus spake in propheticall wise: That until the water were drained and let out of the Albane poole, the Romans should never be maisters of the towne of Veij. Which saying of his was at the first contemned as a foolish word, rashly let fall from him: but after, it began to bee much talked of, so long, until a certaine Romane souldiour from out of his ward, enquired of a towns-man that warded next unto him (for now by reason of long waite they had entercourse of speech one with another) what he was who had cast out such an ambiguous riddle of the Albane lake? When he heard that he was a soothsaier, being himselfe also a man not without some sence of religion, trained that he was a soothsaier, pretending, that he would gladly be resolved himselfe, as touching a particular prodigious object that troubled his mind: and therefore requested him at his good leasure, to take so much paine as to conferre with him, and give him counsell about the expiation and diverting the danger thereof. Now when they were both gone a good way from their fellows, unarmed, and without all feare and suspicion one of the other, the Romane being a lustie tall young man, caught the feeble old fellow in the sight of them all, and notwithstanding a great furre that the Tuscans made (but all in vaine) had him away perforce to his owne companie. Who being brought before the Generall, was sent afterwards to Rome unto the Senat. And being demanded what the meaning of that should be, which hee had prognosticated and prefigured concerning the Albane lake, answered thus: Certainly the gods were offended with the people of Veij, that day on which they put this into his mind to bewray the fatall and inevitable destruction of their State and countie: and therefore that, which as then he being stirred by divine inspiration had prophesied, neither might he call backe againe and unspeake: and besides happily by concealing those things which the immortal gods would have to be published, there might be committed as great sinne, as by disclosing mysteries to be concealed. Thus therefore (quoth hee) is it written in the fatall bookes of fortunes, and thus in the Tuscans learning, to us it is delivered, THAT WHEN THE ALBANE WATER OVERFLOWED, IF THEN THE ROMANS WITH DUE AND RELIGIOUS CEREMONIES LET IT OUT, THEY SHOULD HAVE THE VICTORIE OF THE VEIENTIANS: BUT BEFORE THAT, THE GODS WOULD NOT FORSAKE THE VVALS OF THE VEIENTIANS. Then went hee on still, and shewed what was the solemne and right manner of deriving the water. But the Nobles supposing the authortie to be but light of credite, and not of sufficient account in so weightie a matter to be beleevd, resolved to expect the Embassadors, and the answer of the Oracle of Apollo. But before these messengers were returned from Delphi, or any expiation found out for this Albane miracle, the new Tribunes Militarie with Consuls authoritie, L. Iulius Tullus, L. Furius Medullinus the fourth time, L. Sergius Fidenas, A. Posthumus Regillensis, P. Cornelius Maluginensis, A. Manlius, began their government.

In that yeare there arose new enemies, the Tarquiniens. They seeing the Romans buffed with many warres at once, with the Volscians at Anxur, who laid siege to the fort there: with the Aequians at Lavicos, who assaulted the colonie of the Romanes: besides, with the Veientians the Faliscians and Capenates: and that within the citie there was no greater quietnes, by reason of variance between the Nobilitie and Commons: supposing, I say that hereby they had good opportunitie to doe some injurie and harme, they send forth certaine bands of souldiours lightlie appointed into the territorie of Rome, to forray and make spoile: thinking that the Romanes would either put up that wrong at their hands without revenge, because they would not charge themselves with a new warre: or encounter them and make head with a small power and the same but slender & disurnished. The Romans were more offended at the indignitie of these bravadoes, than they cared much for the spoile done by the Tarquiniens. And thereupon they neither made much ado about the matter, nor drove it off any long while. A. Posthumus and Lu. Iulius levied a power, without any ordinarie muster (for letted they were by the Tribunes of the Commons) even in a manner of voluntarie souldiours, whom they had procured with good words and comfortable speeches. And passing throughout the countie of the Carites by crosse and crooked waies,

- A waies, surprised the Tarquiniens upon a suddaine, as they returned from boothaling, and laden with great prizes. Many they slew, all they eased of their loding: and thus having recovered the spoiles of their lands, they returne to Rome. Two daies were allowed for the owners, everie one to owne his proper goods: and on the third day, such goods as were unknowne (whereof the most part belonged to the enemies) were sold in port sale: and that money which was made there of was divided among the souldiours. All other warres and especially the Veientian, had doubtfull issue. For now the Romanes despairing of all mans helpe, regarded and expected onclie the courie of destinies and the will of the gods. By which time the Embassadors were returned from Delphi, bringing the answer of the Oracle, agreeable to the former answer made by the wisard, which was taken prisoner: and it ranne in this forme: BEVVARE O ROMANE THAT THE ALBANE WATER BE NOT KEPT TOO LONG IN THE POOLE. BEVVARE THOU LET IT NOT DISCHARGE IT SELFE INTO THE SEA. LET IT FORTH AND WATER THE FIELDS THERWITH, BY SVNDRIE RIVERETS OR STREAMES THOU SHALT VVAST IT AND DRAV IT DRIE. THEN ASSAULT VALIANTLIE THE ENEMIES VVALS, REMEMBERING THAT OUT OF THAT CITIE WHICH SO MANIE YEARES THOU HAST BESIEGED, VICTORY IS PROMISED TO THEE ASSUREDLY, BY THOSE DESTINIES WHICH NOW ARE REVEALED: AND AFTER THE WARRE ENDED AND CONQUEST ATCHIEVED, SEE THOU BRING UNTO MY TEMPLE, AN AMPLE AND HONOVABLE PRESENT: AND PERFORME THE SACRED CEREMONIES OF THY COUNTRIE ACCORDING TO THE OLD CUSTOME, AND RENEW THOSE A FRESH WHICH HAVE OF LATE TIME BEN NEGLECTED. Hereupon grew this captive prophet above said to be greatlie accounted of: and the Tribunes militarie, Cornelius and Posthumus, began to take his counsell and advice, about the procuracion of the Albane miracle, & to appease the gods in due order. And found it was at last where it was that the gods blamed the neglect of ceremonies, and for letting the ancient solemnities and sacrifices: and that certainly it was nothing else, but that there was an error committed in creation of the magistrats: and they so created, had solemnised the Latine holddaies wrong, and celebrated the sacrifices in the Albane mount amisse. The onely purging or expiation wherof was, that the Tribunes militarie should give over their office, and that they should take new Auspices againe by the sight and singeing of beards, and so to proceed to an Interreigne. All which things were according to a decree of the Senate performed. Whereupon three Interregentes succeeded one after another.
- D L. Valerius, Q. Servilius Fidenas, M. Furius Camillus. But all this while no end there was, nor intermission of troubles and dissensions. For the Tribunes of the Commons, disturbed and staid the assemblie for the election so long, until it was agreed that the greater part of the Tribunes militarie, should be created from among the Commons.

During these affaires, the Tuscans held certaine Diets and Councils at the Temple of Volturna: where when the Capenats and Falisci required that with one common assent and resolution, all the people of Hetruria should raise the siege from Veij, this answer was returned: That heretofore they had denied the Veientians their helpe in this regard, that they were not to seeke for aide at their handes, from whom in so weightie a matter they had not fought for counsell. But now their owne fortune made answer for them. For such was the difficultie of their present state, That if they would yet they well could not: considering especially how into that part of Hetruria there were newly arrived to seat themselves there, the Gaules, a strange nation unto them: with whom they neither had assured peace, nor yet certaine warre to trust unto. Howbeit for bloud sake, and for the very name, and in regard of the present perils of their kinsmen, they would grant thus much: that if any of their youth would go forth to the war willingly and of themselves, they would be no hinderance. Now was it noised at Rome, that a mightie great number of these enemies were come to levie the siege. Whereby, the civill discords (as it is commonly seene upon a generall feare) began to wax more calme & to slake. For the principall Tribe that had the prerogative to give their first voice, chose P. Licinius Calvus Tribune Militarie, without his owne suit (but not against the will of the Nobles) a man of approved good carriage, and moderation in his former government, but exceeding old. And it appeared evidently, that all the rest for that yeare, should be chosen a new after him, out of the Colledge of those that had been Tribunes Consular beforetime: namely, L. Titinius, P. Menenius, Cn. Gentilius, L. Attilius: who before they were elected and pronounced, P. Licinius Calvus spake in this maner (by the permission of the Interregent) unto the other Tribes, that were called in their right right and orderly course, to their suffrages. I see well, my masters, & yee citizens of Rome, that in this Election, wherein ye have in remembrance our former magistracie, yee offe and preface happily against the yeare ensuing, concord and unitie: the onely thing at this time of all others most profitable: in case I say, you chuse againe, those who by experience also are become nowe more sufficient. But as for me, you see I am not the same man I was: but a bare shadow & name onely is all, that is left of P. Licinius. The strength of my bodie crasie, and feeble: the senses of mine eyes and eares dim and dull: my memorie faileth: the quicknesse of my spirit growne heauie and lumpish. But behold (quoth he, laying hand on his son) this young man, the very image and portraiture of him, whom yee aforetime made Tribune Militarie, the first that ever was out of the communalitie. Him trained and brought up after mine owne order and discipline, in steed of my selfe, I bequeath, I give, I dedicate unto the commonweale. And I beseech you, Quirites, that the dignitie which of your selves you have offered unto me, without my seeking, you would bestow upon him at his owne humble suite, and the rather shewe him this favour at my earnest request in his behalfe. The father had his desire granted. And so his sonne P. Licinius was with them whom before we named, declared Tribune Militarie in Consuls authoritie. Titinius and Genutius Tribunes Militarie, made an expedition against the Faliscians and Capenates. Who managing the warre in greater heate and courage, than with sage aduise and counsel, plunged themselves headlong into an ambushment of their enemies. Genutius paid for his rashnesse, and made amends by an honorable death. For he was slaine even before the ensignes, valiantly fighting in the vaward of the battaile with the formost. But Titinius, having after much feare rallied his souldiours, retired himselfe unto an high hill, and made head againe. Howbeit, he durst not encounter the enemy on even and plaine ground. The shame of this defeature was greater than the losse otherwise. And yet it had like to have turned into a right great damage and overthrow. So great was the feare, not at Rome onely whether much newes came diversly reported: but also in the campe before Veij, that hardly could the souldiours be kept from running away. For it was noised all over the campe, that the Capenates and Faliscians had gotten the victorie, slaine the Generals and the whole armie: and that all the floure and strength of Tuscan was not farre off. But at Rome there was much more hurlyburly. For there it was verily believed, that the leaguer about Veij was assaulted, and that part of the enemies already were coming in warlike manner against the cittie: so as they came running on heapes to man the wals. And even the very matrones & dames of the cittie, whom publicke fear had caused to leave their houses, fell to their beads and supplications in the churches: beseeching the gods to forsend and divert destruction from the houses, Temples, and wals of the cittie of Rome, and to turne away that feare from them, upon Veij: if they renewed ariight their festiual daies, if they made satisfaction by sacrifice for the prodigious sights, and no otherwise.

Now by this time were the solemn plaies and the Latine holidayes renewed, now was the water let out of the Albane lake into the fields, now Veij drew neere to her finall end, hastened by the course of the Destinies. Therefore there was created M. Furius Camillus Dictator, the fatal captaine, predestined to destroy that cittie, and to save his owne countrie: who appointed P. Corneliu Scipio Coronell of the horsemen. The change of the Generall made a change soone of all things else. The hopes of men were other than afore, the mindes of men were altered, yea the fortune of the citie seemed not the same. But first of all, he proceeded by martiall law against them, who in that fearefull fright at the last alarme, were fled from Veij: and taught his souldiours not to feare their enemies most, but likewise to stand in awe of their own Commander. And after he had published to take musters upon a certain day, himself in the mean whiles rode post to Veij, there to encourage the hearts of the souldiours. From thence he returned to Rome, for to levie a new armie: & there was not one that refused to serve under his standerd. For even the youth of the forrainers both Latins and Hermicks, came and offered their service in that warre. Vnto whom, when as the Dictator had in the Senate house yeilded thanks, and that all things now were in sufficient readines, by a degree of the Senate he made a vow, That when he had woon Veij, hee would incontinently celebrat the great games, and reedifie and consecrate anew, the Temple to dame Minerva, which afore time had bene dedicated by king Servius Tullius. Thus when hee was gone forth from the cittie, and his armie on foot, with greater expectation of the people than hope: first hee fought a field with the Faliscians and Capenates, in the country of Nepe, [called at this day Nepe] where hee ordered all his exploitcs with as great discretion and

A pollicie as might be: and as it commonly falleth out he chiefted as well, and fortune favoured his designs. He not onely defeated his enemies in battaile, but also drave them out of the field, and gained a huge bootie, wherof the greatest part came to the Treasurer his coffers, and somewhat (though not much) was given to the souldiours. From thence he marched with his armie to Veij, and there he caused more skences and bastilons to be made, and to stand thicker together. And having made proclamation, that none should fight without speciall commandement, he withdrew the souldiours to the making of trenches and rampiers, from their skirmishes that they made oftentimes and that rashly, betwene their campe and the wall of the towne. The greatest worke of all the rest and most laborious, was the undermining that was begun into the Cattle of the enemies. And to the ende that this worke should not be intermitted, ne yet the continuall labour still under the ground might not out-toile them: he devided the pioners into six parts, and each of them wrought six houres round by turnes, so that both night and day, they never gave over before they had wrought a way to the Cattle. The Dictator seeing now the victorie as it were in his hands, and a most rich cittie readie to be taken, and that there was like to be such sacrifice, as never had bene the like in all the warres put together aforetime: least that he might incurre either any mutinie and anger of the souldiours in pinching and skant parting of the pillage, or displeasure and discontentment of the Rulers and Nobles of Rome, by so prodigall a largesse in sharing all: dispatched his letters to the Senate, to this effect, That whereas by the goodnesse of the immortall Gods, his owne pollicie and direction, and the traivale of his souldiours, the cittie Veij was now in a manner at his devotion; what they would advise, should be done with the rich spoiles thereof. There were two divers opinions that mightily distracted the Senat: the one of olde P. Licinius, whose mind being asked of his sonne, spake first (by report) and said: That his opinion was, there should a proclamation be published abroad among the people, that whosoever would be partaker of the bootie, should go to the Leaguer before Veij. The other of Ap. Claudius, who finding fault with this new, prodigall, unequall, and indiscreet largesse, in that they thought it unlawfull and unfit, that the treasure gotten of the enemies should come once at leastwise to the common purse of the cittie, which had bin emptied so often by reason of wars; was of aduise, that the souldiours should have their pay out of it, that the Com. thereby might bee eased, in the charges of the subsidie levied of them: for so should every mans house equally feele the societie and part of that benefit, and the hands of idle persons remaining at home in the town, greedie now of rising, and who would be fingering of pillage, should not pluck from the hardie warriors their due rewards. For as much as, it is usually scene, that as the valiantest man commonly aimeth at the greatest part of travaile and perill, so the more coward alwaies reacheth at the biggest portion of the spoile, and hath his hand deepest therein. Contrariwise, Licinius alleadged that such mony laied up would be alwaies suspected and odious, and would minister matter unto the Commons of criminations and finding one fault or other, wherof seditions and commotions may arise, and would give occasions of newe lawes to be preferred: and therefore better it were, that by this gift and boone, the hearts of the Commons were won and reconciled: who being spent and eaten out by reason of the charges of so many yeares, herewith might be well relieved. And that they ought to tast the fruite and sweetnesse of the bootie out of that war, in which they had spent their yeares, and were waxen old men. And that it would be more welcome and acceptable, that every man should be his own carver, & with his own hand catch from the enemy what he could, & bring it home with him: than if they should receive much more by a great deale at the discretion and pleasure of another. And the Dictator himselfe (saith he) hath avoided as neer as he could, the displeasure, hatred, and offence that might arise thereof, and therefore posted it off to the Senat: the Senat ought likewise seeing the matter is put to them, to let the Commons alone therewith, and permit every man to have such share as the fortune of warre will allot him. This aduise, which made the Senat gracious with the people, was thought to be the safer and better of the twaine. Whereupon proclamation was made, That whosoever would have part of the spoile of Veij, should shew himselfe before the Dictator in the campe. So there went a huge multitude, that they filled the campe againe. Then the Dictator after sacrifice done, and aduise taken of the luckie signes of birds, went forth, and commanding his souldiours to take armes and weapon in hand, spake these words and said: By thy conduct and the instinct of thy divine power O Pythius Apollo, I set forward to the winning of the towne of Veij, & now to thee I vow the tenth part of the spoils thereof.

Difference in the Senat about the pillage of Veij.

„ And thee withall (O Queene Iuno) who at this houre doest inhabit within the compasse of these G „ wals, I beseech, that thou wouldest vouchsafe, to follow us after conquest into this cittie, ours „ now, and thine within a while: whereas thou maiest be shrined in a Temple meet for thee, and the „ grandeur of thy majestie. Having made these praier, with an exceeding multitude he invested the cittie, and assaulted it round on all parts: to the end that they within might have lesse percei-vance of the perill intended toward them from the undermining. The Veientians little knowing that they were betrayed, partly by their owne prophets, and partly by the Oracles abroad, and that some of their gods were invited and bidden to part of the spoile and faccage, and other by vovues and praier trained and called out of their owne cittie; began to looke after the temples of their enemies and other newe habitations: little weetting that this was their last day, and fearing nothing lesse than that their wals should by undermining be overthrowen, and that H their Castle was full already of enemies: every man for himselfe ran armed to the wals, mervailling what the matter should be, that whereas for so many daies space no man stirred out of the Romanes Leiger, then of a sodaine (as if it were in a wood rage) they ran upon head so rashly to the assault. But hereto longeth a tale. That when the Veientian King was at sacrifice, this voice of the Southsaier was overheard out of the mine under the ground, THAT HE, WHOSE HAP-PY WAS TO CUT FORTH THE INVADERS OF THAT SACRIFICE SHOULD OBTAIN VICTO-RIE, and moved the Romanes souldiours, to breake out of the undermining, and to catch up the entrailles and bowels, and carrie them to the Dictatour. But as in things of so great antiquitie it sufficeth me, that those which carrie some likelihood of truth, be received for true: so for fabulous matters fitter in deed to make a shew in a stage plaie (where people take delight in such miracles) than to be sadly beleaved, it will not quit for the paines either to avouch them, or disavow them. The mine or cave at the same time (no doubt) full of chosen souldiours, yeelded forth all at once armed men into the church of Iuno, which was in the Castle of Veij. And some of them set upon the backs of their enemies that were on the wals: others plucked up the portcu-lis of the gates: some of them, whiles from the houses the women and servants flung downe stones and tiles, cast fire abroad. So that every place was full of cries and voices, partly of them that frightened others, and partly of those that were affrighted, with a confused striking of women and children. When as now in a moment, the armed souldiours were throwne down from the wals every where, and the gates set open: whiles some entered marching in array, others scaled the naked wals, the cittie was filled with enemies: and skirmishes there were in every place. After great massaker and execution committed, the fight began to quail: and the Dictatour commanded the Bedles to proclaime and give commandement, to spare the unarmed. Thus the bloodshed ended. Whereupon the unarmed people began to yeeld: and by permission of the Dictatour the souldiours ran to the spoile. Which being brought in sight of the Dictatour, of greater price and valor a good deale, than either was hoped or looked for: it is said that he stretched forth his „ hands towards heaven & praied, That if his own fortune and the felicitie of the people of Rome „ were thought by any god or man to be excessive, the envie belonging thereto, might be mi„ tigated with as small privat losse of his owne in particular, and with as little common calamitie „ of the people of Rome in generall, as might possibly be. And it is recorded, that in this manner praying and worshipping, as he turned himselfe about, he slept forward and caught a fall. And as men afterward guessed by that which fell out, it was supposed that the ominous token boded the condemnation of Camillus himselfe, and the ruine of the cittie of Rome, which happened within few yeares after to be forced and sacked. Thus was that day spent in the slaughter of enemies, and in rising of that most wealthie cittie. The morrow after, the Dictatour sold in port sale the bodies of as many as were freeborne. That mony only came into the common treasure not without some anger and repining of the Commons. And as for that bootie and spoile which they brought with them away, they counted themselves beholden therefore, neither to the Generall himselfe (who to colour and excuse his owne nigardise had referred the matter to the Se-nat: wherein he might have used his owne libertie and discretion) nor to the Senate: but unto the house of the Lianij, whereof, the sonne propounded the matter before the Senat, and the father was the author of so popular an overture.

When as now worldly & earthly riches, were caried forth & tumbled out of Veij by heaps, then began they to remove and have away the sacred gifts & oblations of the gods with the gods themselves, but after the maner of devout worshippers, rather than of greedy spoilers. For chosen there were

A were out of the whole armie, certaine youths in the flower of their age, who having their bodies cleane washed, and being arraigned in white robes, had in charge to carrie Queene Iuno to Rome, and entred into the church with great adoration and reverence: and at the first, very charily and religiously laid hand upon her, for that (after the Tuscane maner) there used none to handle that Image, but the priest of one certaine tribe. After this, when as one of them, whether it were upon a certaine divine inspiration, or in some youthfull sport, cast out these words, WILL THOU VVEND TO ROME DAME IUNO? The rest with one voice cried alowd; That she gave a nod, and seemed thereto to give assent: whereupon this also was added to the tale, that she was heard to say, I WILL. But for certaine it is reported, that she was stirred out of her footfall, with the • helpe of a small levar, and that as she willingly was displaced, so she was easily removed and translated, and so safe and sound conveyed into the mountaine Aventine, there to abide and remaine for ever. VVhich was the place assigned unto her by the vovues of the Romane Dictatour. And there Camillus according to his vow, dedicated to her afterwards a temple. This was the final end and fall of Veij, the richest cittie of all the Tuscans, which even in this last and uttermost calamitie shewed her mightinesse, that having been besieged round about continually the space of ten summers and winters, and in that time done much more annoiance and hurt than it received, was now at last through the necessitie of fatall destinie, gained rather by long siege and secrete undermining, than won by forcible assault and violence.

When tidings came to Rome of the winning of Veij, albeit both the prodigious sights that were seene, had ben expiate by sacrifice, and that the answers of prophets and wifemen, yea, and C the Oracles of Apollo were well knowne; and that so far forth as mans counsel and policie might helpe, they had chosen for Generall M. Furius, the most Noble captaine and warriour of all other: yet considering they had there warred so many yeares with variable fortune, and received manie losses and overthrowes, their joy was exceeding great, as if a thing had happened unlooked for.
 And before that the Senate could make a decree, all the churches were full of the dames of Rome giving thanks to their gods. And the Senate ordained by an Act, that supplications should continue for foure daies, the like as never had been aforetime in any warre. The Dictatour also was met upon the way as he came home by all degrees and estates in greater number, and was more welcommed and honoured than any man aforetime, to that day. And the triumph far exceeded the usuall manner of the solemnitie to that day belonging. But most of all was hee himselfe all D goodly to bee seene, entering into the cittie in a chariot drawne with white steeds. And that was thought an honour, not onely unmeet for the qualitie of a cittizen, but hardly becomming the condition of any man whatsoever. For they made it a matter of conscience, that their Dictator should bee equall with Jupiter, and the sunne, in respect of their horses: for which onely cause especially, the triumph was more glorious than gracious, and taken in good gree. Then assigned he and set out unto Queene Iuno a church in Aventine hill, and dedicated another to dame Ma- tuta, and so having atchieved and performed these divine and humane deeds, he resigned up his Dictatorship.

After this began some speech about the Present to Apollo, Vnto whom, when as Camillus said, that he had vowed the tenth part of the spoile: and the priestes and prelates thought good that E the people should discharge their conscience in that behalfe: there could no readie meane be found how to command them to give backe againe the spoile, that the due portion thereof might be set apart for the holy oblation. At the length they grew to this point, which was thought the easiest course of all, that whosoever would acquit himselfe & his house in conscience, should, after he had made an estimate to himselfe of his owne share in the spoile, bring the value & price of the tenth part into the common chest: that thereof might be made a golden oblation, meet for the state of that Temple, becomming the power of that god, and answerable to the dignitie of the people of Rome. Yet even this contribution alienated the hearts of the people from Camillus.

Amid these affaires, there came Embassadors from the Volscians and Aequians, to treat for peace: and peace obtained they, rather because the cittie, wearied with continuall warres, might F now take rest and bee at quiet, than for any defects of them that sued for it. After Veij was taken, the yeare following had fixe Tribunes Militarie in Consul authority: two P. Corneli, namely, Cossus and Scipio, M. Valerius Maximus the second time, C. Fabius Ambustus the second time, L. Furius Medullinus the second time, and Q. Servilius the third time. Vnto the Corneli fell out by lot the Faliscane warre, to Valerius and Servilius the Capenates. Who neither assaulted their cities

citties by force, nor wearied them with siege: but forraied the countries, and drave booties away of such things as were in the fields, nor a tree that beareth fruit, nor any fruitful thing besides, escaped their hands: This distresse and calamitie subdued the Capenates: who thereupon sued for peace, and had it graunted. But amongst the Faliscians the warre continued still. In the meane time, at Rome there were sundrie seditions. For the appealing whereof, it was thought good to send a Colonie to Volscij, and thither three thousand Roman citizens were appointed in check-roll. And Triumvirs were thereto chosen, who devided to every man three acres of ground and a iulie, and one twelfth part. That began to be despised, because they thought it but a poor comfort offered to stop their mouths withall, and to put them beside a greater hope. For why should the Commons be sent away into the Volscians land, seeing there was Veij within their eyesight, a most faire cittie, and the land about, more plentifull and large than that of Rome? And as for the cittie it selfe, they preferred it, either for the site, or state of privat and publicke buildings and other places, before the cittie of Rome. Moreover, a motion also was made (which, after that Rome was woon by the French, was more hotely followed) concerning a generall transmigration and removing to Veij for ever. Marry, they intended that Veij should bee inhabited, partly by the Commons, and partly by the Nobilitie: saying, That the people of Rome might wel ynough inhabit two citties jointly in one state of Commonwealt. Against all this, the LL. of the Senate laboured what they might, and plainly said, they would sooner die in the sight of the people of Rome, than any of those matters should passe. For why? if there were now in one cittie so much dissention, what would there bee in twaine? Would any man be so mad, as to preferre a conquered cittie, before his owne countrie that had conquered the same? and suffer Veij after it is woon to be in better estate than it was afore, even when it was at the best? Finally, well might they bee forsaken at home in their owne countrie by their citizens, but to forsake their countie and citties, they would never bee brought by any force whatsoever. They would not follow to Veij, T. Sicinius as their founder, (for he amongst the Tribunes of the Commons perswaded this Act) and leave their god Romulus the sonne of a god, the first stockefather and beginner of the cittie of Rome. Whiles these matters were in handling with foule stir and much debate and variance, (for the Nobles had woon to their opinion some of the Tribunes) there was nothing else that staied the Commons hands from outrage, but this, that when as there was an outcrie made to begin the quarrell, and to set them together by the eares, the cheefe and principall Senators first came forth to the multitude, and offered themselves to be laid at, smitten and slaine. In regard of whole age, dignitie, and honour, they forbearing to doe violence, were likewise for shame staied in their mood, for any the like attempts besides. Camillus, taking vantage hereof, ever and anon in all places, made speeches unto the people, and said: That it was no marvell truly, that the cittie was in a rage and madnes, which being charged with a vow, made more care of all things els, than to discharge their conscience thereof, and to see it performed. As for the collation and gathering of a final donative, rather than a tithe, he said nothing of it: seeing that every man privatly bound himselfe thereto, and the bodie of the people stood freed thereto. But one thing there was, that his conscience would not suffer him to hold his peace, that out of that bootie onely which was of moveable things, the tenth was appointed to be levied: as for the cittie & ground that was won, which also was comprised within the vow, there were no words at all made. When as the debating of this matter, which to the Senate seemed doubtful and hard, was put over to the Priests and Prelates: their colledge calling to them Camillus, thought good, That whatsoever the Veientians had before the vow made, and whatsoever after the vow, came into the hands of the people of Rome, the tenth part thereof should be consecrated to Apollo. So both the cittie and the lands were valued: and monie taken forth of the cittie chamber. And the Tribunes militarie Consular enjoined, therewith to buy gold. Whereof there being not store ynough, the dames of the cittie having their assemblies and meetings by themselves for to consult thereabout, by a common decree made promise to the Tribunes militarie, and brought into the exchequer their owne gold, and all the ornaments and jewels they had. This was acceptable a thing, and as well taken of the Senate, as ever any had been: and for this their liberalitie (men say) they had this honour graunted unto them, as to ride to church and to plaies in hanging or ship-coaches, and as well on working daies as holidays, to be at their wagons. When the gold was of every one received by weight, and prised to the worth, that they might again be paid mony therefore: it was agreed that a standing cup of gold should be made thereof, & presented as an oblation to Apollo at Delphi. So soone as they had eased and disburnded their minds of this religious vow, the Tribunes of the Commons began sedition a new. So as the multitude were incited and stirred up against all the peers, but above all other against Camillus: charging him, that what by confiscating & consecrating the bootie of the Veientians, he had brought it to just nothing. Those nobles that were absent they blamed and cried out against mightilie, but of such as were present in place, and offered themselves unto them in their anger, they had some reverence. Now so soone as they saw the matter in question to be deferred & continued past that yeare, they chose againe for the yeare following, those Tribunes of the Commons, which were the authors of that Act and law. The Nobles likewise endeavoured the same for those that should oppose themselves against the law. So the Tribunes of the Commons (a good part of them) were chosen the verie same againe. But at the election of the Tribunes Militarie, the Patritij after verie much adoe got at length, that Furius Camillus was created. They made semblance and pretended, that they would be provided of a Generall for warre, but indeed their purpose was to be furnished of an adverfarie, to withstand the Actes and proceedings of the Tribunes. Together with Camillus were made Tribunes Militarie in Consuls autoritie, L. Furius Medullinus the sixth time, C. Aemilius, L. Valerius Publicola, Sp. Posthumius, P. Cornelius the second time.

In the beginning of the yeare, the Tribunes of the Commons stirred not untill M. Furius Camillus was gone against the Falisci, as his charge required for that warre. And by delays afterwards the matter was well cooled. As for Camillus, whom of all other they most feared to be their adverfarie, he waxed great and glorious, by his service against the Falisci. For when as at the first, the enemies kept themselves within the walls, thinking it the safest way: he by wasting their countrie, and setting fire upon their villages, forced them to come forth of their towne, howbeit they feared to be too bold, and to go farre forward: and encamped themselves a mile and lesse from the towne; reposing their safety and securitie in nothing else, but in the dangerous and hard passage, the waies all about being rough, ragged, and stonie, in some places straight and narrow, in other up hill and stiepe. But Camillus having taken a prisoner out of the fields, and being guided by his direction, late in the night dislodged his camp, and betimes in the morning at breake of the day, shewed himselfe upon the higher grounds a good deale. The Romans on three sides, fell to fortifie by trenching and casting rampiers, whiles the rest of the armie stood readie ranged for battaile. And where as the enemies assaied to hinder the worke, he discumfited them and put them to flight, wherupon the Falisci were so frighted, that as they fled amaine in disaray, they passed beyond their owne campe, which was neerer; and made as fast as they could to the towne. Many were slaine and manie wounded, before that in this affright they could hit upon the gates. Their campe being taken, the bootie thereof came unto the Questors coffers, with the great grudging and anger of the soldiours. Howbeit, yeelding to the severitie of discipline and good government: the same vertue which they had hated before, they now honoured and held in admiration. After this was the cittie besieged, and sconces & platformes raised about it. Otherwhiles also, as occasion was offered, the townesmen would fallie forth and assaile the Romans campe, & make light skirmishes. Thus the time passed without anie great good hope of either side: for that they within the town besieged, had of their former provision more store of corn & other necessaries than they that lay at siege without. And it seemed they would have had as long a peece of work there, as they had at Veij, had not fortune yeilded to the Romans General, both a trial of his approved vertue in war, & also speedie victory.

It was the manner amongst the Faliscians, to entertaine for the governance of their children, one that should both teach and instruct them in schoole, and withall beare them company whatsoever they went: and many children together (as the guise continueth still even to this day in Greece) were committed to the charge and tuition of one man. As for the nobles and principall mens sonnes of this cittie (as it is usually everie where else) a speciall man had the teaching of them, such an one, as was thought most learned and the greatest clerke of all other. This man, having in time of peace begun to bring the children forth before the towne side, to disport and exercise themselves, gave not over his wonted manner now in time of warre. And using still to traîne them abroad one while neerer, an other whiles further off from the gate: it fel out so, that one day what with pastime, and what with pleasant talke and discourses, he drue them further than he accustomed: and seeing his time, went forwards as faire as the enemies corps de gard, and so forth on, till he had brought them within the compasse of the campe, and even to Camillus his pavilion.

lion. Where to his wicked intended act, he added also a more gracelesse speech, saying, That he yielded * Falerij into the Romanes hands, in that he gaue them those children to doe with what they would, whose parents were the rulers and commaunders of the cittie. Which words when Camillus heard, Thou comest not (quoth he) lewd wretch as thou art, with thy lewd & cursed present, either to a people or to a capitaine like thy selfe. We have not indeed with the Faliscians any league at all, by covenant of man concluded and established: yet by nature, there is and will be still a kind of amitie or societie betwene us and them. There are lawes due for warre as well as for peace: and those have we learned to observe no lesse iustlie, than valiantly. We bare armes not against that sely age, which usually is spared in raising and sacking of townes: but against armed men, and those, who being by us neither harmed nor provoked, have assailed the Romanes campe at Veij. And yet those enemies (as bad as they be) like as thou hast for thy part exceeded them, in a new and strange kind of wickednes: so will I conquer. I doubt not, by feats that the Romanes profess; by vertue, by travaile, by hardie fight: like as I have done. Veij already. After this he caused him to be stripped naked, and so with his hands bound behind him, he delivered him to the children, for to bring him backe to Falerij: and gave them rods withall, wherewith they might whip and drive this traitorous person forward into the cittie. At which sight the people at the first, came running together: and then the magistrates called a Counsell to sit upon this strange occurrent. But see what a change it wrought in their hearts. They who a while before were with hatred & anger so cruelly set, as that they withed rather in a manner to be destroyed with the Veientians, than to accept of peace as the Capenates had done: now throughout the whole citie required to be at accord with the Romanes. No talke in the market place, no speech in the Council house, but of the faithfulness and truth of the Romanes, and of the justice of their Generall. And with one general consent of all, Embassadors were sent to Camillus into the campe. And from thence by permission of Camillus, to the Senate at Rome they went, to deliver up Falerij: and being admitted into the Senate house, in this wise (by report) they spake: In that victorie (right honourable) which neither God nor man can chule but allow, are we by you and your Generall overcome and vanquished. And here we render our selves unto your hands: supposing this (than which to a conquerour there can be nothing more honourable) that we shall live better under your government, than under our owne proper lawes and liberties. The event and yssue of this warre, hath afforded to mankind two worthe examples to follow. Yee for your part have made choice to observe faithfulness in warre, rather than to attchieve a present conquest: and we again, by this your faithful dealing induced & provoked, have willingly yielded unto you the victory: confessing our selves now presently to be your leige & lawfull subjects. Send whom you wil, to receive our armor, our hostages, our town with open gates. Neither shal you ever repent of our allegiance: nor we think much of your rule & government. Camillus had thanks both of the enemies and of the citizens. The Falisci were charged with money for that years pay, that the people of Rome might be freed of their subsidie. Thus when peace was graunted, the armie was brought backe againe to Rome.

Whenas Camillus was returned after this conquest of his enemies into the cittie, with much better commendation, than when as in triumph he rode in a chariot drawne with white horses through the citie, as being now famous for his just dealing and faithfulness: secretly the Senate was abashed for verie reverence of the man, and could no longer beare, but without further delay to acquite him of the vow he made. So there were sent L. Valerius, L. Sergius, A. Manlius as Embassadors in one galley unwasted, to present unto Apollo at Delphi by way of oblation, a standing cup of gold. Who not farre off from the narrow seas of Sicilie, were encountered & boarded by certaine Liparenian pirates or men of warre, and had to Lipara. Now the manner was of that citie, (as common rovers use to doe) for to devide the prise amongst them. Haply, the chiefe officer or magistrate for that yeare, was one Timasibens, a man more like to the Romanes than his own countreimen. Who having himselfe some reverent regard of the name of Embassadors, and the present of the god to whom it was sent, and the occasion therof: possessed the multitude also (which alwaies lightly resembleth their governor) with due religion and pricke of conscience. This head ruler brought the Embassadors into their lodging, and entertained them courteously at the cities charges, wasted them with the convoy of a sufficient flecte: accompanied them in person to Delphi, and from thence conducted them home againe safe to Rome. Whereupon by an Act of the Senate, there was a contract made with him of amitie and mutuall

A mutuall intertainment, and giftes bestowed upon him at the citties cost. The same yeare there was doubtfull warre with the Aequians, so as it was uncertaine both in the armie and at Rome, whether they had woon or lost the victorie. The Generals for the Romanes, were of the Tribunes Militarie, C. Acmylius, and Sp. Posthumius. At the first they warred both together, but after, when the enemies were in fight discomfited, it was agreed, that Acmylius should keepe Verrugo with a garison, and Posthumius wast the borders. Where, as he marched somewhat negligently with his armie out of order, as presently after a field woon, the Aequians set upon him, and having put him in fear, chased him unto the hills next hand. The fight whereof came from thence to the other garison also at Verrugo. Posthumius, after that he had retired his men into safetie, and assembled them together, and there in an Oration greatly blamed and cried out upon their feare, and running away: and that they were discomfited by a most dastardly fugitive enemy: the whole host cried out with one voice, That they deserved to be told of it, and confessed that they had committed a foule fault; but they themselves would make amends therefore: and promised that the enemies should carrie it neither to heaven nor hell, nor joy long therewith. Requiring that he would conduct them presently to the enemies campe (which in sight was pight upon a plaine) professing to refuse no extremitie of punishment, if they were not masters of it before night. Hee then commended them, and willed them to refresh their bodies, and to bereadie at the releefe of the fourth watch. Now lay the enemies likewise in the passage, to intercept the Romanes, as they fled by night from the hill, even in the way which leadeth to Verrugo. And before day they encountred together (but you must thinke the moone shone all night) and saw how to fight, as well as by day light. But the noise being heard to Verrugo, strake so great feare amongst them, thinking, the campe of the Romanes had ben assailed, that for all Acmylius could doe to hold them, and to beseech them to the contrarie, they fled scattered to Tusculum. From whence the newes came to Rome, That Posthumius was slaine, and his armie lost. But hee riding about the hoast (after that in the morning betimes the day light shewed them that followed apace on every side, that there was no feare of ambushments and forelayings) charged them with their promises, and set them in such a heat, that the Aequians could no longer abide their violence. Then slew they the enemies in the chace every one, & made havock of them as they fled, more like men that doe things in a furie and rage, than by plaine valour. And presently upon the tidings from Tusculum (which put the citie in a vain or causelesse fright) there came from Posthumius letters, digit with lawrell, importing newes, that the Romanes had the victorie, and the Aequians the overthrow.

Because as yet the actions and sutes afore said of the Tribunes of the Commons could come to no end: both the Commons laboured to continue the Tribuneship in them that were the maintainers of the law preferred: and also the Nobles endeavoured to make those rulers againe that had opposed themselves against the same law. But as the Commons in their owne Election prevailed and had the better: so the Nobles were revenged of them againe for this greefe they tooke, by an Act of the Senate, that Consuls (hated magistrates of the Commons) should be created. Thus after fifteene yeares were Consuls reelected, L. Lucretius Flavius, Servius Sulpitius Camerinus.

In the beginning of this yeare, when as the Tribunes of the Commons bestirred themselves stoutly to goe through with their law, for that none of their brotherhood was about to denie and nip the same: and whiles the Consuls for that very cause resisted them as earnestly, and the whole citie was hereabout amused: the Aequians wan Vitelia, a Colonie of the Romanes, seated within their owne countrie. Most part of the Coloners (because the towne being by night betrayed and woon, yielded unto them free passage to escape away on the backe side) fled safe to Rome. So that service befell unto L. Lucretius the Consul, who went with a power, and vanquished the enemies in fight, and with victorie returned to Rome to a greater conflict a good deale. Aulus Virginius, and Quintus Pomponius, two Tribunes of the Commons the two yeares past, were accused: for whose defence it was for the credite of the Senate, That the Nobles should agree and sticke close together. For no man laid to their charge either dishonest behaviour in life, or corrupt carriage of themselves in their office, but onely this, That to please and gratifie the Nobles, they had set themselves against the Tribunes law. Howbeit the anger of the Commons went beyond the favour of the Senate, and (that which was a most shamefull precedent) they (guilelesse men) had a fine set on their heads of *ten thousand pound of brasen coin. Where at the Nobles tooke great displeasure. Camillus openly blamed the Commons for this their wicked part: who now setting themselves against their owne patronnes, perceived not that by a perverse proceeding in judgement against their Tribunes, they had lost the libertie of opposing themselves with their negative voice: and take that away once, and farewell all authoritie of the Tribunes for ever. For where as they hoped that the Nobles would endure the unbridled and licentious libertie of that office, they were much deceived: for if these hard courses of the Tribunes might not bee restrained by helpe of the same Tribunes, the Nobilitie would find some other weapon to fight withall. He rebuked the Consuls also, for that they suffered those Tribunes to faile of their protection and safe conduct, who had done and said nothing but by the authority and warrant of the Senate. Whiles openly he used to make these and such like Orations to the people, hee thrust himselfe daily more and more into mens anger and displeasure. But to stir up the Senate against the foresaid law, he ceased not still: willing them, that when the day came of proposing the law, they should come into the common hall, with no other mind but this, To remember they were fight for god and countrie, for the temples of the gods, and the very soile wherein they were borne. And as for his owne selfe privately, if it were lawfull for him amidst these civile troubles of his native countrie, to thinke upon & respect his owne proper glorie, it were right honourable for him, to have the cittie which he had woon, peopled and reforted unto: and daily to behold and enjoy the memorable monument of his own glorie: to see before his eyes the very cittie, whereof the counterfeite was borne in the pompe of triumph: and that all men els should tread in the steps of his noble acts. But hee thought it a shamefull and abominable thing, that a cittie left and forsaken of the immortall gods, should be inhabited: and that the people of Rome should dwell in captive soile, and to make this exchange, to leave a naturall countrie which hath conquered, for it that hath beene conquered. With these persuasions and exhortations were the cheefe rulers excited, and the Nobles old and young, came troupe-meale, (when as the law should be propounded) into the hall. And as they were dispersed and sorted into Tribes, every one taking hold of those of his owne tribe, began to beseech them even with teares, not to forsake that countrie now, in the quarrell wherof they and their fathers had fought most valiantly and happily: shewing herewith ever and anon the Capitoll, the temple of Vesta, and other temples thereabout of the gods: that they should not therefore, drive the people of Rome, as exiled and banished, out of their native soile from their own home and house gods, into their enemies cittie, nor bring the matter thus about, that it had been better that Veii had not been woon, rather than Rome should bee abandoned. Because their dealing was nothing but by way of praier and persuasion, and in their praiers much mention and naming of the gods, the most part of them were touched in conscience: so as more Tribes nipped that one law for going forward, than gave their voices to approve it. Which victorie was so joyfull to the Nobles, that the morrow after, by the motion of the Coss. a decree was made, That amongst the Commons should be a division of seven acres for a man out of the Veientian lands: and not for householders onely, but that consideration and reckoning should be had also, in every house, of all free borne persons: to the end, that they should bee willing to breed up children to the like prooffe, and for the hope of like commoditie. When the Commons by this bountifull gift and liberalitie, were well pacified and stilled, there was no stirre at all to hinder the election of the Consuls. So there were created Consuls, Lu. Valerius Potitus, and M. Manlius, who afterwards was surnamed Capitolinus.

These Consuls set out the great solemn games and plaies, which M. Furius the Dictator had vowed in the Veientian warre. In the same yeare the Temple of Iuno Regina vowed by the same Dictator and in the same warre, was dedicated. And it is reported, that the dedication thereof was celebrated with exceeding great resort and forward endeavour of the dames of Rome. War there was (but not greatly to be spoken of) in Algidum with the Aequians, for that the enemies were in a manner discomfited before that they joynd battaile. Valerius because he followed still and killed the enemies in chase, was allowed by decree to triumph at full: and Manlius, that he should enter into the cittie only Ovant, in petie triumph. The same yeare arose a new war with the Volturnians: against whom by reason of a famine and pestilence that grew about Rome upon exceeding drought & heat, an armie could not be led forth. For which cause the Volturnians puffed up with pride, joining unto them the Salpentes, invaded first the countrie about Rome. Wherupon war was proclaimed against both nations. C. Iulius the Censor departed this life. In whose

A roome M. Cornelius was substituted. Which after bred some scruple of religion, for that Rome in that five yeares space was taken. So that never after that is there any Censor chosen into the place of the deceased. And the Consuls also being sicke and thereby disabled to governe, it was thought good to take new counsell and advise of auspices or tokens of birds, by an Interregne: When as therefore by an act of the Senat, the Consuls had resigned their office, M. Furius Camillus was created Interregent. Who named after him P. Cornelius Scipio: and he afterwards Lu. Valerius Potitus to be Interrex. By whome were made six Tribunes Militarie with Consuls authoritie: that in case any of them should bee sicke and crasie, yet the commonwealth should have governours enough. The first day of July entered they into their office: namely, L. Lucretius, Servius Sulpitius, M. Aemilius, Lu. Furius Medullinus the seventh time. Agrippa Furius, C. Aemilius the second time. Of these, Lu. Lucretius and C. Aemilius had in commission to go against the Volscians: but Agrippa Furius, and Servius Sulpitius against the Salpentes. And first were the Volscians fought withall. A great warre in respect of the number of enemies: but for the conflict and battaile, nothing fierce and sharpe. For their armie at the first encounter was put to flight, and eight thousand souldiours were by the Roman horsemen environed, wherupon they threw their weapons away and yielded. The tidings of this war caused the Salpentes not to adventure upon fight: but they kept themselves armed within the wals, & stood upon their guard. The Romanes then all abroad drave booties both out of the Salpentes countrie, and the Volscians, and no man withstood their violence: so long untill the Volscians wearied with warre, had truce granted unto them for twentie yeares, upon this condition, To make restitution againe to the Romanes of their goods, and to paie the souldiours for that yeare their wages.

The same yeare one M. Caelius a commoner, gave notice to the Tribunes, that in the newe Causey, where now there standeth a Chappell above the Temple of Vesta, there was in the still time of the night a voice heard, louder than any mans, willing that the governours might have intelligence, that the Gaules were coming. This, by reason of the basenesse of the authour (as commonly it is scene) was not credited: besides, they were a nation farre remote, and therefore lesse knowne and of small accompt. Thus were not onely the aduertisements of the gods despised, when as their fatall time of destruction was toward: but also the helpe of man (which rested onely in Furius Camillus) they rid out of the cittie. Who being arrested to appeare at a day, by L. Apuleius a Tribune of the Commons, and to make answer for the saccage of Veii, and having buried about the same time his sonne, a toward young Gentleman, sent for home to his house, those of his owne tribe, his kinsfolke and followers, whereof a great part were of the Commons. And when he had founded their mindes, and received this answer from them, That they would defray and laie downe so much, as he should be condemned in: but as to acquit him, that they could not possibly. Hereupon he departed into exile: praying to the immortall gods, that as he was guiltlesse and wrongfully dealt withall, so they would with all speede, cause that unamilleus goeth into exile. M. Furius Caelius was thus expelled, who if he had garried still, (so farre as we may make reckoning of any earthly securitie) Rome could never have been woon: behold, embassadours come from the Clusines, requesting aid against the Gaules.

This nation (as it is reported) allured with the sweetnesse of corne and wine especially (dainty chaffer and a new delight in those daies) passed over the Alpes, and possessed those countries which had been aforetime by the Tuscanes inhabited. The voice goeth, that there was one Aruns, a Clusine, who had brought wine into Gaule, to entice that people withall, upon an anger and displeasure that his wife had beene deflowred by one Lucumo (whose guardian Aruns himselfe had been) a young gentleman of great might and power, and whom Aruns could not abasce, and bridle, without assistance of forreine forces: this man was the Gaules guide in passing over the Alpes, and the principall instrument to set them a worke for to assault Clusium. I would not for my part deny, but that the French were brought to Clusium by Aruns or some other Clusine: but most certaine it is, that they who assaulted Clusium, were not the first that passed the Alpes. For the Gaules two hundred yeares before they assaulted Clusium and won the cittie of Rome, came over into Italy. Neither fought the Gaules first with this nation of the Tuscanes, but long afore, and that oftentimes, with those that dwell betwene Apeninus and the Alpes.

For

For, the Tuscans had all soveraign command, both by land and sea, before the Roman Empire was erected. The names of upper and nether sea, wherewith Italie is compassed about, as it were an Island, may be a sufficient prooffe, how great and puissant they were: seeing, that the one is by the generall name of the Nation, called of the Italians, the Tuscan sea: and the other the Adriaticke of a towne or colonie of the Tuscans called Adria. The Greekes doe call the selfesame seas the ^a Tyrrhene & the Adriaticke seas. These Tuscans bending to both seas, inhabited those countries, consisting of twelve cities: having sent before on this side Apennine, toward the nether sea, and afterwards beyond the ^b Apennine, as many Colonies in number according to the princes at the first beginning, and held in possession all those parts beyond the Po unto the Alpes, except that Angle onely of the Venetians, that are seated about the gulfes of the Adriaticke sea. And doubtlesse, the nations about the Alpes, especially the Rhetians, had their beginning thus: whom the verie countrie it selfe made savage, so as they retained nothing of old, but the found of their language, and the same broken and somewhat corrupted. Now for the coming of the Gauls over into Italie, thus much we have learned. In the daies of Priscus Tarquinius king of Rome, the ^c Celtes, which are a third part of the Gauls, were under the rule of the ^d Bituriges, who chose a king over the Celtes, named Ambrigatus, a great potentate and mightie, both in regard of valour and vertue, and also of his owne private wealth and publicke weale: for that under his regiment, Gaule was so fertile of corne, and grew so populous, that the exceeding number of the people could not well be governed. This man being of great age, and desirous now to disburthen his Realme of that pestering multitude, declared that he would send Bellovesus and Sigovesus his sisters sonnes (two forward young men) to seeke adventures, into what lands sever the gods and goddesses should by their tokens direct them: giving them commission to gather what number of men they would, to the end that no nation might withstand their coming. So it fell to Sigovesus lot, for to enter the Forrest and woodland countrie of Hercinia. Bellovesus his fortune was a good deale better, to take his way (by the gods guidance) unto Italie: And he levied of the Bituriges, ^e Averni, ^f Senones, ^g Hedui, ^h Ambarri, ⁱ Carnutes, and ^k Aulerci, those that might be spared out of those countries: & setting forward with a mightie power of footmen and horlmen, came unto the ^l Tricastines. Now stood the Alpes full against them in their way, which I marvel not were thought insuperable and impassable, as having not as yet any way made over them, (so farre as anie constante record maketh date) unlesse we list to beleve the tales of Hercules. Now when as the Gauls there, were hemmed in as it were on everie side with those high mountaines, and that they looked everie way about them, how they might get over those high hills reaching up to the heavens, & so passe (as one would say) into an other world; they were staied there and went no further, upon scruple of conscience, for that it was reported, that certaine strangers seeking land to inhabite, were by the people of ^m Sallies set upon and assailed. These strangers were the ⁿ Masilians, who sailed from Phocis. This the Gauls supposing to be a fortunate oiling of their successe, helped them forward, and tooke part with them: so as what place first they gat after they were landed, they fortified within the wide or broad Forrests. They themselves passed through the countrie of ^o Taurini, and over the streights of the Alpes called ^p Iulia: and having vanquished the Tuscans in fight, not farre from the river ^q Ticinus; hearing that the countrie wherein they abode and settled, was called Insubrium (after the name of a territory and shire of the Heduians) they following and embracing the luckie name of that place, so conformable to the other of their owne, builded a citie and called it Mediolanum. Afterwards another power of Germanes with their captaine Elitovius, following the steps of the former Gauls; by the same streights (with good leave & favour of Bellovesus) passed over the Alpes, & remained there: and where now ^r Brixia & ^s Verona two towns stand (the ^t Libui then inhabited those parts) made their abode. After these, the Saluvij passed over, who expelled all the Ligurians that dwelt on this side the river ^u Ticinus, but onely the Levi, an ancient nation. After them the ^v Boij: and ^w Lingones passed over the hill ^x Peninus, dispossessed the Tuscans and the Vinbrians of their territory, yet so as they kept them within Apenninus. Then the Senones which were the last comers of these strangers, inhabited the countrie from the river ^y Vfens unto ^z Athesis. This nation I find to have come to ^a Clusium, and afterwards from thence to Rome: mary it is not certaine, whether this nation alone came, or that they were aided by all the Gauls that dwelt on this side the Alpes.

The Clusines terrified with this new warre, advising well both their number and the unaccustomed

A stomed looks, and visages of the men, which they had not seene afore, and their strange armour withall: and hearing besides that the legions of the Tuscans both on this side the Po & beyond, had bene often times by them discomfited: Albeit in the Romanes they had no interest at all in regard of any league or amitie, onely this, that they had not maintained their kinsfolke the Veientes against the Romanes, sent their Embassadors to Rome, to crave aide of the Senate. Aided they obtained none: Embassadors there were sent three, the sonnes of M. Fabius Ambustus, who in the name of the Senate and people of Rome should treat with the Gauls and persuade with them, not to set upon the confederates and friends of the people of Rome, namely, such as at whose hands they had received no wrong: saying moreover, that if they would put the Romanes to it, the Romanes were to defend them by warre: howbeit they thought it better, if it might be, to have no wars at all: but that the Gauls a new come nation should grow into knowledge and acquaintance, rather by peace than by warre. The embassage was mild and moderate enough, but the Embassadors themselves were over fierce and haiste, and more like Gauls than Romanes. VVho having done their message in the assemblie of the Gauls, were thus againe answered. Although the name of the Romanes was but of late heard of, yet they were persuaded that they were hardie men, at whose handes the Clusines in their feare, sought and requested succour. And whereas they choofe rather to defend their allies by way of embassage, than by open warre, they likewise neither disdained nor refused peace which they offered: If the Clusines would grant the Gauls (which wanted ground to inhabite) a part of their marches, whereof they held in possession more than they did well people and occupie: Otherwise, no peace would be had. And hereof would they have an answer, whiles the Romanes were in place: and if they were denied ground, they would also fight even before the Romanes face, that they might make report at home, how much the Gauls went beyond other men in valour and chivalrie. And when as the Romanes demanded againe what right they had to require ground of the owners, or to threaten warre? For what interest or title had the Gauls in Tuscanie? They againe stoutly made answere; That they caried their right in their swords point, and that valiant men were lords of all the world. So they were on both sides so set on fire, that they ran to their weapons and skirmished with the Tuscans. Then against all law of nations (a thing that hastened the destruction of the Romanie citie) the Embassadors tooke armes. Neither could this be so secret but it was known. For even before the ensignes of the Tuscans, there were sene three most noble & valiant knights of the Romanes for to fight: so farre exceeded the valor of those strangers above all the Clusines. Moreover and besides, Quintus Fabius riding out of the battaile on horsebacke, charged his lance upon the captaine of the Gauls, as he fiercely assailed the ensignes and battaile of the Tuscans, ran him through and slue him: and as he rifled and disarmed him, the Gauls tooke knowledge of him, and throughout the whole host notice was given, that it was an Embassage of the Romanes. So leaving their quarrell against the Clusines, they found the retreat, and threatened the Romanes. There were of them, that thought good presently to advance forward to Rome: but the elder sort prevailed, that there should be sent Embassadors first to complaine of the injuries, and to require that for the law of armes broken, the Fabij should be yeelded unto them. When as the Gauls Embassadors had declared their message according to their commission, the Senate nothing liked of the Fabians deed, and thought the barbarous Gauls required nothing but just and reason. Howbeit suit of friends and private respectes, would not permit to make an Act of that, in personages of so great marke and nobilitie, which they deemed meet and requisite. Therefore to the end it might not be imputed to them and they blamed, if peradventure any foile or overthrow should happen unto them, by warring with the Gauls: they referred the hearing & discussing of the Gauls demands unto the people. Where might and favour so much prevailed, that even they who were in question to be punished, were created for the year following Tribunes Militarie in Consuls authoritie. At which the Gauls being offended (as good cause they had) with open threats & menaces of warre, returned again to their companie. There were with the three Fabij, P. Sulpitius Longus, Quintus Servilius the fourth time, & P. Servilius Maluginensis. When as now so great danger was toward & neere at hand (see how fortune blindeth mens eyes, when as she will have her sway and not be hindered) that citie which against the Fidenate and Veientie enemy & other nations bordering therby, tried the utmost help, & oftentimes made a Dictatour: now being threatened with a strange enemy never heard of before, coming to war upon them from the Ocean sea and the farthest parts of the world, sought neither for governour nor helpe more than ordinary. Even those Tribunes, by whose rash dealing that war was first caused, had the managing of all: & made no more choise, nor mustering of soldiours than usually had been in common wars: making but a light matter of it and of no consequence, and setting little by, and elevating the rumour of the warre. The Gauls in the meane time having heard, how for the nonce those breakers of humane law were soone advanced to honour, and how their embassage was deluded and dalied with, all on a fire, (as they are a nation that way impatient and in anger outrageous) plucked up their standards forthwith, and marched with all expedition on their voiage. At whole noise and hurliburly (as they passed by in such hast) when as the townes thereby were put in feare, and ran to their weapons, and the countrey peasants fled away: they with open mouth gave out and signified, that they went to Rome. All the way as they journeyed, what with horse and men, both in length and breadth, they tooke up a mightie roome in their march. But what with the same that went before, and the messengers of the Clusines and of other people that followed one at the heeles of another, this speedie comming of the enemies brought right great feare and terror to Rome. For notwithstanding, that they went with a power of men in all hast sodainly mustered, hardly met they them at eleven miles end, where as the river Allia running downe from the hills of Crustumium, with a very deepe channell (not much beneath the highway) discharged it selfe into the Tyber. And now by this time the whole countrey before them, and all the coasts about were overspread with the enemies. And (as they are a nation naturally given to vain tumults and therein born & bred) with an hideous and dissonant kind of singing (like a blacke Santus) they filled all about with a fearefull and horrible noise. There the Tribunes Militarie without getting aforehand a convenient place to pitch their tentes in, without fortifying the same with any trench or rampiers, whereunto they might safely betake themselves, even without any regard of God, whom at leastwise they should have been mindfull of, if they had forgotten man, without Auspices and bird-tokens, without reconciliation to God by sacrifice, full unhappily and in an ill houre, ranged their battell divided into wings, for feare of being compassed with multitude of enemies. Yet might not the vaward answer the breadth of the enemies, norwithstanding they made their ranks and files so thin, that the middle ward of the battaille was weake, and skant joyning close together. On the right hand there was a little higher ground, where they thought to bestow men for supplie, which as it gave the first occasion of feare and running away, so was it the onely safetie of them that fled. For Brennus the Duke or prince of the Gauls, fearing exceedingly in that small number of the Romanes, some stratageme, and supposing that the higher ground was for this purpose kept: That when the Gauls should have encountered with the forefront of the legions, then the rescues would charge them both upon their backs and their flanks, displayed and advanced his standards against those in rescue: nothing doubting but if he had once driven them from their holde upon higher ground, on the plaine he should soone have the victorie, considering that in number he overwent them. See how the Barbarians had not onely lucke, but pollicie also on their sides! Contrariwise, the Romans in their camp were nothing like themselves, either for captains or souldiours. Their mindes were so possessed with feare & thinking of running away, and so forgetfull besides, that the greater part of them chose rather to flie to Veij, (their enemies citie) although the Tyber were full in their way, than to take the streight course to Rome, to their wives and children. For a while, the advantage of the ground defended those that were for rescue: but in the rest of the hoast, so soone as they that were next, heard the shout from the sides, and those that were farthest off from behind, before any stroke stricken, & before they were once touched, they fled from their unknown enemy, in a manner before they saw him. And so farre off they were from trying fight, that they answered them not so much as with a counter shout againe. So as there were not any slaine in fight. But they were killed behind at their backs, even by occasion of their own selves, who with their hurrying hindered one another in their flight. About the bancke of Tyber, whereunto the whole left wing was fled downe, and had flung away their weapons, there was a great slaughter. For many of them that could not swimme, and were weake, by reason of their weightie coslelets and other harnes, were drowned and swallowed up of the surging whirlepoles. Howbeit, the most part escaped safe to Veij. From whence there came to Rome, not onely no succour to guard the cittie, but not so much as a messenger to bring newes of this their overthrow. But from the right wing which kept farther from the river, and more under the hill, they all went to Rome. And finding not so much as the gates of the citie shut, they all fled into the castle. The very Gauls themselves

A selves astonished at so wonderfull & suddain victorie, stood still at the first in a great amaze, as who knew not what had happened, and wist not what to make of it. Afterwards they feared some ambush, and at length fell to gathering the spoiles of them that were slaine, and to lay all their armor and harnes upon heaps, as their manner is. At last, seeing no enemy nor shew of hostilitie, they put themselves in their journey forward, a little before sunsetting, & marched to the citie of Rome. Where, upon word brought by the foreriders, that the gates were not shut, nor any ward kept afore the gates, nor armed men upon the wals, they stood in the like amaze as before, upon so strange and wonderous a thing. But fearing the night & the situation of a citie unknown, they set them downe, and rested betweene Rome and Anio, having sent their espials and skouts about the wals and gates, to understand what their enemies meant to doe in so desperate a state. The Romanes, for that a greater part had taken their way to Veij, than to Rome, & weening that there was none left alive, but those that were fled backe to Rome, bewailing and bidding adieu, both to those that were dead, and those alive, set the whole citie almost a weeping and lamenting. But afterwards, the publicke feare astonished them, and tooke all sense away of their private sorowes, when they heard once that the enemies were come. And within a while, as these barbarous people coasted and ranged about the wals by troupes, they might hear their yelling, their houting, and uncouth, confused hideous cries. So were they held all the time in suspense of mind, until the second day after: one while thinking, that at their first comming they would have surprised the citie, for unlesse they had so meant, they would have taried (they thought) at Allia still: againe, a little before sunsetting (because the day was welne done) they supposed they would enter upon them before night. But anon they feared that they differed this enterprise until night was come, to the end they might strike a greater feare & terror amongst them. And last of all, the day light approaching, astonished them clean: so as they were in a continual agonie, even until the mischiefe came indeed which they so long doubted, & that now the bloodie banners of their enemies were displayed before their gates. Howbeit neither that night nor the day following, was the citie in the like feare, as when they fled so fearefully at Allia. For being past nope, that the citie could be defended with so small power as remained, they determined that with their wives & children, all their serviceable youth, such as were meet to bear arms, yea and the more able men, & strength of the Senat, should retire themselves into the castle & Capitoll: & after they had thither brought their armor and corn, from thence as from a defensible place to protect their gods, their men, and the Roman name: to save from fire and sword (so farre as they could) the Flamin of Iupiter, the vestall Nuns, & sacred images, and holy reliques of the citie: and not to abandon the worship & due solemnitie unto them, so long as any were left alive, to do them honor & worship. For thus they conceived, That if the castle and Capitoll, being the seat of their gods, if the Senate, which is the head and cheefe of their publicke counsell, if the hardie and fighting young men remained after that imminent ruine and fall of the citie, the lesse would be the losse of the aged folke, a number, (God wot) left behind of purpose in the citie, no otherwise like but to perish. And to the end that the multitude of the common sort might beare this more patiently, the elders that had triumphed aforetime, and been Consuls, openly gave out and said, That they would live and die together with them. Neither would they with those bodies of theirs which were unmeet to beare armour, and to defend the citie, surcharge and pester the companie of able & armed men, in this their penurie and want of victuals. These and such like were the consolations and comforts of the auncients among themselves, now resolute to end their lives. After which, they turned their exhortations to the companies of the young and lustie men, whom they followed into the castle and Capitoll, recommending unto their manhood and to their youthfull courage, all the estate remaining of that citie, which for the space of three hundred and threescore yeares, had in all their wars been victorious, and gotten great conquests. Now when they, in whom rested all hope and helpe, were departed, and had taken their leave of them, that resolved fully not to survive the winning and destruction of their citie: as the very thing in itselfe, and the sight thereof was a lamentable and wofull spectacle unto them, so the pittous weeping of women, and their uncertaine running up and downe, following now after one, and now after another: and asking their husbands and children, to what end, to what fatall destinie they betooke them, was as dolorous a pageant, as could happen to any earthly creature. Nevertheless, a great sort of them accompanied their friends into the castle, & no man either bad or forbid them. For although it was good and commodious for the besieged, namely, to diminish the number and discharge themselves of the feeble multitude, yet it seemed unto them an inhumane and unkind part. The rest of the common people especially, whom so small an hill was not able to receive, & could not possibly be kept in so great scaritie of corne and victuals, departed by heapes out of the citie: and marching as it were in one companie together in a row, tooke their way to Ianiculum. From thence they devided themselves sundrie waies. Some slipt into the fields and countrie, some to the next cities there bordering, without any captaine, without any common consent: every one following his owne hope, his owne head and wit, now that all publicke counsell was in despaire and past remedie. In this meane while, the Flamin of Quirinus, and the religious Vestall virgines leaving the regard of their owne private affaires, consulted with themselves what sacred Images to carrie with them, and (seeing their strength would not serve to rid away and save all) what to leave behind them, and what place was meetest to bestow and lay them up most safely. They agreed at length and thought it best, to put them in small barrells or rundelets, and within the ground to burie them in a litle chappell, standing next to the Flamines house: which place for very devotion unto this day, may not for any thing, be spit upon. At the rest they parted amongst themselves. And every one carying her owne burden, tooke the way, which over the wodden bridge leadeth to Ianiculum. Upon the ascent or rise of that hill, when L. Albinus (a Commoner of Rome) saw them going, as he among other companie (which unmeet for warre, departed out of the citie) caried his wife and children in a waine: he making even then in that hard calamitie, a difference yet between divine and humane things, and thinking it an impious part, and void of all religion, that the publicke priests with the sacred Images of the people of Rome should go on foot, while he and his, were seene riding at ease in a wagon, caused his wife and children to alight and come forth, and set the Nuns with their holy Images in their roomes, and brought them to Carre, to which place they minded to goe. All things now being set at Rome (as in such a time could be) in order sufficiently, for the defence of the castle; the aged persons above said being returned to their houses, waited for the coming of the enemy, with hearts prepared and resolved to die. Such of them as had borne offices of the chaire, to the intent, that they might end their daies in the ornaments and robes of their former estate and honour, and according to their vertue and deserts: in their most stately garments and habiliments, which they wore when they caried their sacred chariots upon feastivall daies, or wherein they rode in triumph, now sat upon their yvorie chaires in the very mids and entrie of their houses. There be that write, how they willingly devowed and bequeathed themselves to die for their countrie and citizens of Rome: and that M. Fabius the high priest read and pronounced unto them a certaine hymne & prescript some of praier, to that purpose. The Gauls, both for that now they had rested from fight a whole night, and so their choler was somewhat cooled, and also because they had not in any place fought a bloudie and dangerous battell with them, nor even at that time was the citie by any assault or force, entred the morrow after into the citie, without anger and heat of furious rage, by the gate Collina, standing wide open, and so passed forward to the common place of assemblies, casting their eyes about them towards the temples of the gods, and to the castle, which onely presented some shew of warre. And there leaving a sufficient guard, least happily from the castle and Capitoll they should be violently assaulted, after they were once asunder parted, they fell to ransacke and rife: and meeting none at all in the void streetes, some rush by heapes into the houses next hand, others goe to those that were furdlest off, supposing them at leastwise to be untouched, full of riches, and fit for to fill their hands. From thence againe (as frightened by reason of such desolation, and fearing least haply any fraud of the enemy might entrap them as they wandered one from another) they returned round in a ring together, into the market-sted, and the places neere thereto. Where, when they saw the Commoners houses fast shut to & locked, & contrariwise the stately palaces of the Noblemen and chiefe Senators standing wide open, they were at a stand, and doubted more in a manner to enter upon the open places, than the shut. And they beheld as it were with capping and crouching after a reverend manner, certaine ancient personages sitting in the porches and entries of their houses, who besides their ornaments and apparrell, above the ordinarie estate of men, for a certaine majestie which they carried in their countenance and gravitie of visage, resembled the gods. And when as they turned to them, and stood looking upon them, as if they had bene Idols and sacred Images; M. Papyrius, one of them, when a Gaul began to stroke his beard (which then they used all to weare long) with his yvorie Itasse (as they say) gave him a rap on the pate, and mooved his patience. Whereupon hee was the first

- A first that was murdered, and so the rest were: all killed as they sat in their chaires of estate. After this massaker of the honourable personages of the Nobilitie, they fell upon all the rest and spared no creature: they ransacked their houses, and when they were empty set fire on them. But whether it were that they were not all of them desirous to destroy the citie utterly, or that it was the minde of the leaders and chiefe of the Gauls, that for a terrour there should be seene some scaresfires (if happily for the love of their houses, they that were besieged, might be induced to yeeld themselves:) or that all their houses were not burned at once, to the end that the remainder of the citie might be as a pawne and pledge to mollifie their enemies and make their hearts to relent; howsoever, I say it was, the fire for the first daie (as usually in cities forced and woon) spread not all abroad every where, to make a generall havocke. The Romanes from their Castle, seeing the citie full of enemies, and in every streete running up and downe, and in all places fresh calamities and miseries one in the neck of another, were not able to conceive the same in minde and spirit, no nor so much as to have the right use of their eares and eyes. For to what place so ever the shoutes and dinne of the enemies, the howling and wailing of women and children, the noise of fire and the rattling and cracking downe-falls of houses turned them aside in exceeding feare, thither they bent their mindes their faces and eyes, as men by fortune set up a loft, as upon a stage or scaffold, to behold the fall and ruine of their countrie: reserved to save nothing of all their haviour and substance, but onely their own bodies: by thus much, more miserable and pittifull above all others that ever were besieged, in that being shut out from their native countrie and citie, they were besieged and beheld it, and all that they had, in the enemies hands. Neither, as ill as the day was spent, followed there a better night. Yea and when after this troublesome night the like morrow was come, there was no time, but minitied still some heaveie object: and one spectacle or other of new and fresh calamities. And albeit they were laden and overwhelmed with so many miseries, yet they nothing at all let fall or abated their courages, but resolved still, notwithstanding they saw all fired, all ruinate & laid even with the ground, manfully to defend that poore naked little hill which they held, and was their only hope left them to recover their freedome. And now seeing the same desolations daily happen, they were so injured to miserie, that past all sense and feeling of their owne state and privat fortune, they regarded nothing but their armour on their backs and swords in their hands, as the only remnants & reliques of their hope. The Gauls likewise for certaine daies, had made warre with the poore houses onely of the citie, and all to no purpose: and when they perceived in all this burning and ruines of the citie so conquered nothing now left but armed enemies, who were not, for all so many calamities, one jot terrified, nor their mindes once inclined to yeeld without further force and violence were used; they determine to trie the uttermost, and to make an assault upon the fortress. So on the morrow morning very early at sound of trumper, all the whole multitude of them, arranged themselves in the market place. From whence with an outcrie and shout, under a fence of targets over their heads, they approach the Castle. Against whome, the Romanes behaved themselves, neither unadvisedly, nor fearefully, strengthening their wards and quarters, with a good Corps de guard against all Advenues: and whereas they saw the banners displayed, that way they opposed their strongest guardes: and suffered the enemies to climbe up the hill, supposing that the higher they were got up, so much the easilier they might be beaten downe. And being come up to the midst of the cliffe, there they staid: and thence from the higher ground, which of it selfe in manner bare out against the enemy, with all their force they charged upon the Gauls, and overturned them, and sent them downe headlong: so as never after that, either any part of them, or all together would attempt that kinde of service. Being therefore past hope to get up by force and armes, they make preparation for long siege: whereof untill that time they had no minde: both for that the corne which was within, they had consumed in burning of the citie, and in the meane space, that which was in the countrie about, was carried and brought to Veij. Whereupon they devided their armie, purposing with one part thereof, to forrey and drive booties all about the nations thereby adjoining, and with the other to invest the Castle: to the end, that the forragers abroad might bring in corne to serve them that lay at the siege. Nowe as those Gauls departed from the citie, it was their hap and fortune to come to Ardea (where Camillus aboad in exile) there to make triall of the Romanes valour. This Camillus being more pensive in the behalfe of the publicke calamitie, than carefull of his owne: spending his spirits and wasting his bodie with crying out, upon gods and men: thus fretting and chafing with himselfe, selfe, and wondering what was become of those valiant and hardie men, who under his conduct wan Veij and Falernj, and who had fought other warres more valiantly alwaies than fortunately:

 of a fodaine he heard that the armie of the Gaules approched, and that the Ardeates in great feare, fell to consultation thereabout, what to doe: and even as if he had beene inspired from God above, he put himselfe forward and entred into the midst of the people assembled, who heretofore, had abstained and forbore such publike meetings and consultations. And thus he said: You my Masters of Ardea, mine olde friends sometime, and now my new neighbours and fellow citizens, for so it is fallen out by your kindnesse and deserts, and by mine owne fortune and condition: let no man thinke, that I, forgetfull of mine owne estate, am come forth hither into this audience. But the present object and publike danger forceth every man to utter and bring forth in so fearefull a time and businesse as this is, what helpe he can. And when shall I ever bee thankfull unto you for your favours and demerits, if now I stand still and do nothing? Or where shall I ever stand you in steede, if not in warre? By my skill herein, I flourish in my countrie, and being in warre invincible, was in peace by unthankfull neighbours and unkinde citizens banished. And now have yee good occasion offered and opportunitee (O yee Ardeates) both to make recompence, for those to great pleasures and curesies in times past received of the people of Rome, as your selves doe well remember, (and therefore be it spoken without upbraiding and reproching of any mindfull persons) and also to winne great honour of warre, unto this citie, by defeating a common enemie unto both. This nation, which thus commeth towards us with a dissolute and disordered armie, are those to whome God and nature hath given bodies more big and corpulent than strong and able, hearts more stout and courageous than constant and resolute: whereby they bring with them alwaies into the field more shew of terror, than true valour and execution. Whereof, the late foile and discomfiture of the Romanes may be a sufficient prooffe and triall. They woon the citie when the gates stood open unto them: a small power from the Caffe and Capitoll was able to withstand and repell them. And wearie alreadie of the tediousnesse of siege, they are faine to depart, stragling up and down, and wandring along the countrie. Their manner is when they have filled their bellies with wine and good victuals, (which they devour full greedily and hastily whersoever they can come by it:) so soone as night commeth on, without any place of defence, without watch or ward, to lay themselves along like bruit beasts, here and there by the waters sides. And now upon their good successe, are they more secure and retchlesse, than they were wont to be. If ye be disposed to defend your wals, and not all to turne French, gather your selves together, and at the first watch of the night, Arme, and to your weapons: Follow me to a massaker and not to a skermish: for if I doe not deliver them unto your hands fast a sleep to be hewen in pieces like sheep & oxen, I refuse not to see the same end of mine estate at Ardea, that I have found alreadie at Rome. There was not one there, however affected he was, friend or fo to Camillus, but was perswaded that the like warrior was not in those daies to be found againe. The assembly being broken up, they refresh their bodies, readie to fight so soone as ever the Signall should be propounded. Which being put forth, in the beginning and first watch of the night, they were readie with Camillus at the gates. And gone they were not farre from the towne, but they found (as it was foretold them) the Gaules camp without Corps de guard, neglected on every side: and it with a mightie crie they assaile. There was in no place fight, but killing every where: and their naked bodies (as they lay fast a sleepe) were hacked and curin pieces. Howbeit, some of those that were furthest off, being feared out of their couches, not knowing what violence or from whence it was, tooke to their heels and fled: other-some stumbled at unawares upon the very enemie. A great part of them being come into the ter-ritorie of Ardea, were by the townesmen, who sallied out upon them as they were dispersed, environed and slaine. The like slaughter to this, there was of the Tuscans in the countrie of Veij: who had so little pittie and compassion, to see a citie which well neare for foure hundred yeare space bordering upon them, was now surprisid by a strange enemie not heard of afore, that even at that very time, they made rodes into the territorie of Rome, and laden with bootie from thence, purposed to assaile even Veij also and the garrison, being the onely place and means of rescue, and the last hope of the Romane name. The Romane soldiours that lay in garrison there, had espied these Tuscans raunging about the countrie, and gathered together in a plump to drive booties afore them: and withall they desired their campe pitched not farre from Veij.
 Where, at first they pittied their owne estate, but after, they fell into an indignation & anger that

A the Tuscans also, from whom they had diverted the Gaules warre upon themselves, should in their calamities thus scorne them and have them in derision: so as they could scarcely temper themselves and forbear, but presently set upon them. But being staid perforce by captain Ceditius a Centurion whome they themselves had made their ruler, they put off this exploit untill night. Onely their Commander and leader, was not to be compared with Camillus: els all the service was achieved in the same order, and with as good speede and happie successe.
 Over and besides, by the guidance and direction of those prisoners which remained unslaine over night, they went forward as farre as Salinae, to another power of the Tuscans, and in the night following, upon a suddaine they made a greater havock and slaughter of them, and so in ioyous manner with double conquest they returne to Veij. At Rome in this meane time, the siege for the most part was but cold and slack, and all quiet on both sides: whiles the Gaules regarded and looked to this only, That none of their enemies should make an escape through their guards. At what time a certaine valiant yong Romane behaved himselfe so, as his own countrimen and enemies too, had him in great admiration. There was a set sacrifice or solemnitie to be celebrated by the house and lineage of Fabij, in the mount Quirinalis. For the accomplishment wherof, Caius Fabius Dorsuo in his holy robes after the Gabines fashion, bearing in his hand the holy complements thereto belonging, came down from the Capitol, passed through the mids of the enemies corps de gard, and nothing moved whatsoever was done or said to terrifie him, went on forth right to the mount Quirinal. And when he had there performed and dispatched all solemnities, returning the same way with like constant countenance and comelie pace, hoping assuredlie, that the gods would be merciful & gracious unto him, whose worship he had not left undone for any fear of death: he retired againe to his companie into the capitoll: whether it were that the Gaules were astonied at his wonderous boldnes, or rather were touched in conscience with a reverent regard of religion, wherein that nation is verie zealous and devout. At Veij in the meane while, they gathered not onlie heart everie day more than other, but strength & forces also: for that not onlie Romanes thither repaired out of the countrie, such as either in discomfiture of the battaile, or for the calamitie of the citie now taken, had beene scattered: but also out of Latium divers of their owne accord had flocked thither, to have their share in the pillage. Now they thought it high time to returne to their countrie againe, and to deliver it out of the enemies hands. The bodie was strong enough, but without an head it was. The verie place put them in D, mind of Camillus, and a great part of the soldiours were such as had atchieved prosperous ex-ploites under his leading & conduct. And Ceditius gave out plainly, that no god or man should make him give over his governement, but would himselfe as mindfull of his own place, call for a Generall. So by general consent it was agreed, that Camillus should be sent for from Ardea, but with the advice before of the Senate which was at Rome. So modest were they in all their cariage, and so precisely observed they (even in this their desperate case) the due respect and regard of everie action. Now to passe through the wards of their enemies, was an hard and dangerous adventure. To this exploit therefore, Pontius Cominius, a valerous yong man, promised his service. Who bearing himselfe upon a barke or corke under him, hulled along the Tyber downe the water to the citie; and so the next way from the strond, over a steepe cliffe (which was negligently or not at all garded by the enemie) he passeth through the Capitoll, and being E brought to the magistrates, declareth there his message from the armie. When he had received the Senats decree to this effect: Imprimis, That Camillus should be called back againe out of exile by a Ward-leet, or the suffrages of the Curia: Item, that by the voices of the people he should be created Dictator out of hand: and that the soldiours might have for their Generall whom they desired: the messenger returned the same way backe againe to Veij. And embassadours were sent to Camillus at Ardea, who conducted him to Veij. But I would rather beleeve, that he departed not from Ardea, before he had certaine intelligence of the A& of the Senate. And for that neither without the will of the people, he might change the place wherto he was confined, nor un-lesse he were named Dictatur, have the conduct of the armie; there passed an A& of all the F wards, and Dictatur was he declared in his absence. Whiles these things were a doing at Veij, the cattle of Rome and the capitoll was in verie great danger. For the Gauls, either having found out a mans footing, that way as the messenger went from Veij, or espied at the cliffe of Carmen- tis, an easie place to climbe up: in a cleere night sent a man before unarmed to assay the passage, and than gave him up his armour, and where it was steepe, one helped, lifted up, and drew up an other, as the difficultie of the place required. So as they got up to the top with such silence, that not onely the Sentinels were not ware of them; but also the dogs (a watchfull creature at everie noise in the night) were not once awakened therewith. But they could not so escape the geefe, which were consecrated unto Iuno, and for all the scarcitie of victuals, were spared and not killed up. And this it was that saved them all. For with their gagling and fluttering of their wings, M. Manlius, who three yeares before had been Consul, a right hardie & noble wariour, was awaked. Who taking weapon in hand, speedily went forth and raised the rest withall to take armes. And whiles all else made hast in a great fright, he strooke the Gaule who now stood upon the top, with the hofse and pike of his buckler, and turned him downe. The fall of whom overthrew them that were next. Then slew he others, (whiles they were in feare) who had laid their weapons out of hand, and tooke hold of the stones wherto they clinged close. By which time, the rest being come together, some flinging darts, others casting downe stones, tumbled their enemies backe, and the whole power of them lost their sure footing and fell downe headlong. This tumult being appeased, the rest of the night (so farre forth as men might with troubled minds, seeing that even the danger past disquieted them) they gave themselves to sleepe. When day was come, the soldiours by sound of trumpet were summoned to assemble before their Tribunes, and considering there was reward due both to well doing and misdoing: Manlius first for his valour was commended and rewarded, not only by the Tribunes militarie but also by consent of all the soldiours. Upon whom, they amongst them all, bestowed and brought home to his house (which stood upon the cattle hill) wheat meale by the halfe pintes, and wine by the quartes. A matter of small reckoning to be spoken of: but in that scarcitie, this might be an argument of their love and affection, when everie man beguiled his owne belly, plucked from himselfe and the necessities of his life, and conferred the same to the honour and recompence of that one man. Then were summoned to appeare the sentinels of that place where the enemy climbed up undescried. And whenas P. Sulpitius a Tribune Militarie, had pronounced that he would exercise martiall law upon them all, the soldiours cried out with open mouth, and laid all the fault on one watchman: and so for feare of a mutinie he spared all the the rest: and with their generall consent and approuse, he caused that undoubted guiltie person to be throwne downe from the rocke. Whereupon they were more careful and circumspect in their watch, both amongst the Gaules (because it was commonlie noised that there passed messengers too and fro betweene Veij and Rome:) & also amongst the Romanes, for the remembrance of the late danger by night. But above all other miseries that follow warre and siege, the famine was fore in both the armies. The Gaules were plagued with pestilence besides: for that they had pitched their tentes in a place lying between two hills; exceeding hote by reason of the fires, and full of smoake, carying both dust and ashes, when any wind was stirring: which be things that of all others, that nation can not abide, as being used to wet and cold. Thus being smudged with heat, and therewith stifled and choked againe, they died with contagious diseases like rotten sheepe. And now for idlenes that they would not burie them severally one by one, they laid the dead bodies on heaps one with another, and so burnt them: and made that place famous and notable by the name of Busta Gallica. Hereupon, they grew to make some truce with the Romanes, and emparled together by sufferance of the Generals. In which parties, whenas the Gaules estoones alleadged the famine, and upon that extremitie perswaded them to yeeld: it is said, that the Romanes for to put them by that opinion of them, in many places from the capitoll flong out loaves of bread into the verie stations and corps de guard of the enemies. But at length neither could their hunger be dissembled, nor sustained any longer. Therefore, whiles the Dictatour mustereth a power at Ardea by himselfe, he commaundeth the Generall of horsemen, L. Valerius, to have away the armie from Veij: and maketh so good preparation, & furnisheth himselfe so, as he might be able to match his enemies, and to charge upon them. In the meane season, the armie of the Capitoll wearied out with watching and warding, having surmounted all humane miseries besides hunger, which onely of all others, nature would not suffer to be overcome: looking day by day for succour from the Dictatour, now at the last when not onely their food, but their hope also failed them, and were grown to that weaknesse, that when they went to keepe their gard, they could hardly beare the weight of their armour, they agreed and gave consent either to yeeld or to ransom themselves vpon any condition, they cared not what. While the Gaules also gave forth plainly, and said, they might be entreated for a small consideration to give over siege. Then the Senate went together, and

A and gave commission to the Tribunes Militarie, to bargain and goe through with them. So by a parley or treatie had betweene P. Sulpitius Tribune Militarie, and Brennus the Duke of the Gaules, a conclusion was made, and that people, who within a short time should bee lords of the world, were valued and esteemed at a * thousand pound weight of gold. This in itselfe was a most odious and shamefull thing, but there was adjoined thereunto a foule indignitie. For the Gaules brought forth false weights and uneven ballance. And when the Tribune refused them, behold, the insolent and proud Gaule would needs have his sword weighed too for vantage, adding this speech moreover (which was intollerable for the Romanes to heare) We worth men conquered, and downe with them still. But neither God nor man would abide the Romanes to live ransomed. For by good hap, before that shamefull summe of monie by composition was paid, before (I say) that upon some wrangling that fell betwene, all the gold was weighed out, commeth the Dictatour in the manner, and commandeth the gold to be had away, and the Gaules to void. And when as they made resistance and pleaded the capitulation & bargain, hee againe replieth and saith, That the composition was not good, nor ought to stand, which after hee was made Dictatour, had been by an inferior Magistrate concluded, without his commandement and warrant: and withall warneth the Gaules to prepare themselves to fight: commanding his owne soldiours, to cast all their bag and baggage downe on a heape, to put on their harness, to make readie their weapons, and by dint of Steele, and not by weight of gold to redeem their countrie, having in sight before their eies, the churches of their gods, their wives and children, and the soile whereon the citie stood (deformed now with miseries of warre) and all things els which they ought by good reason to defend, recover, and be revenged for. Hereupon he marshalleth his battaile as the ground would give him leave, being the plot onely of a citie halfe ruinate and lying along, and withall of it selfe naturally uneven. Forcassing and providing for all things with especiall choice and preparation to serve his soldiours turne, as farre as martiall skill could possible reach. The Gaules affrighted at this strange an occurrent, betooke them to their weapons, and in a furious fit of anger, rather than with any considerate discretion, they ran upon the Romanes. Now had fortune turned her wheele: now Gods helpe and mans pollicie assisted the Romanes. Therefore at the first encounter the Gaules were discomfited with as little difficultie, as they themselves had achieved the victory at Allia. Afterwards also, in another more set battaile in the way of Gabes, about eight miles from Rome (to which place they were fled) they were vanquished by the conduct and leading of the same Camillus. For there were they slaine in every place, their campe taken, and not so much as one left to bring news of their overthrow. The Dictatour having thus delivered his countrie out of the enemies hand, returneth againe with triumph into the citie. And in all the sports and pleasant ditties which the soldiours rudely after their manner devised, he was stiled Romulus the father of the countrie, the second founder of the cittie, which were no vaine titles of commendation.

When he had saved his countrie thus in warre, he preserved it afterwards againe undoubtedly in time of peace, namely, in gainsaying their transmigration to Veij: whiles both the Tribunes enforced that matter more earnestly, now after the burning of the citie, and the Commons also of themselves were more enclined therunto, than before. Which was one cause, that after his triumph he resigned not up his Dictatorship: being requested also by the Senat not to leave the citie in so doubtfull tearmes of perplexitie. And first and formost (as hee was evermore a most precise devout man and religious) hee proposed those things which concerned the immortall gods: and causeth an act of the Senate to be made. Imprimis, that all the temples (for that the enemies had held and possessed them) should be repaired, bounded out new, and purged. Item, that the manner of cleansing them, should be searched out of the bookes of Sibylla by the Dumvirs. Moreover, that with the inhabitants of Cære, there should be made a league of publicke and mutuall hospitalitie, for receiving the sacred Images and priests of the people of Rome: by the meanes and favour of which people, the honour and service of the immortall gods was not forelet and discontinued. Item, That there should be set out the Plaies called Sibyllini, for that Jupiter Optimus Maximus had still defended and preserved his owne seat, and the Keepe of the people of Rome, in that feartull time of trouble. And that M. Furius should ordain a guild, or fraternitie out of those that dwelt in the hill of the capitoll, for the celebration of those plaies. Finally, to the end there should be also some satisfaction & expiation made of that night voice which being being the fore-messenger and warning-giver of their destruction before the coming of the Gaules, was heard and yet neglected, a motion was made, that a temple should be erected in the new cauley to Aius Locutius. The gold which was recovered by force from the Gaules, as also that which out of other temples in that fearefull medley, was brought into the chancell or chapel of Iupiter, because they could not call to mind precisely into which churches, they were to carrie it againe accordingly, was all judged holie, and sacred to Iupiter; and order taken, that it should be bestowed and laid up under his thrine. And how devout the citie was, appeared before in this, That when there was not gold ynough in the common chest, to make up the full summe of the ranfome that was agreed upon betweene them and the Gaules, they tooke that which the matrons & wives of Rome contributed, and all to spare and save the gold appointed to holy uses. The matrons were therefore thanked, and this honour besides done unto them, That after their death they as well as their husbands, should be openly praised in a solemne funerall Oration. When those things were once accomplished which pertained to the gods, and all done that belonged to the Senate for to doe: then and not afore, upon the stirres that the Tribunes kept with the Commons continually, with their speeches in all their assemblies, solliciting them to leave the ruines of the citie, and to remoove with all they had to Veij, a towne readily furnished to their hand: then I say and not before, Camillus accompanied with the whole Senate, came up into the common place of audience, & there before the people spake in this wise. So grievous to me, o Quirites, is all contention and variance with the Tribunes of the Commons, that while I lived at Ardea, I found no other comfort and solace, in that most heavie & wofull banishment of mine but this, That I was farre ynough off from those debates and jarres. In regard whereof, I would never have come againe I assure you, but that you called me backe, both by Act of Senate and also by approbation of the people. And it is not in me any change of mind, but your calamitie and distressed estate, that hath forced me to returne againe unto you. For this was the verie point that you stood upon, namely that our countie might continue still and keepe her ancient place: and not ywis, that I should remaine and dwell therein againe. And even now verily, would I be still and keepe silence willingly, but that this quarrell also is in the behalfe of my foresaid countie: the which to saile (so long as life doth last) for others might be a shamefull reproach, but for Camillus it were most impious and abhominable. For to what end have we returned to it again? To what purpose, when it was besiged have we delivered it out of the enemies hands, if when we have recovered it, we our selves abandon and leave the same? And when as the gods and men of Rome kept still, and inhabited the Capitoll and the castle, notwithstanding the Gaules were lords, and possessed of the whole citie, is it possible that both castle and capitoll, after the citie is regained, should be forsaken and abandoned of the Romane victors? And shall our prosperous hand over our enemies bring greater desolation to our citie, than adversity hath? Verlie if it were so, that we made no reckning of that religion and divine solemne service, instituted even with the foundation of our citie: and that we counted all vanities that have beene delivered unto us by tradition from our ancestors: yet so evident a power of God hath assisted the Romanes, that I must needs thinke, that men can now no longer neglect the worship of God. For consider with me I pray you, either the prosperitie or the adversitie of these yeares late past, one after another. Ye shall find, that as long as we served God and followed his will, so long we prospered and went forward: and all the while that we despised the same, we ever went backward and fel to decay. And first and foremost the Veient war (recount I beseech you) how many yeares lasted it? how troublefome and painfull was it? And ended it was not, before that by the direction, on and advertisement of the gods, the water was let out of the Albane poole? What shall I speake of this late and strange calamitie of our owne citie? Began it (and say truth) before that voice which came from heaven was made so light off, concerning the coming of the Gaules? before the law of nations was by our Embassadours broken? and before that through the same neglect of the gods, that fact was by us winked at and put up, which indeed should have beene punished and revenged? This was the cause that wee were vanquished, made captive, put to our ranfome, and suffered such condigne punishment both at Gods hand and at mans, as that we are made an example and ensigment to the whole world. Then our adversitie and affliction put us in mind of our religion, and the feare of the gods. We fled into the capitall to the gods, even to the verie seat of Iupiter Optimus Maximus: and when our owne private estate went to havocke, the sacred monuments yet and holy Images, some we hid in the earth, some we conveyed

M. Furius Camillus to the

away into the neighbour townes, and remooved them out of our enemies sight. And albeit we were forlorne and given over both of God and men, yet gave not wee over nor discontinued the service of the gods. And therefore gave they us our countie againe, they gave us victorie, and the ancient honour of war which we had lost: and upon our enemies heades, who (blinded with covetousnes) in the weighing of gold brake both covenant and fidelitie, they have turned all fearfulness, all flight & slaughter. Considering then o Quirites, by these so great & apparent signes and testimonies in the course of this world, what it is to serve God, and what it is to dishonor him: perceive ye not what wickednes we go about to plunge our selves into, being scarcely gotten forth and escaped out of the shipwracke and perill of our former sinne and calamitie? A citie we have founded and built, by the will of God and due observation of Argurie and Auspices; no corner therein, but full of religion, full of divine majestie: and for solemne sacrifices, there are sett daies when they shall be celebrated, there are places also appointed where in they ought to be performed. And are ye about then, o Quirites, to leave all these gods both publike and privat? How forgeth this deed of yours with that, which lately during the time of the siege, was seene with no lesse admiration of our enemies, than our owne selves in that Noble young Gentleman C. Fabius? when through the pikes of the Gaules, he departed out of the Castle, and performed a solemne dutie of the house of Fabius, even upon the mount Quirinal? What? can ye allowe and like that the sacred ceremonies of private families, should not so much as in time of war be intermitted: and suffer now the publike sacrifices and the Romane gods, in time of peace to be neglected, and the citie abandoned? That our high priests and Flamines should be lesse curious and precise in the publike service of God: than a private citizen was in the Anniversarie feast of his familie and kindred? But peradventure some one may say, We will do the same at Veij, or we will send from thence our priestes hither, for to execute that ministerie. Neither of which can be done, saving the due observance of holy ceremonies. For, to say nothing in generall of all other holydaies, and of all the gods besides; In that one high feast and solemne dinner of Iupiter, can a Pulvinar be celebrated, or a sacred Table be spread and furnished in any place, but in the Capitoll? What should I speake of the eternall fires of Vesta? and of that image, which as a paunc and securitie of our imperiall state, is kept within the safeguard of that Temple? What should I speake of those your Ancilia and Scutcheans? O Mars Gradivus, and thou father Quirinus: are ye well contented that all these festivall and sacred solemnities, which are all of equal time with the citie, yea and of more antiquitie (some of them) than the foundation of the citie, should be forsaken in a profane place? But see what ods there is betweene us and our aunceltors? They left unto us certaine solemne feasts and sacrifices to be celebrated in the Albane mountaine and in Lavinium. Was it then, a matter of conscience and religion, that some festivall solemnities were brought unto us from our enemies cities to Rome? And shall we translate the same from hence to our enemies citie Veij, without a great and heinous offence, that would require expiation? Doe but call to minde I pray you, how often our feastes and sacrifices have beene renewed and reformed cleane, for that some one olde accustomed ceremonie, either by chance or for want of taking heede, hath been overslipped and left out. And even of late, what was it els that (after the strange miracle of the Albane Poole) releevd our common-weale so distressed with the Veient warre, but the reformation of our divine service, and renewing of our Auspices? And more than this, we as it were in remembrance of antique religion and devotion, have both brought unto Rome foreine gods, and also have instituted and devised new. What a notable and festivall day was that (in regard of the exceeding zeale and forward affection of the matrons) upon which Queene Luna late translated from Veij, was dedicated in Aventine? And to Aius Locutius, for a voice from heaven heard in the new cauley, we caused a Temple to be erected. The Capitoline plaies have we added to other solemne feasts, and thereto we have ordained and founded a new Guild or Fraternitie, even by the advice of the Senat. And what need was there, that we should have done any of these thinges, if we meant, together with the Gaules, to leave the citie of Rome? If we abode not in the Capitoll (so many moneths whiles we were besieged) willingly & without constraint? And if we were for feare of our enemies, held back from going els whither? Thus much of our festivall daies and Temples. But what shall become now? I pray you, of our priests? Never thinke ye once of it, what a finfull deed you are about? As for those Vestall Virgines and Nuns, it is certaine, this is their onely place, forth of which nothing ever could drive them but the winning of the citie. The Flamine of Iupiter may not lie forth of the citie cittie one night: and will ye make these priests, of Romanes to become Veientians? And shall thy virgins indeed, o Vesta, leave thee now? and shal the Flamine dwelling in a strange place, for every night he is absent, taint with so great impietie, both himselfe and the common-wealth? As for other matters, which we doe with great solemnitie by the direction of the Augurs (and al well nere within the Pomerie or compasse of the cittie) howe can we forget or neglect them? Namely the wardleet or assembly of the Curie for matters of warre: also the other of Centuries, wherein ye chuse your Consuls and Militarie Tribunes, where can they be held (if we respect the will of the gods & regard the Auspices) but in the places accustomed? Shall we remove all these to Veij? or shall the people repaire hither from thence with so great trouble and inconvenience, to a desolate cittie, forsaken of God and man, whensoever they would hold those assemblies? But the present necessitie (they will say) forceth us to leave a towne that is wasted with fire and wholly ruinate, and to go to Veij, where all stands safe and sound, and not to put the poore Commons to the toile and charge of new building. That, this is a pretence and cause rather devised, than meant in earnest, if I should say nothing, I thinke appeareth manifestly unto you alreadie, o Quirites, who remember that before the coming of the French men, whiles your publike buildings and privat houses were whole, and whiles the cittie stood upright on foote, this selfe-same motion was made and debated, as touching the removing to Veij. Consider now yee Tribunes what difference there is betweene mine opinion and yours: ye are of minde, that if it had not then been meet to be done, yet now verely it were good and requisite: I contrariwise (but marveile not I pray you before you heare what I wil say) am of opinion that albeit we might have then gone, whiles our whole cittie flourished, yet now we were not to leave it thus ruinate & decayed. For at that time we had some cause to remove into a conquered cittie, namely Victorie, a glorious thing to our selves and our posteritie: but this removing now, were reprochfull and shamefull to our selves, but glorious and honourable to the Gaules. For we shall not be thought to have left our countrie as conquerors, but to have lost it as conquered. And shall it be said that our running away at Allia, the winning of our cittie, the besieging of the Capitoll, hath imposed this necessitie upon us, as to leave our house and home and to make shifts, to seeke our own exile and departure out of that place which we were not able to defend? And were, indeed, the Gaules able to pull downe and rase that cittie of Rome, which the Romanes shall not be thought able to reedifie and set up again? What remaineth now, in case they should come upon us afeish, with a new power of men, (for certaine it is that their multitude is incredible) and were willing to dwell here in this cittie by them conquered, and by you abandoned; but that ye gently permit and suffer them? Nay, What and if not the Gaules, but your old enemies the Aequians and the Volscians would remove & come to Rome, would you be willing to have them become Romanes, and your selves Veientians? Would ye not rather, that this desert and wast ground as it lieth, were yours, than to be a cittie peopled by your enemies? For I cannot see, I assure you, whether of the twain, were more to be detested. And because (forsooth) ye are loth to fall to building, are ye resolved to abide these mischiefs & these shameful reproches? If throughout the whole cittie theremight not be built a more commodious or stately house, than is that cottage there, of our founder, were it not better to dwell in cottages like shepheards & pezants, so it be among your sacred monuments and household gods, than all at once generally to go into exile? Our auncettors & forefathers being a medley of divers countries, & no other than heardmen, finding in these parts nothing but woods & bogs, in a short time built a new cittie out of the ground: and are we loth, having yet our Capitoll, our castle safe, the Temples of our gods standing stil, to reedifie it now, that it is burnt. That which every one of us would have done, if our houses had been fired, refuse we altogether to do in the common skarefire of the cittie? Give me leave a little. What & if by some vilanie, or by mischance there should be a skarefire at Veij, and by reason of the wind (as it is often scene) the flame spread and catch, and so consume a great part of the cittie, shall wee goe from thence by and by, and seeke to Fidenæ or Gabij, or some other citie neere at hand, to remove unto? Is the very native soile of our countrie, and this ground which wee call our mother, of no power at all to keepe us here, but doth the whole love and affection of our countrie, rest in the superficiall outside, and in the timber and rafters of our houses? Verily, confesse I will unto you (although I take lesse pleasure to remember the wrongs you did mee, than the calamitie which I endured) when I was absent and in exile, so often as I thought of my countrie, all these things ran in my mind: the hills, the plaine, the Tybre, the coasts all about, which was my daily prospect, and

A this aire, under which I was borne and brought up. All which, o Quirites, let them move you rather now with an affection to them for to tarie still in this your habitation, than disquiet you hereafter and torment you for the wait and misse of them, when you have once left & forgone them. Not without good cause both God and man chose this place for the building of this cittie: most healthie and holefome hills: a verie convenient and commodious river; to bring in come and other fruits out of the inland parts, to receive provision and other victuals from the sea coasts: the sea it selfe neare enough for commodities, and not exposed and open by too much nearness to the dangers of forraigne navies: the verie heart and centre of all Italie, a place as a man would say naturally made, and only for that citie to grow and increase in. And that doth the verie largenesse and greatnesse of a cittie so newly founded, plainly prove. It is now three hundred B threescore and foure yeares, and not above, since the foundation thereof, o Quirites. Amongst so many Nations of greatest antiquitie, thus long yee have made warre: and all this while (to say nothing of particular citties) neither the Volscians together with the Aequians, peopling so many townes, and those so strong, nor all Hetruria so mightie by sea and land, and containing the whole breadth betweene the two seas, are in warre to you comparable. Which being so, what reason have you (in the devils name) when ye have had sufficient prooffe alreadie of it, to trie again new experiments? considering now, that albeit your valour and vertue may goe with you elswhether, yet certes, the good luck & fortune of this place can never depart and remove from hence? Here is the Capitoll, where somtimes upon the finding of a mans head, answer was made by Diviners and wisards, That in that very place should be the head of all puissance, and the imperiall seat of the whole world. Here, at what time as the Capitoll, by the direction of the Augurs should be voided and cleared of all other chappels, Ladie Juvenius, and God Terminus to the great joy of our forefathers, would not suffer themselves to be stirred out of their place. Here are the fires of Vesta, here be the scutcheons come downe from heaven, here are all the gods, favorable & gracious still unto you, so long as here ye make abode & remain. Camillus in all his Oration throughout moved them much: but that part thereof touching religion (by report) was most effectually. But that which strucke it dead, and put all out of doubt, was a certain word that fell out to be spoken fitly to the purpose. For at what time as the Senate a while after, was gathered together in the court Hostilia, to debate about these things, and certaine companies of souldiours that returned from their guards, chanced in the meane time to march through the market place, one capitaine happened to speake in the Comitium, and said, Pitch downe thy ensigne standard bearer, here will be our best abode. Which voice was not so soone heard, but both the Senate being come out of the councill house, cried with one accord, That they tooke that offe for good lucke, and happy presage: and also the Commons all gathered therabout, approved the same. After this, when the foresaid Act of transmigration was once cleane dashed and abolished, the cittie began to be built confusedly, and without order. Tile was allowed at the common charges: to dig either stone or hew timber, every man had libertie where hee could, putting in sureties, that within the compasse of that yeare they would finish their buildings. The hast they made, caused them to have no regard of drawing out the streets directlie, whiles everie man built in the void places without any respect of his own or other mens ground. Which is the cause that the old finckes and vaultes which first were conveyed through the common streets, now run everie where under mens houses, and the forme of the cittie seemeth, as if it were built at random (as every man could catch a place for himselfe) rather than distinctly ranged, and set out in good order unto them.

THE SIXTH BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the sixth Booke.

T containeth the fortunate wars against the Aequians, the Volscians, and Tuscans. Four Tribes were added to the former, Stellatina, Sabatina, Promentina, Arniensis. M. Manlius, who had defended the Capitoll from the Gauls, while he discharged the debts of those that were in danger of their creditors, and released such as were then imprisoned, was convicted of aspiring to be King, and throwne downe from the cliffe Tarpeia. In whose reproach a device was made by the Senat, that none of the house of Manlius, should be surnamed Mancus. C. Licinius and L. Sextius, Tribunes of the Commons, propesed a law, that Consuls also might be chosen out of the Commons, who were created before from among the Nobles only. And albeit the Senators withstood them with earnest endeavour, yet by reason that for five yeares space, the same Tribunes continued the onely magistrates of the cittie, they went through with that law and gat it enacted. And L. Sextius was created the first Consul that ever was, of Commoners. A second law there passed likewise, that no man might possesse above five hundred acres of land.

The Recapitulation of the former five booke.

WHAT actes from the building of the cittie of Rome unto the taking of the same, the Romanes have achieved, first under the government of Kings, afterwards of Consuls and Dictatours, Decemvirs, and Tribunes Consular, as well in the wars abroad as seditions at home; I have in five books declared. Matters obscure, both in regard of exceeding antiquitie (as things that a farre off hardly be discerned:) and also for that in those daies there were very few writings & monuments, the onely faithful safeguard, & true remembrancers of deeds past: and besides, whatsoever was registred in the Commentaries of the Priests, and in other publike or privat records, the same for the most part, when the cittie was burned, perished withal. But now from henceforward, their civile affaires of pollicie, and martiall exploits in warre, ensuing after a second beginning of the cittie (as springing againe with more fresh shoots and fruitfull sprouts from the root of the old stocke) shall bee delivered in more plaine and certaine manner.

Camillus bare the Dictatourship, while Rome, which otherwise was divided within six months.

C. Fabius ended.

And to begin withall, looke by whom the state first was underpropped and set upright, upon him (as chiefe and principall) it still bare and rested, and that was M. Fabius: whome the Romanes would not suffer to give up his Dictatourship before one yeare was fully expired. As for those Tribunes (Consular) in time of whose government the citie was lost, they liked not that they should call and hold an assembly for Election of Magistrates, the yeare following. So the matter came to an Interreigne: Now whiles the cittie was busie in continuall worke and labour, about reedifying and repairing their buildings, Q. Fabius so soone as he was out of his office, was by C. Martius a Tribune of the Commons, arrested to make his answer at a day appointed. Who laid to his charge, That he contrarie to the law of nations, had fought against the Gauls, unto whom he was sent in embassage, and as an Orator only. But he avoided his judiciall trial, by his death: and died so just against the time, that many men thought it was voluntarie & wrought by his owne hands. Then P. Cornelius Scipio first entred upon the Interreigne: and after him M. Furius Camillus the second time. Hee created Tribune Militarie in Consuls authoritie, A. Valerius Publicola the second time, L. Virginus, P. Cornelius, A. Manlius, L. Aemilius, and L. Posthumus. These men presently after the Interreigne, were not so soone entred into office,

A but before all other things, they consulted with the Senate in matters concerning religion and conscience. And first of all they commaunded, that all the instruments of leagues and confederacies, the ordinances and laws also (and those were the twelve tables, and certaine statutes made by the kings) should be sought up as many as could be found extant. Whereof some were published abroad, even amongst the Common people: but such as pertained properly to holy rites, and divine service, were by the Priests and Prelates suppressed; especially, of purpose to hold the minds of the people in a reverent awe of religion and devotion. Then began they to reason and debate about the dismall daies. And the fifteenth day before the *Kalends of August, so notorious for a twofold losse and overthrow; upon which day at Créméra the Fabij were all slaine, and after at Allia an unfortunate field was fought, even to the utter ruine and desolation of the cittie, B they named of the later misfortune, allensis: and set this unluckie mark upon it, That it should be repented unmeet and inconvenient for any businesse, as well publicke as private. Some thinke, because upon the next day following the *Ides of Iulie, Sulpitius the Tribune Militarie could not by sacrifice find any tokens of happie speed, nor obtaine the grace and favor of the gods; whereupon three daies after, the Romane host fell shamefully into the hands of the enemies: therefore, the morrow also after the Ides was interdicted, and men were commaunded to forbear and abstaine from doing sacrifice: and thereupon likewise, the day next following the Kalends & the Nones, were by tradition held as ominous and dismall as the other.

But long they might not quietly sit about the devising of meanes to reforme the Commonwealth, and let it upright againe after so greivous and daungerous a fall. For of the one side, the C Volscians, their old enemies, took armes, intending the finall destruction of the Romane name. On the other side, the Marchants brought newes, That the Princes and chiefe of all the nations of Hetruria were banded and confedered together in a Diet held at the temple of Voltumna, to make warre upon them. Besides, a fresh and new feare came upon them by reason of the rebellion of the Latines and Hernickes, who after the battell at the poole Regillus, for the space almost of a hundred yeares, had continued fast in loyall league & amitie with the people of Rome. Therefore being thus greatly affrighted on everie side, that all the world might see apparently that the state of Rome was not onelie hated of her enemies, but despised also of her allies: it was thought good and resolved upon, that by his direction and rule, the Commonwealth should now be maintained and defended, by whose conduct and guidance it was relieved and recovered: and that M. Furius Camillus should be created Dictatour. He being declared Dictatour, named Q. Servilius Hala for Generall of the horsemen. And having proclaimed a law-steen (or vacation from courts of law) hee tooke muster of all the younger fort and serviceable men: but so, as the elder people were not left out, as many as were of strength sufficient for service. Unto whom hee likewise ministred the militarie oth of alleageance, and enrolled them by hundreds in the muster booke. When hee had thus levied a power of men, and furnished them with armour, he divided them into three parts. The one he opposed against Hetruria in the countie of Veij: another he commaunded to lie encamped before the cittie. Over these A. Manlius a Tribune Militarie was made captain: those which were sent against the Tuscans had L. Aemilius for their commaunder. A third part he himselfe led against the Volscians: and not farre from Lanuvium (the place is called Ad-Metium) he began to assault their campe. The enemies had put themselves on this their journey, with a kind of scornfull contempt, as thinking the whole manhood in a manner of Rome, was by the French cleane spent and wasted. But when they heard once, that Camillus was the Lord Generall, it stroke such a feare and terror among them, that they were glad to defend themselves by the strength of their trench and rampier, yea and to fence it round about with huge-piled heapes of wood and trees, that their enemies might have no passage to enter in upon their munitions. Which when Camillus perceived, he gave order to set on fire that Barricado which stood in his way. And as good hap was, the wind was big and high, and blew full upon the enemy. So that not onely he made way by fire, but also with the flames thereof that went toward the campe, with the vapor likewise and smoke, and the crackling noise of the greene wood, he so mated and astonished the enemies, that the Romans had lesse ado to passe the trench & palliado, into the campe of the Volscians, than in getting over the mound and enclosure consumed with fire. Having thus defeated and slaine his enemies, and won withall the campe in the same brunt, the Dictatour gave the whole spoile unto the souldiours: which to them was so much the more welcome, as they lesse hoped for it at their General his hand: who was never knowne to be lavish of gift, and over liberall in dealing rewards. After this he followed G them that fled, in chase, wasted and haried their whole countrey, and at length (in the seventieth yeare of the warre) he wholly subdued the Volscians, and forced them to yeeld subjection. After this conquest, he departed from thence into the Æquians, who likewise made preparations for warre. Their forces he surprised and defeated at Bolæ, and assailed not onely their campe, but also forced the citie, and at the first assault wan both.

But while fortune smiled thus, what way soever Camillus went, as being the onelie staie of the Romane state: so on another side the feare of perill greatlie encreased. For Hetruria well neere all up in armes, lay before Saturnium, and besieged it being in league with the people of Rome. Whose Embassadors came unto the Senate to intreat for succour in their distresse, and had a decree granted unto them, that the Dictator with all speed should rescue the Sutrinnes. But being so streightly beleagured, that they might not abide the delay of this their hope, for that the townsmen, who were but few in number were overwearied with working, watching and bloodie fighting, (all which lay still upon the same men without intermission) they were driven by composition to surrender up the citie to the enemies: and being disarmed and sent away with a single suit of apparrell (after a piteous sort all arow) departed the towne and left their dwelling places. But see, it fortune that Camillus at the same time came in the verie manner with the Romane armie and met them. At whose feet the multitude all sorrowfull lay prostrate: their Nobles and chiefe men in this extremitie full to beseech him to be good unto them: the women and children which went along with them, as partakers and companions of their exile, seconded them with wofull teares & lamentations. But he willed the Sutrinnes to forbear their mourning plaints, and give over their dolefull mone: saying, that he brought the Tuscanes heave & weeping cheere. Then caused he his soldiours to lay downe their packs and load, the Sutrinnes likewise there to abide with a meane guard, and his men to follow him with armour and weapons onely. Thus marched he forward with his armie lightlie appointed for readie expedition, and advanced before Saturnium. Where, according to his expectation, he found the enemies all carelesse and secure (as commonly it falleth out upon a prosperous successe.) No warders, no corps de gard quartered before the wals, the gates wide open, the conquerours heere and there sacking, rifling and flinging the goods out of their enemies houses. So was Saturnium in one day twise woon. The Tuscanes (for all their former victorie) were hewen in peeces on everie side, by a new come enemy. They had no time to cast themselves round, nor gather together into one place, no nor to take weapon in hand: while everie man for life, made in all hast to the gates, if haply any way they might escape into the fields. But when they came thither, the gates they found fast shut, for so the Dictator had given order aforehand. Hereupon some betooke themselves to their weapons: others (namelie such as happened to be armed when this suddaine tumult surprised them) fell to call their fellowes together for to begin a skirmish: which no doubt in that desperate case of the enemies had been hotlie fought, had not the criers and trumpets which were sent into all parts of the citie, made proclamation to lay downe their weapons, to spare them which were unarmed, and that none should have anie harme but those that were found in armes. Upon this, even they who in that extremitie and dispaire were fullie bent to fight it out, for hope of life on all hands flong away their weapons: and thus disarmed as they were (for as the case stood, it was the safer course) presented themselves to the enemy. A great number of them were bestowed in severall places, and were attended upon with good guards. And before night the towne was delivered againe unto the Sutrinnes, safe and sound without any hurt at all done unto it, as being not woon by force, but surrendered upon composition. Camillus then, returned with triumph into the citie of Rome, victour at one voiage in three sundrie warres. The greatest number by farre, of prisoners, whom he led before his chariot in triumph, were Tuscanes: whom he sold in port sale at the speare, and raised such a summe of mony, that when he had out of it repaid the damages of Rome to the worth of their gold, there were of the surplusage therof three bolles made of masse gold: which with the title & inscription of Camillus his name, were for certainty, before the Capitol was burnt, to be seene in the chappel of Iupiter set up & bestowed at the feet of Iuno. M

The same yeare, there were enfranchised and made citizens of Rome, such Vicentians, Capenates and Faliscians, as in the time of those warres were fled to the Romans: and for these new citizens were certain lands set out. Those also, who for idleness loth to build at Rome, were gone to Veij, there to inhabit the vacant houses, were by an Act of the Senat recalled home from thence. And

A And they at the first, grumbled & refused to obey: but after that a day was set them, & they threatened upon paine of death to return againe to Rome; as stout as they were, & obstinate all of them together, now for feare every one became obedient. As Rome now increased in number of inhabitants, & became well peopled: so on all hands in everie place they fell to building new edifices: while the Commonwealth somewhat eased them of charges, & the Ædiles by vertue of their office called hard upon them, hastening them forward as to a publike workesyea and every man privately made all speed possible, according as each ones need required, to make an end and finish his owne house. So as within the yeere the citie was new built and stood on foot againe. Rome new built

At the yeares end was the great Election held for Tribunes militarie in Consuls authoritie. Wherein were created T. Quintius Cincinnatus, Q. Servilius Fidenas the fifth time, Julius Tullus, L. Aquilius Corvus, L. Lucretius Tricipitinus, Ser. Sulpitius Ruffus. One armie they set out and led against the Æquians, not to warre with them (for they granted themselves conquered) but upon meer spight and deadly hatred, to wast all their borders utterly, and to leave them no power and strength to enterprife any new rebellion. The other, into the territorie of Tarquinius. Where, two townes of the Tuscanes, Cortuosa and Contenebra, were by assault wonne and rased. At Cortuosa was no resistance made. For the Romans surprised them on a suddaine, and at the first shout and impression they were masters of it: The towne was sacked and burned. As for Contenebra, it endured the assault for some few daies: but the continuall labour, slacking neither day nor night, overcharged them: whereas the Romane armie divided into six parts, fought six houres in their severall turnes, round one after the other. And the townsmen being but few, and those overtoiled, were faine without anie supply, still to maintaine fresh skirmishes. Whereupon, at last they reculed backe and yeilded, giving the Romans leave to enter the citie. The Tribunes were of mind and thought good, that the spoile should be confiscate and go to the common treasure: but the commaundment and proclamation, was more slacke than their purpose in that behalf. For while they lingered and protracted time, the soldiours already had seased in their prizes: and taken from them againe without much offence and hatred, the boorie could not be. In the same yeare, because the citie should not flourish in private buildings onely, the Capitol was also built of squared ashler stone: A peece of worke even in this so glorious estate, and magnificence of the citie, to be had in price and esteemed excellent. And now before this time, the Tribunes of the Commons, while the citie was busied about their buildings, began often to moove for the lawes Aggrarie (about the division of the lands) in all their assemblies and speeches before the people. For to draw them on and to set forward their hope, they presented unto them estoones the Pomptine territorie, which then above all others, so presendie upon the subduing and subversion of the Volscians by Camillus, was, no doubt, the rightfull possession of the people of Rome. Complaints were made, that those grounds sustained much more detriment and damage by the Nobilitie, than they had received before from the Volscians. For they, so long onelie as they were able to beare armes and maintaine warre, made inrodes thither: but the Noblemen forcible entered and made havocke in the possessions of the common lands: and unlesse (before they had set sure footing there, and got all into their hands) a division were made, the Commons should never enioie one foote of ground there. These Remonstrances of the Tribunes little mooved the Commons, both because few of them resorted to the common place of assemblies, while they plied their building: and also for that monie was away, and their purses so emptied in the charges of workemen, they had little mind of holding those landes, which to store and stocke they were not able.

The citie was now given much to their devotions and religions, and the rulers also somewhat superstitious, upon their late calamitie: In somuch as they minded to renew the Auspicia, or the solemnitie of presages taken by birdflight (for some error supposed therein: & therefore they agreed that the government should returne to an Interreigne. So there were Interregents one after another, M. Mamilius Capitolinus, Ser. Sulpitius Camerinus, L. Valerius Potitus. Valerius at length held the assemblie for to elect Tribunes Militarie in Consuls authoritie, and created L. Papirius, Cn. Sergius, L. Aemilius the second time, L. Licinius, T. Valerius Publicola the third time. These presently after the Interreigne, began their government. That yeare, the Temple of Mars vowed in the Gauls war was dedicated by T. Quintius, a Duumvir deputed for the executing of holy duties. Four Tribes of new citizens were now adjoined, Stellatina, Pomatina, Sabatina, Arntensis: so Rome: and these made up the number of the 35 Tribes. And now L. Sicinius a Tribune of the Commons mons, was in hand with the people in greater number assembled together, about the Pomptine lands: and more inclined they were and forward to hearken after grounds, than they had been afore. And whereas it was mooved in the Senate house, to make warre upon the Latines and the Hernicks, that matter was not followed, but put off to a further time: by reason of preparation for a greater warre, because Hetruria was already up in armes. And all was laid againe upon Camillus, his shoulders, who was made Tribune Militarie with Consuls authority, and had five other brethren in office joined unto him Ser. Cornelius Maluginensis, Q. Servilius Fidenas the first time, L. Quintius Cincinnatus, L. Horatius Pulvillus, P. Valerius. In the beginning of the yeare, the minds of men were turned cleane away from the carefull regard they had of the Tuscan warre, by reason that a number of people that fled out of the Pomptine countie, came all of a suddaine in great hast to the citie, and brought word, that the Antiates were up in armes, that the nations of the Latines had sent their able youth to that warre closelie under hand, thereby disavowing it to be any action of the State, and standing upon this point, that by the covenant there was no proviso, but that voluntarie soldiours might serve in what warres soever they would. Now had the Romanes beene well taught, and learned, to set light no more by any warres. The Senate therefore thanked the gods, that Camillus was in place of government, who if he had beene a private person, was no doubt to have beene nominate: and created Dictatour: yea and his companions in office confessed frankly that he was the onlie man to have the soveraigne and absolute regiment of all, in case there were any fearfull and dangerous warre toward: and were fully resolved, to yeeld up all their interest in government unto him, thinking it no disparagement at all unto them, nor any losse of their owne honour and reputation, in conferring the same upon the majestie of so worthie a person. The Senate highly commended the Tribunes, and Camillus was much abashed in his mind, howbeit he gave them heartie thanks, and spake in this wise. A weightie burthen (quoth he) I see is imposed upon me by the people of Rome, in that they have elected and nominated me Dictatour now the fourth time: a greater charge is enjoined me by the Senate, the whole state and bodie of which order, hath delivered so singular good opinion and judgement of me: but the heaviest lode of all is laid upon me by the exceeding kindness, and obsequious benignitie of these my honourable brethren and colleagues. If any painful travaile of mine therefore, and watchfull care may be redoubled, I will earnestlie endeavour, I will straine and strive to answere therunto: that the opinion which the citie with so great content hath conceived of me, right as it is exceeding great, so it may continue still and be perpetual. As to that warre of the Antiates, there are more brags and threats than any danger or perill from thence. But as I would counsaile and advise you to be afraid of no warre, so I would not have you to be careless and secure of any. The citie of Rome is beset on everie side: partlie envied, and partlie hated of her neighbour borderers. Need there is both of more captaines, and also of more armies, to manage the affaires of the Commonweale. I thinke it good therefore (quoth hee) Q. Valerius, that you assist me in government and counsell, and have the leading together with me of certaine legions against the Antiate enemies. That you Q. Servilius, with an other armie well appointed, and in readines, lie encamped hard by the citie side, having an eye and good regard, least either Hetruria in the meane while, (as of late daies) or the Latines and Hernicks (who trouble vs now a fresh) breake out and make some rising. Assured I am, that you will behave your selfe, and quit you in this service so worthilie, as may answere the famous memorie of such a father and grandfire as you have had, may besecme your owne honourable person, and those six Tribuneships which you have already performed. As for L. Quintius let him leavie a third power of men, consisting of those that are by reason of sicknesse or other wise excused for warfare, and are above the ordinarie age for militarie service, to be in stead of a garison for defence of the citie and the walles. Let L. Horatius provide harnesse, weapons, come and other necessities for warre, at all occasions whatsoever. Finally, Sergius Cornelius, wee your fellow Tribunes, ordaine you president of this publicke Counsell, the Custos and keeper of religion and Church matters, of generall assemblies, of the lawes and all other civill affaires of pollicie whatsoever. Now when they had all made promise, and that most willingly to do their endeavour in performing their severall charges, Valerius whom he had joined with himselfe in commission, added moreover and said, That as he would take M. Furius to be Dictatour, so would he be unto him againe in steed of his Coronell of horsemen. And turning to the Lords of the Senate, exhorted them that what opinion they had of one onelie

A lie soveraigne Generall, the same hope they would conceive of the whole warre. The Senators hereat tooke great joy and contentment, giving out willingly with one accord, that they hoped exceeding well of war, of peace, and generally of the State. Neither shall the common-weale (say they) ever stand in need of Dictatour, so long as such magistrats be in place, so jointly agreeing in one mind together, so indifferent and readie as well to obey as to rule, and rather yeelding their proper praise to the honour of the common-weale, than dismembring and plucking from it to their privat glorie and reputation.

After a Vacation or Law-yeed proclaimed, and the Musters taken and past: Furius and Valerius set forward to Samitum: whether the Antiates had not onely sent the floure of all the Volsci, the choise youth out of a fresh fric and new generation; but also had raised a mightie power of

B Latines and Hernicks, out of those nations that by long peace were most frimmie & lustie. These new enemies and old thus combined together, troubled the minde of the Romane souldiour, and made him to startle. Which when the Centurians reported to Camillus, as he was marshalling and setting his battailes in array; and that in these termes, to wit, that the hearts of his souldiours were disquieted & dismayed, that they tooke themselves but slowly to their weapons, made staying and hasting when they should come forth of their tents, yea and that there were some of them overheard to say, that, They must fight one to an hundred, and that so great a multitude of their enemies (if they were unarmed) might hardly be encountered, much lesse, being so well armed and appointed: he mounted presently upon horsbacke, and rode before the ensignes, and then turning himselfe a fount his armie, traversing betwene the ranks and arraies; What hea-

C vineesse is this my souldiours (quoth he) what meanes this strange and unwonted lagging behind? Why? Know ye not your enemy? Know ye not me? Or know ye not your owne selves? The enemy, what is he els but the perpetuall matter and subject of your valour and glorie? And yee againe are the men, who under my conduct (to say nothing of the winning of Falerij and Veij, and of the slaughter of the Gaules Legions, put to the sword by us, even when our native citie was by them taken, and they masters thereof) of late, and but the other day, made a threefold triumph, upon a triple victorie, over the same Volscians Aequians and people of Hetruria. What doe ye not agnize and accept me for your Generall, because not as Dictatour, but as Tribune, I gave you the watchword, and put out the banner of battaile? For mine owne part, I stand not much upon absolute and soveraigne commaund over you: no more likewise should yee regard

D oughtels in me, but mine owne selfe. For never yet did my Dictatourship make me haughty and set me aloft, no more than my banishment abated my courage and cast me downe. We are the same men still all of us: and since we are come to this war, furnished with the same meanes that we carried with us unto the former, let us looke for the same event of our service, & no worse. So soone as ye shall encounter and joine battaile with them, performe each one that which he hath been taught and wonted to: the journey surely will be ours, and they (no doubt) shall run away. Then after he had founded the battaile, he alighteth from his horse, and caught the ensigne-bearer that stood next him, with his hand, haled him forward against the face of the enemy, crying eftsoones aloud, On afore with thy banner, Port-ensigne, and advance forward, souldiour. When they saw that Camillus in person, a man well steep in yeares, and thereby weake to

E performe the parts of bodily strength, putting himselfe forth against the enemy: all at once they pressed forward, set up an outcrie and shouted, every man calling upon his next fellow, to follow their Generall for shame. Over and besides, some say that by the commandement of Camillus, there was an ensigne flung into the very battaile among the enemies. Whereupon they of the forefront, bestirred themselves lustily to recover it againe. And thereby were the Antiates first discomfited, and the feare not onely came upon them in the vaward, but entered also and reached as farre as the rereward, that stood readie for supply. And as the violent force of the souldiours, provoked by the presence of their Captaine, much troubled the enemy: so nothing more daunted the hearts of the Volscians, than the very sight of Camillus himselfe, when they chanced to espie him. So surely carried he the victorie with him, which way soever he went! And that appeared most evidently in this, That when he saw the left wing at the point to give backe and run away, he took himselfe in all hast to his horse, rode thither with his light footmans buckler, and with his onely presence renewed the fight; shewing unto them how the rest of the battell had the better. Now were the enemies put to the worst, & the victorie enclined to a side. But their multitude both hindred themselves in their flight: and also a long peece of worke the wearied souldiours diours of the Romanes had to put so great a number, all to the sword. But behold, there fell G a great tempest of raine all of a sodaine, which powred down with so mightie windes and storms, that it rather put them by the execution of assured victorie, than parted any battaile or staid the fight. Vpon the retreat the towne was founded: and the night ensuing, whiles the Romanes were at rest, made an end of the warre. For the Latines and Hernicks forooke the Volscians and departed home, with as ill speed, as their enterprise was bad. The Volscians seeing themselves abandoned and left in the lurch by them, (upon whose trust and confidence they had rebelled) quit the campe and field and put themselves within the wals of Satricum. Whom Camillus at first began to besiege, casting a trench and rampier about them, raising bastillions & platforms against the towne. And seeing his munitions and fabricks by no fallying forth of the enemies impeached, he supposed there was no such courage in them, that he should neede to stand so long about the hope of victorie: and therupon, encouraged his men not to weare themselves out in a tedious and toillfull piece of service, as if they lay at the siege of Veij: assuring them that the victorie was in their hands alreadie: and so with exceeding cheerefulness of his souldiours, he set ladders upon everie side, scaled the wals, and entred the towne. Then the Volscians flung away their weapons and yelded themselves.

But the Generall his mind was bent upon a greater exploit, and that was the winning of Antium, being the seat towne of the Volscians, and from whence the beginning of the last warre arose. Howbeit, because so strong a citie might not be won without great preparation of artillerie, ordnance and engins of batterie, leaving his colleague behind him with the armie, he went himselfe to Rome, to perswade with the Senate, for to destroy and rase Antium utterly. And whiles he was emparling with them (such was the will of God I beleeeve, that Antium should stand still and continue longer) there came embassadours from Nepes and Sutrium, craving aid against the Tuscans, saying: That it was more than high time, that they were succoured and relieved. Vpon which occasion it fell out, that Camillus was withdrawne thither from Antium. For seeing that those two townes stood even against Hetruria, as it were the very keyes and bar-gates from thence: both the enemies laboured to gaine them afore hand, against the time that they went about to make new wars; and the Romanes also held it a matter of great consequence, to rescue and defend those frontier townes. The Senat therefore thought good to be in hand with Camillus, for to leave Antium, and to undertake the war with the Tuscans. The citie-legions under Generall Quintius, were appointed unto him. And albeit, he rather would have had the leading of that armie, which laie now in the Volscians countie, and which he had good triall of, and were acquainted better with his government, yet refused he nothing: onely he required to have Valerius his associate still, and joyned with him in commission. So Quintius and Horatius were sent to succed Valerius in the Volscian war. Furius and Valerius tooke their voiage from the citie to Sutrium, and found the one side of the town possessed alreadie by the Tuscans. On the other side, the townsmen, for that the enemy had stopped all passages betwene, hardly able to repell the force of the assailants. But the coming of the Romane aides, and the name besides of Camillus, (so highly renowned as well amongst the enemies as Allies) both for the present gave them heart to abide the brunt, and sticke to it still that were before at the point to give over: and also gained time and respite, to come in with fresh supplies and succours. Camillus therefore divided his forces, and gave direction to his colleague, for to bring about his power, to that side which the enemies held, and there to make an assault: not so much for any hope he had by scaling the wals to win the citie; as by withdrawing the enemies thither, not onely to ease the townsmen of their toile, and give them a breathing time (who were now wearied with assaults) but also to get himselfe some opportunitie and vantage, to enter the citie without skirmish and resistance. Which being put in execution on both hands accordingly, and performed at once: the Tuscans beset with a two fold feare round about, seeing the wals assailed most fiercely one waie: and the enemy gotten within the towne another way: flung out at one gate (which as it hapned was not beset) and in greatchast all together sought to escape away. But as they fled, they were slaine by heapes both within the towne and abroad all over the fields. The greater number were killed within the wals by Furius his souldiours. Valerius his men were more readie and nimble in the chase, and gave not over the execution untill the night came, that they could not see and discern them.

When Sutrium was thus recovered and restored againe to their allies, they led forward the armie

A armie to Nepes: which towne the Tuscans held wholly, as surrendered alreadie into their hands. Every man thought it would be a busier peece of worke to win that citie againe: not in this regard onely, that it was fully in the enemies possession, but also because some of the Nepefins, by treason had yelded it up. Howbeit, they resolved to send unto the heads and principall citizens; that they should sever themselves from the Tuscans, and performe on their behalfe truite and faithfull loialtie, like as they had craved and besought at the Romans hands their friendly helpe & protection. From whom they received this answer againe, That it lay not now in them to doe any thing at all, for that the Tuscans kept the wals, and warded the gates. Whereupon they first terrified and skared the townsmen with harrying and spoiling their territorie: after that, seeing they made more reckoning of keeping their faithfull loialtie to their enemies unto whome they had lately surrendred, than observing the league with their friends, which they had long before concluded; they provided themselves out of the fields of a number of faggots, of brushwood, and such like trowse, and so approached the citie with the armie, filled up the ditches close to the wals, set ladders to, and at the first shout and assault given, the towne was taken. Then proclamation was made, that all the Nepefins should part with their armour and weapons, and so many as were found unarmed, should be spared. But the Tuscans, as well armed as unarmed, were put to the sword every one. As for the cheefe authours that perswaded the Nepefins to deliver the towne to the enemies, they were beheaded. The harmelesse multitude had their goods restored, and to the towne was left with a garrison. Thus the two Tribunes (Consular) having regained out of the enemies hands two confederate cities, returned in great glorie to Rome with their victori-

The same yeare the Latines and Hernicks were required to make amends for harmes done, and restitution of goods wrongfully detained: and the cause demanded why of late years, according to a covenant in that behalfe provided, they had set forth no souldiours to the Romans wars. Answer from both Nations in their solemne counsels was returned: That neither the fault was generall, nor proceeding from counsell of the State, in case some of their youth served under the Volscians: and yet themselves had well paid alreadie for their leaud and rash projects, in that not one of them was come home alive. And as to the not sending forth of souldiours, the cause was, for that they were in continuall feare and danger of the Volscians: which noisome plague (as it were) sticking so close unto their sides, unneath they could bee rid off, notwithstanding so many warres one in the necke of another. When relation hereof was made unto the Lords of the Senate, they thought so well of their answer and excuses, that they deemed they had quarrell and occasion good ynough to warre upon them, if they might have had while and time as well to follow it.

In the yeare following, when A. Manlius, P. Cornelius, Titus and Lucius Quintius, both Capitolini, and L. Papyrius Cursor the second time, were Tribunes Consular, there arose a greivous war abroad, and a more dangerous sedition brake forth at home. The warre, from the Volscians, banded with the Latines and Hernicks, that were fallen away and revolted. The sedition (where it was least feared) from a personage of noble lineage descended, of great name and reputation, M. Manlius Capitolinus. Who being a man of too loftie and hautie a minde, despised all other of the Nobilitie, and envied one above the rest, M. Furius, so singular, as well in regard of his honourable dignities, as his wortheie parts and commendable vertues. Hee could not brooke and endure, that hee onely should ever bee Lord Generall in the field: who now was exalted so high above others, that even those who were created with him in egall authoritie, he accounted not as his peeres and fellows, but emploied as his ministers and servitours. Whereas (quoth he) if men would weigh aright, and duly consider every thing, M. Furius could never have delivered his countie from the siege of the enemies, had not the Capitoll and castlecliffe been saved by mee afore. Camillus set upon the Gauls, when they were amused in receiving their gold, when they were upon tearmes of peace, and their hearts quiet and secure: whereas my selfe chased them away, whiles they were in armes, and at the point to win the castle hill. In that exploit of Camillus the souldiours, had each one his share proportionably of the glorie, who together with him did their parts: but in the service performed by me, no earthly creature was fellow and partener with me. With these conceits he fed his owne humour, and puffed up his prowd spirit, being withall by corrupt disposition of nature, hore and hastic, arrogant and insolent. Discontented besides, that of the Nobilitie, his gifts & qualities were not esteemed of that worth, as in his own judgement ment they deserved: first, of a Senatour he became popular, and began to breake his mind, and impart his designs unto the Magistrates of the Commons: finding fault with the Nobilitie, and complaining of them: solliciting and inveigling the Commons, to cast a liking and favour toward himselfe: carried away with the vaine gale of the peoples opinion: not guided by sage counsell and discretion: and in one word, chusing rather to be of great name, than of good and honest report. And not contenting himselfe to deale in the lawes Agrarie, about the division of lands, which had alwaies ministred to the Tribunes of the Commons matter ynough of mutinies and seditions; hee began to intermeddle betweene the debtors and their creditours, and to overthrow all keeping of credite. And indeed, deepe debts are sharpe goads, and prick shrewdly: threatening not onely povertie and shame, but also terrifying the bodies of free men with hard imprisonment, little ease, and yrons. Now there were exceeding many farre in debt (a thing most dangerous and hurtfull to mens state) even of the richer sort, by reason of their great expenses defraied in building. The warre therefore of the Volscians, which was itselfe of great importance, but much more, in regard of the Latines and Hernicks rebellion withall, was in shew pretended, as a cause to seeke for to have a more soveraigne and absolute power to governe the State: but in truth, these new designements and plots of Manlius, rather than the warre, forced the Senate to create a Dictatour. And A. Cornelius Cossus being created, nominated for his Generall of horse, T. Quintius Capitolinus. The Dictatour, albeit he saw a greater bickering toward, at home than abroad, yet (were it that the warre required some speedie expedition, or because by victorie and triumph, hee thought to make his Dictatourship more mightie and powerfull) hee tooke musters, and set forward into the Pomptine land, into which parts hee had intelligence, that the Volscians had proclaimed their forces, to repaire.

A legend of the anchor.

I doubt not, but they that read in so many bookes already, of these continuall warres fought with the Volscians, besides their tedious satietie of reading, will muse also at this (which to my selfe was likewise a wonder, when I perused the writers that lived neere about the times of these acts) how these Volscians and Aequians, so often vanquished and defeated, were furnished with supplie of souldiours to maintaine their warres. But seeing by the ancient Chroniclers it hath been overpassed with silence, what should I alleadge, but only mine owne opinion and bare conjecture, which every man hath libertie to put in for himselfe? Likely it is, that either between the times of warres (as now we see in the Romane musters) they used to breed up one supplie under another, of the younger sort, to the maintenance and renewing so oftentimes of their war: or that their armies were not alwaies levied out of the same States, albeit the warres go under the name of one and the selfe same nation: or that those countries yeelded in those daies an infinit number of freemen, which now are well neare wast and desart, but for some Romane slaves, which keepe those parts yet from being void and dispeopled, as having but a very small seminarie, or none at all, left, of serviceable souldiours.

Certes, the Volscians armie, as all authors agree, was very great at this time: albeit of late daies by the leading and conduct of Camillus they were sore weakened, and their strength much abated. Besides, there were with them in field, the Latines and Hernicks, some of the Circeians, and other Coloners from Velitrae. The Romane Dictatour having that day pitched his campe, and the next morrow come abroad with happie tokens of good speed from the Birds: having also slaine a sacrifice, and procured thereby the favour and grace of the gods, in joyous manner shewed himselfe unto his souldiours: who according as they were commaunded, were readie early in the morning, by breake of day in armes, attending the sound of trumpet for battaile. The day is ours (quoth hee) my valorous souldiours, if either the gods or their Prophets can foretell future events. Therefore as resolute men of assured hope, and such as shall encounter with far meaner than our selves, pitch we our javelins downe at our feet, and draw our swords only. Neither would I have you to run out of the maine battell, and to give the charge, but to keepe your ground, to stand stedfast, and abide the first shooke of the enemy. And when they have spent their volie of shot in vaine, and shall with full feeble come upon you as you stand, then brandish your swords, and let them glitter in their eyes, and thinke everie man of the gods, that they will helpe the Romanes. The gods I say, which in happie houre, by the luckie approbation of their Birds, have sent us into the field to fight. And as for you, O Quintius, keepe your horsemen close together, marking advicely the first beginning of the skirmish: and when you see the battailes buckle together pell mell, and come to hand strokes, whiles they are busied and occupied one way,

The Creation of A. Cornelius Cossus Dictator, to his souldiours.

A way, fright them another way with your horsemen, ride among their ranks as they fight, and breake their arraies. Thus fought both horse and foot according to his direction. And as the legions wanted not a worthie captaine, no more missed the captaine of happie speed. The multitude of the enemies trusting upon nothing but their owne number, which they measured and compared together onely by their eye, intervewing both the one armie and the other, rashly gave battaile, and as rashly gave over againe. In shout onely and shot shewing themselves hot & eager at the first encounter: but were not able to abide the sword fight, the closing together foot to foot, and the firme countenance of their enemies, which for the verie heat of their courage, shined and glistered fully in their eyes. So the forefront being put backe, a feare came upon them likewise, that stood behind for supply, and withall, the horsemen for their parts set to, and fought most terrible. Whereupon the ranks of the enemies in sundrie places were broken, and all set out of order, so as their battailons seemed to stote & wave up & downe to and fro, in suspense whether to fight or flee. Afterwards, when they saw the foremost smitten downe and slaine, and everie one thought no other but his own turne was next to be killed, they turned their backs and fled. The Romans came forward still and chased them. And so long as they went their way armed & thick huddled together, it was the footmens work to pursue them: but when it was perceived once, that they slong away their weapons on all hands, & that the enemies armie fled disperfed all abroad in the fields: then were the troupes of horsemen set out after them, with this caveat and charge, to make no stay and forlet the time, by killing them one by one, and so to give the maine multitude of them in the meane while sufficient respite to escape: but that they should content themselves, only to let flee some shot amongst them, and by scaring them to hinder their running: and when they were ridden beyond, to crosse upon them and stay them, untill the footmen might overtake them, fley them downe right & make an hand of them clean. Thus fled they, and thus were they followed in chace untill night. The verie same day was the Volscians campe taken and ransacked, and the whole pillage, besides the bodies of free men, was given unto the souldiours. The greatest part of the prisoners were Hernicks and Latines: and those not of the common sort, and such as might be thought to have served for pay: but there were found among them certaine young gentlemen of good mark, a plaine prooffe and evidence, that the Volscians enemies had aid from thence by the publike and generall warrant of the State. There were knowne also to be among them some of the Circeians, yea and certain of the Veliterne colonie likewise. All of them were sent to Rome. Where being examined before the chiefe of the Senatours, they confessed everie one in plaine termes, the revolting of their owne nation, like as they had before bewraied it unto the Dictatour. The Dictator still kept his forces together within the standing campe, making no doubt, but that the rulers and Senatours of Rome would determine to warre upon those countries.

The Volscians defeated.

But even at that time a greater heape of troubles which arose at home, caused him to be sent for to Rome, by occasion of a sedition which grew daily more and more: and by reason of the author thereof (a man of qualitie and note) was more feared than any usually had been afore time. For now by this, had M. Manlius not by speeches onely, but by plaine deeds also, (which in outward shew seemed popular and plausible) shewed evidently upon what troublesome and tumultuous spirit all proceeded. For seeing upon a time a Centurion, of good worth for his service in warre, condemned in an action of debt, and upon an execution of judgement caried to prison: he in the mids of the Forum, came running unto him with a rout and crew of his followers and retinue, laid hand on him, and tooke him perforce from the officers: and after he had given out some words alowd touching the pride of the Senators, the crueltie of the usurers, the calamities of the Commons, the valour and present distresse of the partie; Marrie then (quoth hee) have I done a great deed, to no purpose, in saving the Capitoll and the Keepe with this right hand of mine, if I could abide to see my fellow souldiour (as if he were taken prisoner of the Gauls by way of conquest) had away into bondage and captivitie, and laid up fast in givies and fetters. And therewith openlie in sight of all the people paid the whole debt downe right on the naile, unto the creditor: and so after the usual and solemne ceremonie by a brassen peece of coine and the balance, he set him at libertie out of the creditor his hands, and let him go at large. Who praised heartily to God and man, for to requite accordingly M. Manlius his onely deliverer, and the verie patron and protectour of the Commons of Rome. And when he was once gotten into that unrulie and seditious throng, hee presently himselfe set all on a hurrie, shewing the scarres of

of his wounds received in the Veientians and Gaules warres, and in other services one after another, saying, that whiles he thus followed folderie, and rebuilde his house that was destroyed, he became indebted, and that so deeply (by reason that the interest alwaies overgrew the principall) which he by that meanes had paid and paid againe) that he was not able to creepe out of the usurers booke, but was plunged therein over head and eares. And now behold (quoth hee) by the one, he goodnesse of M. Manlius, I have the libertie againe to see the light of the sunne, to behold the Common place, to looke my neighbours and fellow citizens in the face: at his hands I acknowledge to have received all the benefits that mine owne parents could give me: unto him I vow whatsoever in me is left, and in his quarrell to spend that little life and blood which remaineth in my bodie: and in one word looke what priviledge I may enjoy in right of my countrie, and in the communion of the gods, publike or private, the same do I impart and communicate with that one man. By these speeches the Commons were set on, and pricked forward mightily, as wholly devoted unto one person; and who but Manlius now in everie mans mouth? And presently in the nick he entred into another action that tended more effectually to marre all quite, and to set everie thing out of order. His land in the territorie of Veij, which was the chiefe and capitall Manour of his inheritance, even the fairest flower of his garland, he set upon sale, causing it openly to be cried, and said withall, I will not Quirites, so long as I have one foot of ground, or any thing else left, see one of you condemned and upon execution carried to prison. This let them so a fote, that they were readie, as it seemed, to follow him as the onely protectour of their liberties, in any action, were it right or wrong, they cared not which way, all was one with them. Besides at home in his owne house, he spared not to cast out slanderous speeches against the Senatours as if he had bene at the open Crosse, making Orations. Amongst which, without all regard whether he spake true or false, he let fall these words, That the Senatours kept in hucker mucker certain hidden treasures of the Gaules gold, and were not now contented to hold in possession the common grounds, but they would also embezzle the treasure publicke, which if it came abroad, the Commons might soone be acquit and discharged of their debts. This gap being once laid open, and this light given the people, they thought (ye may be sure) an unworthie indignitie, that when there was gold to be levied for redemption of the cittie out of the Gaules hands, it then should be gathered by a generall contribution of all: and the same gold, now recovered from the enemies, should be as a prey in the clutches of a few. Therefore they followed instantly upon him and were verie earnest to know, where so great a masse of mony and stollen good was hidden. But when he posited them off, and said he would in due time disclose all: they were not content, but setting all other matters apart, their whole care was employed about this busines, and nothing else. So as it plainly appeared that neither he should reape a meane thanke if he reported a truth, nor incurre a small offence and displeasure, in case he told a false tale.

Things hanging thus in these doubtfull termes, the Dictatour who was sent for, returned from the armie into the cittie. The next day he assembled the Senate: and after he had thoroughly founded and felt the minds of them, that were there met, he commaunded the Senatours not to depart from him: and assisted as he was with that companie, he caused the yvorie chaire of estate to be set in the Comitium or common hall, and sent a serjeant for M. Manlius. Who being thus peremptorily summoned by the Dictatours expresse commaundement, gave warning by a token to his complices and favourites, that there was a broile and fraie toward: and with a mightie redne of his followers, he presented himselfe before the Tribunal. On the one side, stood the Senatour, on the other the Commons: either part beholding their captaine, as it were in a pight field ready to joine battaile. Then after silence made, Would to God (quoth the Dictatour unto Manlius) I & the Senators of Rome, might in all other things fort as well with the Commons, as I am assured, we shall agree all together about thee, & the matter which I shal aske and demand of thee. I see thou hast put the cittie in some good hope, that by the Gaules treasure which the principall & chiefe of the Senators detain with them secretly hidden, all men may keepe their credit, and fully pay and discharge their debts. Which I for my part, so God me helpe, am so farre from hndering, that contraiwise I would exhort thee M. Manlius, to ease the Commons of Rome of the misers booke: to discover these fellows and make them knowne, that gape so greedily after the common treasure, and to disappoint them, & turne them out of this their privie bootie. Which if thou doe not effect, either for that thy selfe wouldest have a slice with them, or els because it is but a forged tale that thou hast made of thine own fingers ends, I will not faile, but commit

A commit thee to ward, and suffer no longer the multitude upon a vaine and deceitfull hope, thus by thee to be abused and disquieted. To this, Manlius made answer and said. I was nothing deceived but wist well enough, that a Dictatour was created not against the Volscians, who are enemies (forsooth) so oft as our great Masters thinke it for their purpose: nor against the Latines and Hernicks, whom they drive and provoke to rebellion by false & forged furnises: but against my selfe and the Commons of Rome. For now I see well, that the Dictatour professeth to maintaine and beare out the Vsurers against the Commons: and that against my selfe, for the favour that the multitude beareth unto me, there is matter devised to charge me withall, and to procure my utter ruine and overthrow. Doth it offend and grieve you, in deed, A. Cornelius, and you my Lords of the Senat, that the people thus stand about me on every side? Why doe not ye every man for his part, by your good deserts devise a funder this companie, and draw them away with you from me? Namely, by your mediation and intercession, by giving your word for them, by ridding out of gives and prison your fellow citizens, by saving them that are condemned, from being awarded to the thralldome of their creditours, and out of the overplus and superfluitie of your own living and goods, by relieving their present neede, and supplying their necessities? But what meane I to persuade you to forgo any thing of your owne, and bestowe it upon them? Take another course with them, and make them another offer. Doe but deduct out of the principall debt, that which hath been paid, for consideration of the loane. You shall soone see that my retinue will make no greater shew, than any other mans els. But why am I the onely man so carefull of the citizens and people? Certes, I can make no better answer hereunto, than C if one should aske me, wherefore I alone saved the Capitoll and the Cliffe? As I then yeelded my helping hand to all in generall, so will I now to my power relieve each one in particular. For as touching the treasure of the Gaules: the thing in it selfe being easie, this demand of yours maketh hard and difficult. For what neede you aske me that which you know already your selves? Why lay you not that open which is in your secret bosome, rather than to have it sifted & boulded out? But that there is some privie juggling, some cunning practise and packing therein? The more ye would seeme to have your leigerdmaine to be sought into and deteced: so much the more, I feare me, ye will hide it even from the eyes of those that are watchfull and quicksighted. And therefore am not I to be forced to reveale and shew where your stollen goods are: but you would be made, if you were well served, to bring them abroad into the view of the world. At these words, the Dictatour commanded him to leave off these foolish flimsies & trifling thrusts: urging him either to go through with his challenge and prove it true: or if he could not justifie it, to confesse that he had falsely slandered and wrongfully charged the Senat, and sought to bring upon them the ill will and hatred of men, for a vaine surmise and suspicion of theverie. But as he stoutly inferred and replied againe, that he would not speake at the pleasure of his enemies, nor owed them any such service: he commanded him to be had away to prison & kept in bonds. And as he was apprehended by the Officer, Optimus Maximus, Q. Juno Queene of heaven, Minerva, with other gods and goddesses, that inhabit the Capitoll and the Castle; Suffer ye your Knight and Defender, to be thus tugged, misused, and evill entreated by his adversaries? And shall this right hand wherewith I defeated the Gaules, & drave them from your chappels and shrines, be now pinnioned and manacled? There was no one man there, that saw & heard him, who could indure this indignitie. But this cittie, as most patient of all other citties to abide any just, righteous & lawfull commandment of the magistrate, contained her selfe and was content in some cases to be overruled: so far forth, that against the autoritie & absolute power of the Dictatour, neither the Tribunes of the Commons, nor the Commons themselves, durst either cast up their eyes to looke awry, or once open their mouthes. But after Manlius was committed, it was for certaine knowne, that a great sort of the Commoners, changed their weede and put on their worst apparell and mourning array: many a man let his head and beard grow long, yea and a number of them with sad and heavie cheere, kept commonly about the Goale dore.

F Now when the Dictatour triumphed over the Volscians, his triumph bred him more hatred and displeasure than honour and glorie: for it is commonly spoken, that he got it at home and not abroad, and triumphed over a citizen not over an enemy: and this only wanted, (say they) to make up his pride to the full, that Manlius was not led before his chariot. Whereupon ther was like to grow much scandale, and very sedition. For the appeasing and mitigation whereof, the Senate

nat upon a fodaine, without any motion made, of themselves became bountifull, and assigned 2000. cittizens of Rome to be sent to Sarricum to inhabit as a Colonie. And to every man was set out two acres & an halfe of land a peice. Which the Commoners construed to be a matter of nothing, a final boon bestowed upon a few, the very hire & reward for betraying Manlius. So that this proved a mischief for a remedie: and by this salve, the sore rather festered and rankled, than healed up, and the sedition thereby festered more and more. For now the crewe of Manlius his followers made shew of greater mourning and heavinesse, in their vile clothes and sad countenance, after the guise of persons accused during the time of their troubles. And when the feare and terror was once overlowne, by reason that the Dictatour after his triumph resigned up his authoritie, then folks hearts were set at libertie and their tongues walked at will. Some were heard in open audience to upbraid the multitude and cast in their teeth, That it was their fashions alwaies to lye up and advance their Protectours and Defenders into high places, and afterwards, in the very pitch of danger and point of downfall, to forsake and leave them destitute. Thus was Sp. Cassius served, that solicited the Commons to the division of lands: thus was Sp. Melius overthrowne, that put his hand to his purse, and at his own proper charges and expence, kept extreme famine from the hungrie chawes of the poore cittizens. Semblably, M. Manlius endeavouring to deliver a great part of the cittie (drowned as it were and overwhelmed in debt) and to enlarge them and set them abroad at libertie, now for his paines is betrayed unto his deadly enemies: so that the Commons doe feed and franke up, even for the shambles and butchers knife the fautors and maintainers of their weale and libertie. And ought in deed (say they) a Noble man, that sometimes had been Consul, thus to be misused, if he answered not to the good liking and pleasure of the Dictatour? Suppose, he had overreached and made a lie afore, and so had not a present and readie answer at the time: was there ever any servant and slave, for leasing cast in prison and laid up in yrons? And how could they forget that night, which was like to have been the last night that ever the Romanes should have seene: that fatall night of their final destruction for ever? Or how could they chuse, but have still in their cie the armie of the Gauls, clambing up the Cliffe Tarpeia? and how M. Manlius in person, so bravely besene in his armor, all swearing, all bleeding, rescued and saved Iupiter himselfe in a manner out of the enemies hands? What? Did they thinke that with halfe-pound measures of wheat meale, they had sufficiently recompensed the Saviour of their countrie? And whom they had well nere canonized amongst the holie hallowes of heaven, or at leastwise by his newe addition of * surname made equall to Iupiter Capitolinus, was it well done to suffer him, imprisoned in chaines, lying in a darke dungeon, to draw his lively breath at the pleasure of the hangman? Was he alone able to succour you all, and are ye all not able to helpe him alone? Thus ceased not the multitude to exclaime and make their plaints, & would not depart from that place, no not all the night long, but threatned to breake the prison by force. Vntill such time as they got that remitted, which otherwise they would have wretted, and Manlius by an act of the Senate was released out of prison and enlarged. Whereby the mutinie was never the more ended, but rather a Captaine given them to maintaine the Sedition.

About the same time the Latines and Hernicks, the inhabitants also of the Colonie Circeia, and they of Velitre, who came to excuse themselves for the Volscian war, wherein they were charged to have had their hands, and required to have the captives delivered, for to proceed against them, according to their owne lawes, had a heaveie answer. But the Coloners received the sharper check and rebuke, because they being Romane cittizens, were entred into that wicked plot and abominable action, to combine against their native countrie. And they were not only denied their prisoners, but also (wherin the Rom. dealt more favourably with the rest that were their Allies) were warned and commanded in the name of the Senat, to avoid and that with speede out of the cittie, from the sight and presence of the people of Rome: for feare least the privilege of Embassage, provided for the securitie and safe conduct of forraigners and not of cittizens, should not serve to protect them. Now when the Sedition of Manlius was set on foote againe, somewhat before the end of the yeare the great assembly was holden for the Election of Magistrats: wherein there were created Tribunes in Consuls authoritie Serg. Cornelius Maluginensis the second time, P. Valerius Potitus the second time, M. Furius Camillus the fifth time, Ser. Sulpitius Ruffus the second time, C. Papyrius Crassus, T. Quintius Cincinnatus the second time, all of Senatours calling.

In

A In the beginning of this year, peace they had with forraign nations; a matter very commodious both for the Senat and the Com. For the Com. in this regard, that being not called away by any musters, they had some good hope (especially having so mighty a champion) to be rid at once for ever of usurie. For the Senators again, because their minds being not distracted by any fear from abroad, might attend about curing & healing the intestine maladies at home. When both parts therefore were now more sharp set, & eagerly bent, they thought out of hand to trie what would be done, & to make either a shaft or a bolt of it. Manlius calling the Com. to his house, devised with the principal heads of them both day and night, to bring in a change and alteration of the State: and fuller of stomacke, anger and gaule he was now a good deale than aforetime. Needled he was, the rather by his late disgrace and shame, who never before had ben touched in credit, nor tasted of any reproch & contumelie. Heart he took unto him, for that the Dict. durst not execute that rigor against him, which Cincinnatus Quintius had extended upon Sp. Melius: and it seemed unto him, that not only the Dict. fought to wind himself out, & in resigning up his room, to avoid the offence given by his imprisonment; but also that the very Senat was not able to endure the maner of proceeding. With these imaginations being puffed up & galled too, he failed not withall to prick forward and exasperat the minds of the Com. who of themselves already, were kindled and set on fire. And with these and such like speeches he entertained them. How long (quoth he) I pray you, wil ye be ignorant, and not know what ye may do, and what power ye have? A thing that nature itselfe would not have so much as the very dumbe beasts, but to understand. Doe but count how many you are in number your selves, and how few adversaries ye have against you. If ye were but one to one, yet (I would thinke) you should more eagerly strive for to maintaine your libertie, than they, to set up their lordship. For, look how many favourites ye have ben, following and courting one patrone, so many shall ye now be opposed to one enemy. Make but shew only of war, ye shall have peace. Let them see you once readie to make head and offer violence, soone will they yeeld and part with their right. Either yee must adventure, all jointly together to doe somewhat, or else make account each one, to abide and suffer all. How long will yee stand looking from every side upon me? I for my part, surely, wil not faile any one of you. Look yee then to it, that fortune faile not me. I, even I, that was your redeemer and deliverer, was all at once (when it pleased mine enemies) taken downe and made no bodie. And yee, all of you, saw him led to prison, who saved every one of you from prison. If happily those mine enemies should attempt to do me more spight, D Where am I then? and what were I best to trust unto? Should I look for that end that Cassius and Melius came unto? Yee doe well to signifie how you dread the offe, and with the contrarie. And the gods forsend it should so come to passe. But look not that ever they should come down from heaven to protect mee. That mind they must give you, to preserve mee from so hard a hap, like as they gave me a resolute heart, both in mine armour to save you from barbarous enemies, and in my gowne to defend you from proud cittizens. Is there so little courage in you (so mightie a people otherwise) as to thinke it sufficient, and to stand contented, if you may bee backed onely, and meet with some helpe against your enemies; and to know no other skuffing with your adversaries (the Senators) but wherein you suffer your selves to be commanded in the end? This basenesse commeth not to you by kind. By use and custome onely, you are become their vassals and subjects. For what is the cause yee are so courageous against your enemies abroad, that yee think it meet and reason to rule and govern them? No other in truth but this, because with them you have bene ever wont to strive for soveraignetie, whereas against these, yee have bene used rather, to make some slight prouise and triall what you may doe by your libertie, than to doe your best & to put your selves forth for to maintaine it and extend it to the most. And yet what manner of chieftaines soever ye have met withall to lead you, and how soever affected ye have bene your selves, obtained yee have hitherto all things that yee shot at, were they never so great: Such was your might, or such was your felicitie. Wherefore now it is high time to give the adventure of greater matters also. Make but triall onelie of your owne good fortune, and of my selfe, whom I hope he have had happie experience of already: with lesse adoe shall ye be provided of one to overrule and commaund the Senatours, than ye have bene hitherto of those, that were to resist onely their imperious government. Downe we must with these Dictatorships and Consulships both, and lay them level with the ground: that the comminaltie of Rome may once be aloft, and beare up the head. Beslure your selves therefore, and play the men. Hinder proceffe and course of law for actions of debt. I professe my selfe a Patrone of the Commons, which name

Of Manlius to the

my care over you, my faithfulness to you, hath induced me with. And if you please to entitle your G leader and captain, with a more glorious title of honour and majesty, ye shall find it more potent and available to effect that which you long for and desire. And so from that time forward, began some practise to set up the government of a king: But neither who were the agents in this action, nor to what termes these plots proceeded, is it plainly enough recorded. But on the other side, the Senators sat in counsell, and debated about the Secession and secret meeting of the Commons in the privat house of Manlius, and that house, which stood (as it fell out) upon the castle hill: likewise of that imminent engine and fabrick, devised for the overthrow of the present libertie. Many were of opinion, and spake it aloud, That there was need of a Servilius Hala, who not by commaunding a publicke enemy of the State to prison, would provoke him and make him more eager; but by dispatching of one wicked member out of the way, & cutting him off, might end this intestine and civile warre. But they came downe at length, and grew to a resolution, in words milder, yet in deed and effect all one, THAT THE MAGISTRATS SHOULD HAVE A CAREFULL EYE, THAT BY THESE MISCHIEVOUS PLOTS AND PRACTISES OF MAR. MANLIUS, THE COMMONWEALE INCURRED NO DAMMAGE AND HURT.
Then the Tribunes in Consuls authoritie, and the other Tribunes of the Commons (for even they also seeing, that in the losse of the publicke libertie of all, their power likewise should come to an end, had yielded to be adviced and ruled by the Senate) laid all their heads together, and consulted what course was best to bee taken. When as no man could bedinke of any way, but plaine violence and bloudshed (a peece of worke in all appearance, of great adventure & doubt-full hazard) then M. Menenius, and P. Publius, two Tribunes of the Commons stepped forth and said: What meane we to make that, a quarrell between the Senators and Commons, which the whole bodie united of the citie, indeed should undertake against so dangerous and pestilent a member? Why trouble wee our selves to set upon him and the Commons with him, whome by the means of the very Commons themselves, it were the safer course, and lesse offensive to the citie? that being furcharged and overweighed with his owne power whereupon he presumeth, he may fall downe and take his overthrow. Wee are fully minded to arrest him, to convent him judicially, and call him to his answer. Nothing is lesse popular, and more odious to the people, than to heare of kinge government againe. The multitude shall not so soon see and perceive, that our quarrell is not with them, but that they shall become his competent Iudges, and passe upon him, who now are his advocates: also, that his accusers from out of the Commons, shall behold one of the Nobilitie to hold up his hand at the barre, & the enditement framed, upon the crime of usurping the kingdome: but (be ye sure of it) they will tender and favour the faire looks and person of no man, before the cause of their owne free estate. When all the house liked well, and allowed of this advise and overture, they made no more ado, but served Manlius with processe to answer at a day appointed. Which was not so soone done, but the Commons at the very first, began to storme and be enraged, especially when they saw the accused man, during his trouble so routly arraigned, accompanied with none of the Senators, nor so much as one of his kindred and affinitie, no nor his very brethren Au and T. Manlius. A thing before that day never scene nor knowne, but that in so great a danger as this was, the nearest kinsfolke in bloud, did change their weed. For even when Ap. Claudius was committed and imprisoned, C. Claudius his adversarie, yea, and the whole linage and name of the Claudij, were mournfully clad, and poorly apparel-led. Now surely (say they) it is a very compact amongst them all, that this popular man, so gracious and wellbeloved, should be confounded and overthrowne, because hee was the first that ever fell away from the Senators to the Commons. When the day was come of his arraignment, I can find in no author, what was objected against the prisoner by his accusers, directly tending to prove the crime of aspiring to a kingdome, but onely the conventicles of the multitude, certain tedious words, his overmuch largesse, and his forged surmise and false information of the gold.
I doubt not but there was matter of great importance, urged and enforced against him, seeing that the Commons delay in proceeding to his condemnation, was not long of his cause, but occasioned by the place onely. This one thing seemeth worthie to be noted, and for all mens learning, that how notable and how great soever his honor, worship, & commendable parts were, the soule and cursed desire of tyrannicall rule, made not onely unpleasant and without grace, but also odious and detestable in the eyes of the people. He brought forth, as it is reported, welcome foure hundred men, whome hee had laid out monie for gratts, and without any interest or consideration:

A deration: those whose goods he saved from port sale, and kept from the bondage of their creditors, after they were condemned. Over and besides, he not onely reckoned up, but shewed also in open sight, the honourable testimonies of his service in the warres: as the spoiles of his enemies by him slaine and disarmed, to the number of 300: giftes bestowed upon him by Generals in way of reward 400: amongst which were two goodly murall garlands for scaling and entering upon the wals first: eight civick coronets for saving the lives of citizens in danger. Moreover he presented there in place, the parties themselves in person, whom he had rescued out of the enemies hands: and amongst them he nominated C. Servilius at that instant Generall of the horsemen, and now absent. And when he had rehearsed his noble feats of armes, and amplified them according to the height of their worth in a most glorious and eloquent Oracion, as one whose words were futable and answerable to his deeds: at the last he stript his breast bare, and shewed the scarres there remaining of wounds received in the warres: and ever and anon looking to the Capitoll, oftsoones he called aloud upon Iupiter and the other gods, to helpe him now in this extremitie and peril of his state: and praied that the same mind which they had given him to defend the Capitoll cliffe, and even to the safeguard of the people of Rome, they would vouchsafe the same people, in this distresse of his wofull calamitie: beseeching them both all and some, to looke up to the cliffe, and to the Capitoll, to turne themselves toward the gods there, and so to proceed to judgement of him. All the whiles the people were cited and called by their Centuries, and the prisoner stretched forth his hands, and converted his praiers from men to the Gods; the Tribunes evidently saw, that unlesse they freed the eyes of the people from C beholding the memoriall of so great a desert, it would never be that so long as their mindes were thus forestalled and possessed with that benefit of his, they would find the enditement, were it never so true. So the matter being put off and deferred to another day, the people were summoned to assemble in the grove Petelinus, without the gate Flumentana, from whence they might not have a sight of the Capitoll. There the accusation prevailed more than compassion, and the matter went against him: and so with hard and obdurate hearts, they pronounced a heave and dolo-rous sentence, and which the verie Iudges themselves had in horror. Some there be that say there were Duumvirs ordained for the purpose, to make inquisition and sit upon this treason against the State. Thus being condemned, the Tribunes caused him to be throwne headlong downe the rocke Tarpeia. Which place was the selfe same that yielded to that one man a monument and D memoriall both of singular glorie, and also of extreame punishment and ignominious death.
After his death there remained two infamous markes behind him of shame: the one publicke, occasioned by his dwelling house. For whereas it was situate, where now the chappell and workhouse, or min-house of Moneta standeth, an Act was proposed unto the people, That none of the Senators linage should dwell on the cliffe or Capitoll mount. The other proceeding more properly from his owne line and kindred: For that by a generall decree of the house of Manlij it was provided, That none of that familie and race should ever after beare the name of M. Manlius. This was the end of him, who, but that he was borne in a free citie, had become a right worthie and renowned man.

But the people being now past all danger from him, calling to mind and considering without all affection, his vertues as they were, found a misse of him shortly after. Yea and for the pestilence also which ensued soone upon, for that there could be no causes knowne of so great mor-talitie, was imagined of many a man, to have growne upon the execution of Manlius: arguing thus, That the Capitoll was polluted with the blood of the saviour thereof: and the gods tooke no delight and pleasure to have (as it were) presented unto their eyes, the punishment of that man, by whose meanes their temples had beene delivered out of the hands of the enemies. Upon this plague and scarcitie of corne withall, and the common brute that spread abroad both of the one and the other, there ensued the yeare following many warres, whenas L. Valerius the fourth time, A. Manlius the third time, Ser. Sulpitius the third time, L. Lucretius, L. Aemilius the third time, and M. Trebonius were Tribunes Militarie in Consuls authoritie. For besides the Volsicians, who by destinie were appointed for ever in a manner to busie and keepe occupied the Romane soldi-ours; besides the Colonies Circeia and Velitre, which a long time were about to rebell; besides Latium, that stood in doubtfull termes and was suspected, the Lanuvines also, who had become a most fast and loiall citie, all of a suddaine rose and became new enemies. The LL. of the Senate supposing all this grew upon contempt, for that the revolting of the Veliternes, who were their

their naturall citizens, had so long time escaped punishment, decreed with all speed to move the people to denounce and proclaime open warre against them. And to the end that the Common might be more forward in this Militarie service, they created certaine Quinqueviri for the division of the Pompeine lands: and Triumviri for the planting of a colonie at Neper. Then they propounded unto the people, that they would appoint and determine of the warre to be made. And notwithstanding the Tribunes of the Com. labored earnestly, but all in vaine, to dissuade, yet the tribes throughout generally granted it, and gave their voices for warre. All that yeare passed in preparations onely, but no armie set forth by reason of the plague: which protracting of time and long delay, gave the inhabitants of the Colonies respite to sue unto the Senate for peace. Many of them were inclined and stood thus affected, to send a solemne embassage with humble supplication to Rome: but that (as commonly it falleth out) the publicke person was entangled and interestled with the jeopardie of some private persons: and the authors of the backsliding and revolt from the Romans, fearing least they alone should beare all the blame and be delivered up as a sacrifice to satisfie the wrath of the Romanes, turned away cleane and alienated the Colonies from all consultation of seeking for peace. And not onely in their counsell house was this Embassage then crossed, but many of the Commons also they excited to invade the territories of Rome, to drive booties, and make spoile. This new wrong by them offered, cleane put them by all hope of peace. In that yeare was the first rumour raised, concerning the rebellion also of the Prenestines. And when the Tusculans, Gabines, & Lavicanes, into whose marches they had made inrodes, complained unto the Senate, and laid much matter against them, they received at their hands so calme and cold an answer, that it seemed they gave lesse credite to their complaints, because these were not willing they should proove true.

The yeare following, Sp. and L. Papyrius, new Tribunes Militarie with Consuls authoritie, led the legions to Veitire, whose foure Colleagues, Ser. Cornelius Maluginensis the fourth time, Quintus C. Sulpicius, L. Aemilius the fourth time, were left Tribunes behind for defence of the citie; and for feare least they should heare some intelligence of new and fresh stirres out of the citie, where they suspected all would be nought. At Veitire they had the better hand of their enemies: they found more Prenestines well neere, that came to succour, than the very Colonies themselves. For the citie was so neere at hand, that it both gave the enemies occasion to the the sooner, and yielded them the onely place of safe refuge, after they were fled. The Tribunes forbore to assault the towne, as well in regard of the dangerous enterprise, as also because they thought it not good to hold fight to the utter destruction of that Colonie. Letters were dispatched to Rome with tidings of victorie, emplying more sharpe informations against the Prenestines than the Veliternes. So by an Act of the Senate and assent of the people, there was proclaimed warre against the Prenestines. Who in the yeare following joined with the Volturnians, and by force won Satricum a Colonie of the people of Rome, notwithstanding it was stoutly and valiantly defended by the townsmen even to the last. Where most beastly and cruell they executed their victorie upon those that they tooke prisoners, and put them to the sword. The Romans took this in a verie ill part: and elected M. Furius Camillus Tribune Militarie the seventh time: who had for his companions in office, A. and Lucius Posthumius Regillensis, L. Furius and L. Lucretius, and M. Fabius Ambulius.

The Volturnian warre was appointed to Camillus extraordinarily: and to assist him therein, it fell to L. Furius his lot, one of the State Tribunes, not so much for the good of the Commonwealth, as to minister unto his fellow all matter of honour and renowne: as well in publique, (for that he fell all upright againe, which by the rashnesse of Lucius was fallen downe) as also in private, for that out of his error and milddoing, Marcus Furius, rather sought for thanks and love at his hands, than aimed at any vaine glorie to himselfe. Camillus was now farre growne and ripe in yeares and verie aged, and when in the assembly for Election, he was about to take the usual forme of oath, for to excuse his feeble and crasse bodie, the people with one consent would not permit him. Howbeit for all his age, he caried a lively spirit & lustie courage with him still: his senses were all ireth & found: and the late civill affaires had stirred him up and gave him an edge, who now had no great mind to manage martial exploits. So he gathered a power of four legions, consisting of 4000 a peece, & made proclamation that all his forces should be ready the next day, at the gate Elquilina, & then he put himself in his journey to Satricum. The enemy who had woon the Colony, nothing dismayd therat, & trusting in the number of his soldiours, wherein

A he had the better by odds, expected and staied his coming there. And so soone as he understood that the Romanes approached, forthwith came into the field, minding without delay to put it to an hazard and trie it out: presuming, that the skill of the Romanes general, were hee never so singular (in whom their enemies only trusted) would litle or naught availe, in regard they were so few in number. The Romane armie was as hote as they, and one of their Generals as forward every way. And presently without any stay, had they tried the fortune of a battaile, but for the policie and rule of one man, who by holding off, and protracting time of fight, sought so to help himself through good order and skill. But so much the more the enemy urged still, and was more sharptet: so as now he not onely raunged his men before his owne campe in battell array, but also set forward into the mids of the field: and advancing himselfe with ensignes displayed, neer unto the

B trench and rampier of his enemies, made a proud bravado and shew of his strength, whereupon he bare himselfe so confidently. This could the Romane souldiours hardly endure: and L. Furius one of the Tribunes Militarie, had more adoe by farre to digest and put up that at the enemies hand. And a venturous knight he was, both by reason of his youthfull yeares and naturall disposition: and also puffed up with hope of the multitude, which commonly taketh heart, and prestmeth upon smallest grounds, and buildeth upon greatest uncertainties. And the souldiours being of themselves already hot ynough, he inflamed and set them more on fire, by elevating and making light of his fellows reputation, in regard of his old age, the onely thing that hee could allege: giving out ever and among, that wars were for young men, that mens hearts flourish and faded as their bodies did; which was scene in Camillus, who of a most valourous and forward

L. Furius to his souldiours.

C warrior, was now become a draw-back and a temporiser, and one that would take his leasure: and he that was wont, so soon as he came to a place, with the first assault to win forts & strong towns, now within his mures and rampier sat still and trifled out the time. And what hopes had he? Dreameth he, that either his owne power should encrease, or his enemies strength decrease? What occasion, what oportunitie of time, what place of vantage for ambush laid hee for? Tush, these policies and inventions of the good old man, are cold and clumisie, God wot. In faith, Camillus, as he hath lived long ynough, so hath he gained glorie ynough. To what purpose then (quoth hee) should we suffer the whole puissance of a cittie, which ought indeed to be immortall, for to age and waxe old with the bodie of one man, whom all men see to bee but mortall. With these and such like words he had drawne away the whole campe after him: and when from all parts there-

D of, they called hard, and cried for battell, we are not able (quoth he) M. Furius, to keepe in and repress any longer the violence of our souldiours: and as for the pride of the enemy, whose courage by our delays wee have encreased, and who insulteth over us, it is intollerable. Give place then, you that are but one man, and yeeld unto us al. Suffer your selfe to be overcome with reason and counsell, that you may sooner overcome by force and armes. Hereunto Camillus made answer againe: What warres soever (quoth hee) unto this present day have by mine owne entire conduct, and sole direction been managed, neither can you nor the people of Rome denie, but that in them you never repented, either of my policie or happie successe. Now I know full well, that I have a companion joined with mee, in governement and rule of egall commission; for the prime and lustinesse of youth, much above me, & my better. And as to the armie, I have indeed

L. Furius to M. Furius.

M. Furius his answer to L. Furius, and the souldiours.

E been used ever to commaund, and not to be commaunded: but yet my fellows authoritie, I cannot be against. Let him doe in gods name, what he thinketh good for the Commonwealth, and God speed his hand. Onely in regard of mine old age I crave this favour, that I may not be set in the forefront: but for other devours, looke what an old man may or ought to doe in warre, therein surely I shall not faile. And this one thing would I crave at the hands of the immortal gods, that some notable mishap befall not, to make my former counsell good and praiseworthy. But neither would men be ruled by his advice so profitable and wholesome, nor the gods vouchsafe to heare his prayers so holy and devout. Then Lucius Furius, the author and principall persuader of battell, setteth the vauntgard in array. Camillus hee fortifieth the regiments and squadrons for supplie in the rereward: but above all, he placeth a strong guard before the camp. Himselfe took

F up his standing on a higher place, to behold and marke the issue of another mans counsell. So soone as at the first brunt and encounter, they rustled and made a noise with their armour, the enemies for the nones (of policie, and not for fear) gave footing and lost ground. Now, there was behind them on their backe a pretie rising of an hill, betwene their campe and the battell: and by reason that they were well stored of men, they had left behind them in the campe certaine strong companies armed and well appointed: with this instruction, that whiles both armies were hard in fight, and when their enemies should come neere their trench and rampier, they might fallie out on a suddaine upon them. The Romanes following out of measure upon the enemies as they reculed, were drawne upon the disadvantage of the ground, and gave occasion and fit opportunitie unto the enemy to issue out of the camp upon them. So the terror returned upon the supposed victors, by reason both of the new supplies of the enemies, and also of the fall and descent of the hill: and forced the battaile of the Romanes to give back. The Volscians that charged them from out of the campe, and were fresh and lustie, pressed hard upon them: they also that made as though they fled, began now to fight againe. The Romanes souldiours forgetting now both their late lustinesse, and their auncient honour, retired not easily and softly in good order, but plaine turned their backs on all sides, fled amaine by heapes, and ran avie toward their owne campe. Whereat Camillus being by them that attended about his person, mounted upon a good courser, and with all the speed he could make, opposing the squadrons of the reeward against the enemy: Is this (quoth he) the fight, you souldiours, that yee so called for? what God, what man can yee lay the weight on now? It was your rashnesse and foolhardinesse afore: and it is your dastardly cowardise now, and nothing els, that is the cause of all this. Followed yee have already one Generall. Follow Camillus now a while: and as yee have bene alwaies wont by my leading, once more win the victorie. What looke you toward the hold and the campe? there is no coming thither, there is no being there for any of you without victorie. At the first they were ashamed, and staied themselves from farther flight: but after that they saw once the ensignes wheele about, and the squadrons turne againe, they made head, and charged the enemy amaine. And the Generall himselfe, a man renowned for so many triumphs, and besides, for his venerable age so reverend, even amongst the foremost ensignes, amid the greatest perils, & most distressed, advanced forth in person. Hereupon every one for his part, set the better leg forward, provoked his fellow withall, and encouraged one another, so as with a cheerefull and lively shout, the whole field rang againe. Neither was the other Tribune behind hand for his part: but being sent by his Colleague unto the horsemen (whiles he in the meane time marshalled againe the footmen in order), not by way of chiding (for what might he avails thereby, so long as hee was himselfe in fault as well as the rest) but laying aside all lordly command, fell wholly to entreating, and besought them both all and some to quit themselves like men, and acquit him of the guilt and blame of that unluckie daies worke. Indeed (quoth hee) when my brother Camillus would not agree thereto, but expressly forbade, yet I chose rather to be partaker of the folly and rashnes of all, than the wildome and sage advise of one. Camillus (come what will of it, speed you well, or speed you ill) seeth the glorie will be his: but I, unlesse the battell bee revived, shall take such part as you all, (a most miserable and pitious case) but the shame will redound and light upon my head and none els. Well, at length they agreed, and thought it best to abandon their horses to bestow them among the waving and disordered companies, and on foot to make head upon the enemies. Thus they goe both together, as bravely minded with resolution, as they were richly and gorgeously armed. And in what part soever they saw the footmen most distressed, there wanted neither in the Generalls nor in the souldiours, courage in the highest degree to fight it out lustily. Well was it seene by the happie event, that valourous endeavors speed ever well. For the Volscians the same way that erewhile they made semblance of giving ground upon a counterfeit fear, now fled in good badnesse as hard as they could. A great number both in the conflict, and after in the chase were slaine. As for the rest that remained in the campe, which presently at one brunt was woen, more of them were taken prisoners than killed. In the view and account taken of the captives, there were some of them knowne to be Tuscules, who were shed apart from the rest, and brought before the State-Tribunes. And upon examination, confessed flatly, that they served by the publicke warrant of the citie. Camillus herewith disquieted, for feare of warre from so neere neighbours, said hee would forthwith have those prisoners with him to Rome, that the Lords of the Senate might not be ignorant how the Tuscules were revolted from their societie. In the meane while, his brother Tribune might, if he so pleased, have the regiment of the leaguer and the host. That daies worke had taught him now, not to preferre his own waies before the better counsell of another. And yet neither he himselfe, nor any man els in the armie, thought that Camillus would quietly digest this fault of his, whereby the State of the Commonwealth was driven upon so dangerous a point of downefall. And as well in the host, as also at Rome, it was rife and driven.

A and currant in everie mans mouth: that whereas the fight with the Volscians was variable, and the service doubtfull: For the ill speed, the discomfiture, and the running away, L. Furius was all in fault: but for the good successe, Camillus onely had all the honour.

When the captives were brought into the counsell house, and the Lords of the Senat were of opinion and determined warre against the Tuscules, and had laid the charge thereof upon Camillus, he requested to have an assistant joyned with him in commision: and being left to his own choise to take whom he would of all his companions in office, contrarie to all mens expectation, he chose L. Furius. By which moderation of his affections, and good carriage of himselfe, he both delaied the infamie of his colleague, and won himselfe great glorie and commendation. Yet for all this, proceeded not they to any warre with the Tuscules. For they by their constant observation of peace, kept off the violence of the Romanes, which by force of armes they had not been able. When the Romanes entred and invaded their territorie, they went not so much as out of those places that lay neare the high way, whereas the enemy marched: they forlet not the tilling of their grounds, but kept the gates of their cittie wide open, came forth solemnly in their long gownes to meete with the LL. Generalls in the waie, and brought victuals right courteously to serve the armie, as well out of the cittie as countrie. Camillus having pitched down his tents before the gates, and desirous to know, whether there were the same appearance of peace within the wals, as bare shew abroad in the countrie, entred the cittie: and seeing the doores standing open, the shop windowes up, all kinde of wares set out to sale upon the bulkes: the Crafts-men and Artisans busily every one occupied at his worke: the Grammar-schools ringing againe with a chime of schollers, learning and saying their lessons: the streetes full of women and children amongst the other common people going too & fro about their busines: he could perceive no where about him any thing that carried a resemblance of fearefull men, no nor so much as of those that made any wonder at their coming in that warlike order. Thus cast he his eyes into every corner, seeking where this warre should be. For there was not so much as any token to be seene, either of ought removed out of the way, or brought in place, upon this present occasion: but all in so seded quietnesse and peace, as if they had scarcely heard any inking or rumour of hostilitie. Being therefore overcome with this patience and sufferance of the enemies, he caused their Senat to assemble, unto whom he spake in this wise: Ye alone to this daie of all that I know, O Tuscules, have found the only armour of prooffe, & the forcible sense indeed, to save your selves and all ye have from the Romanes yre. Go your waies to Rome unto the Senat there. The Lords of the counsell will weigh and consider, whether ye deserved more punishment before, than pardon now. I will not forestall and pick my selfe a privat thank for a publicke benefit. At my hands ye shall have this favour and libertie, to speake for your selves and plead your own cause: as the Senat shall thinke good, so shall you speede of your suit. After that the Tuscules were come to Rome, and their Senat (who but a while afore had been faithfull Allies and kept their allegiance) scene to stand waiting with heaveie cheere and giving their attendance at the entrie of the court and counsell chamber: the Lords of the Romane Senate, were presently moved thereat, and caused them forthwith to be called in, and received by way of hospitality, more like than hostilitie. Then the Dictatour of Tuscum made this speech & said: Right honourable Senatours, we against whom ye have proclaimed and made warre, came forth to encounter your Generalls and Legions, armed and appointed as ye see us at this present standing in the porch of your counsell house. This was our array, this was the habit of our Comons, and alwaies shall be, unlesse at any time we shall put on armes for you and in your quarrel. Thanks we yeeld to your captaines and to your armies, that they have beleevd rather their eyes than their eares: and where they saw no hostilitie at all, there they offered none themselves. That peace which we have shewed and observed, the same crave we humbly still at the hands of your clemencie. Turne we beseech you from us your forces thither, where warre is to be found. And if we must needs make triall (by suffering ought) of your puissance and power bent against us, we will trie it surely without armour. This is our full resolution, God grant it prove as fortunate, as it is well meant and proceeding from a single heart. As for the trespasses, wherupon ye were moved to denounce warre against us: although it be bootlesse and to no purpose to disprove that by words, which by deed is already proved: yet surely, were they never so true, we thinke verely, that without prejudice to our selves, we may safely confesse the same, since that we have so evidently repented thereof. And for you, so long as you be worthie to have so full satisfaction made, it skilleth not, what default or transgression be committed against you. Thus much in effect spake the Tuscians. At the very instant they obtained peace: and not long after, the right of free burgesie, to be made citizens of Rome. So the Legions were withdrawn backe againe from Tusculum. Thus Camillus having won great honour by his pollicie and valour both, in the Volscian warre: by his happy successe in the journey of Tusculum: by his singular patience and cariage of himselfe, toward his companion in government, as well in the one place as the other, went out of his Magistracie: there being created Tribunes Militarie for the next yeare, L. Valerius the fifth time, and Pub. Valerius the third time. C. Servilius the third time. Licinius Menenius the second time. P. Papirius, Serg. Cornelius Maluginensis.

There was this yeare neede of Censors also, by reason especially of the doubtfull rumors that ran concerning debts: whiles of the one side the Tribunes of the Commons did aggravate the greatnesse thereof, and made it seeme an odious matter: and they againe of the other side, did elevate and made little of the same, for whom it was good & beneficiall, that the Lentmony should be thought abroad, in danger of being lost: for that (say they) the debtors cautelously rather would not, than for abilitie could not, keepe their credite and make payment. So there were created Censors, C. Sulpitius Camerinus, Sp. Posthumius Regillensis. And this matter now already commended, was broken off by the death of Posthumius, because it would have bred a scruple to chuse another Censor in the roome of him deceased. When Sulpitius therefore had resigned up his place, it fell out so that other new Censors upon some error committed in their creation, exercised not their office: and to chuse a third time they made a scruple, so spice conscientized were they, as if the Gods were not well pleased with that office for that yeare. But the Tribunes would not endure this deluding of the Commons, but gave it forth that it was intollerable: saying, That the Senat sought to avoid the exhibiting of publicke records and bookes, which gave testimonie of the valuation of every mans substance to the worth: because they would not have the sums of debts to be seene and knowen, which might bewray and plainly shew, that one part of the citie was even eaten up and devoured of the other: and in the meane time the poore Commons so deeply engaged, were packed away, and sent forth against these enemies & those: and now without all regard and discretion, they sought occasions to quarrell and make warre in every place. From Antium to Satricum, from Satricum to Velitre, from thence to Tusculum have your Legions been posted. And now forsooth, there is warre intended against the Latines, Hernicks and Prenestines: for hatred rather of the citizens here at home, than of the enemies abroad: and all to weare out the Commons with continuall wars, and to afford them no breathing while within the citie: that in time of rest, they might remember and thinke upon their thingedom, keepe their roomes in common assembly, where they might yet at the length heare their Tribunes voice, pleading for the easement of usurie, and for a small end of all injuries. But and if the Commons had the heart, and carried that mind with them, as to call to remembrance their aunccestors libertie, they would suffer neither any citizen of Rome to be awarded to bondage for debt, nor any musters to be taken, untill a view were made and just accompt had, of every man his debts, and some course taken for abating the same: that each man might know, what he had of other mens goods, what remained of his owne: whether his bodie were left free, or at the mercie of his creditour, to lie in cold yron and balefull prison. This hire and salarie of sedition, this reward once propounded aforehand, stirred up (you may be sure) a mutinie soon after. For whereas there were many adjudged to be bound unto their creditors, and the Senators had decreed new Legions to be levied, for the bruit and rumour that went of the Prenestine warres: both matters began to be hindered for taking any effect, as well by the Tribunes helpe as the Commons accord. For neither would the Tribunes suffer those that were condemned to be led to prison: nor yet the younger sort of the Commons, enter their names in the Muster-master his booke. And the Senatours for the present, lesse minded the execution of judgment for the creditours behoufe, than the mustering. For why? Newes came already, that the enemies had put themselves in their journey from Preneste, and were encamped in the Sabines countrie. And all this while, the very tidings hereof rather quickned and provoked the Tribunes of the Commons to the broile that was begun, than frighted them any jot from it. Neither would any thing serve to quench the sedition in the citie, untill the warre was come in manner to the verie walles. For the Prenestines had intelligence given them, that in Rome there was no armie gathered, no Generall certainly knowne: the Senators and Commons at jarre and together together by the eares. Their captaines hereupon, taking this vantage and opportunitie, with a running campe invaded, spoiled and wasted the fields all afore them as they went, and came with banners displaid before the gate Collina. Great feare was in the citie, everie man cried Alarm, ran up to the wals to man them, and to the gates to ward them. And at the last they left their mutinies, turned to the wars, and created T. Quintius Cincinnatus Dictator. He appointed for his Generall of horsemen, A. Sempronius Atratinus. This was not so soone voyced abroad (so great a terrour went alwaies with that magistrate) but the enemies withall dislodged and departed from the wals: and the younger sort of the Romanes, without any hasting and drawing backe, upon the proclamation, gathered together. Whiles forces were thus a raising at Rome, the enemies pitched their camp not farre from the river Allia: and as they harried the country all about, they bragged and vanted among themselves, that they had gotten that very plot of ground, which was ever fatal to the destruction of the citie of Rome. Here will be (say they) the like sight, as from hence will they flie, no doubt, as sometimes they did before in the Gauls warre. For if the Romanes feared that dismall and unluckie day, noted with the infamous name of this place, how much more will they dread the river Allia it selfe, in memoriall of their so great overthrow, than the onely bare day Alliensis? Certes, when they are come hither, they will thinke they see againe the grimme lookes, and heare the hideous voices of those savage Gauls. Thus rolling and tossing with themselves these roysish conceits, rising of as vaine and foolish presumptions, they rested wholly and reposed their full hope in the luckie persuasion only of the place. The Romanes contrariwise knew full well, that their enemies the Latines, were (wheresoever they were) the verie same men still, and no other, whom for the space of one hundred yeares, they held peaceably and quietly as their devoted vassals in subjection. And as for the place noted in deed, for the memoriall of that late disfigure and losse sustained, it might rather stirre them up and set an edge upon them to abolish and cancel the remembrance of that shameful disgrace, than put them in feare, that anie ground should be so unfortunate, as to be a barre unto their victorie. Nay if the verie Gauls themselves came now in their way, they would so fight with them even in that ground, as they did at Rome, in the recoverie of their countrie: as they did the morrow after at Gabij: when they bare themselves so valiantly, that no one enemy that entred within the wals of Rome, went ever home againe to tell newes how they sped, well or ill. Thus on both sides being resolute, and courageously bent, they met at Allia. The Romane Dictator discovering the enemies arranged in battaile array, within sight. See you not (quoth he) O A. Sempronius, how they have staid at Allia, presuming upon the luckines of the place? No surer confidence no greater helpe may they have, I pray God. But you, with trustie armour, keene weapons, and doubtlesse courage, set spurs to horse, gallop amongst the thickest of their maine battaile with your horsemen, I with the legions on foot, will advance mine ensignes, & display them, in their faces, and charge them sorely when they are disbanded ones, and put in fear. Assist us now, and aid us, O ye gods (the witnesses of our league) & punish them duly for their deserts, both in dishonoring your divine majestie, and deceiving us in your name, whom they called solemnly to witnesse. Neither horsemen nor footmen, could the Prenestines abide, but at the very first shout & shock were the rankes broken. And seeing their battaillons in no place whole and kept together, they fled: and amased as they were in that confused feare, and carried away beyond their owne camp, they staid not running for life, untill by good footmanship they were come within the sight of Preneste. There, all such as had beene scattered in the flight, met together, and chose a plot of ground to fortifie in that hast as well as they could: least peradventure, if they had put themselves within the towne, forthwith their villages should have been fired, and after all continued and spoiled, the towne also might fortune to be besieged. But when the Romane Conqueror after the rising of their campe at Allia, was once come toward them and discovered, they abandoned that fort also, and gat within the towne Preneste, thinking themselves scarce safe ynough within the wals thereof. Eight townes besides there were, under the signiorie of the Prenestines, against which the Dictator warred round: and having won them all, one after another without much ado, he brought his armie against Velitre, and got that towne also by assault. Then came hee to the principall head and very fear town of the warre, Preneste, which was not by force won, but by surrender yeelded up into his hands. And T. Quintius thus having obtained one victorie in a pight field, won two campes and holds of the enemies, conquered by force nine townes, and regained Preneste surrendred unto him, returned home againe to Rome. In his triumph triumph he carried aloft the Image of Jupiter, surnamed Emperour, which he brought from Pre-nestre, and set it up in the Capitoll, where it was placed and dedicated between the shrines of Jupiter and Minerva: and in a table of brasse fixed under it, was the monument of this noble exploit recorded and engraven in these or such like words: T. QUINTIUS DICTATOR, BY THE GRACIOUS HELPE OF IUPITER, AND ALL THE REST OF THE GODS, VVAN NINE TOWNES. Soon the 20 day after his creation, he resigned up his Dictatorship.

Then was the assemblie holden for electing of Tribunes Militarie with Consularitie, who were equally chosen from out of the Nobilitie and the Com. Of Nobles were created, P. and C. Manlius, with L. Julius. The Commons yeilded C. Sextilius, M. Albinus, and L. Antistius. Vpon the two Manlys, for that in bloud and degree they were above the Commons, and for favour more gracious than Julius, the province of the Volscians was bestowed extraordinarily, without casting lots, or parting together by agreement of the Colleague amongst themselves. Which both they themselves rued, and the Senators also (that would have it so) repented afterwards. For without any epials, sent out aforehand to scoure the coasts, they had set forth certain cohorts or companies (of footmen) a foraging, and when upon a false alarm that those were beset and in-trapped, they marched themselves apace after, to their rescue and convoy, & kept not with them still, the reporter of these tidings (who being indeed a Latine and an enemy, but disguised in the habit of a Roman souldier, had deceived them) they fel headlong into a traine and ambushment laid of purpose for them. And whiles they made resistance with main force onely, in a ground of great disadvantage (giving and taking the like measure) they were killed and slaine on either side.
 But in the meane time their enemies from another quarter, entered the campe of the Romans, lying open in the plain. Thus in both places, things went but badly and untowardly, & all through the rashnes and unskillfulness of the leaders. And what remained unfoiled for the fortune of the people of Rome, that, was preserved by the hardie and resolute valor of the Roman souldiers onely, without the helpe of generall and commander. Vpon which news reported at Rome, at the first was thought good to chuse a Dictator: but afterwards when tidings came, that all was whole, and the Volscians quiet, and that it was well seene they knew not how to use a victorie when they had it, nor to take the oportunitie of the time, whiles it offered it selfe; both the Generals & the armie were sent for home from thence, and so, for the Volscians they were at rest afterwards. Onely in the very end of the year, there arose some new stir and suddain tumult, by reason that the Prenestines having solicited the people of the Latines, entered into rebellion againe. In the same year the men of Setia made mone of themselves for want of people, and thither new Coloners were assigned to inhabite there.

Albeit the Romanes sped but badly in warres, yet the quietnesse at home was some comfort: which the Tribunes Militarie chosen from out of the Commons had procured, by reason that they were so gracious and revered among those of their owne coat and faction. All the beginning of the yeare following, was at the first on a light fire with hore discord and mutinie, when Sp. Furius, Q. Servilius the second time, Licinius Menenius the third time, P. Claius, M. Horatius and L. Geganus were Tribunes Militarie with Consularitie. The matter and cause of which seditious broiles, were the debts above specified. For the due inquisition whereof, and to know to what sums they amounted, Sp. Servilius Priscus, and Q. Claius Siculus were made Censors, but stopped they were for doing any thing, by occasion of warres. For first fearefull messengers in all hast brought word, and after, the flight of the countrie people confirmed it, that the legions of the Volscians were entred into the confines, and fell to spoiling everie where the territorie about Rome. Notwithstanding which feare and foraine terror, so little were the civill discords appeased, that contrariwise the Tribunes of the Commons extended their power with more violence to hinder the levie of soldiours, untill they had indented and capitulated with the Senators, that so long as the warres lasted, no man should either contribute and be charged with any impost, or be sued in any action of debt. When the Com. took hold once of this easement and libertie, the musters were delayed no longer. And after they had levied and entrolled two new legions it was thought convenient that the legions should be divided, and two armies sent forth into the Volscians countrie. So Furius and M. Horatius, went on the right hand along the sea coast to Antium, Q. Servilius & L. Geganus on the left hand, by the way of the mountains to Ecetra. But on neither side met they with the enemy. Vwhereupon they fell to harrying the countrey, not here and there in scattering wise, as the Volscians had done, after the maner of robbers, at starts upon

A upon advantage taken of their enemies discord, and by stealth for feare of their valour: but being a full power & armie of men, and justly provoked to anger, the longer they continued there, the fouler worke they made. For the Volscians standing in feare, least in the meane while they should be encountered with a power from Rome, had made rodes only into the utmost frontiers.
 But contrariwise, the Romanes made stay in the enemies land, the rather to traine them forth, and draw them to a field-fight. Having therefore burned up, in a manner, all the uplandish houses and graunges, and some villages also, and left behind them no fruitfull tree standing, nor the sowne come for hope of graine, and driven away whole booties of men, women, and cattell, which they could light on without the wals; they reduced their armies of both sides home againe to Rome. In this meane while the debtors had some little respite to breath themselves in. But so B soone as all was quiet from enemies abroad, they began afresh to be sued and troubled by their creditors at home. And so small hope they had to bee released of their old usurie, that they fell into a new, by reason of a contribution collected toward a well, which the Censors had set out to bee made of square Ashler stone. To yeeld unto this imposition and burden, the Commons were driven, because there was no muster for the Tribunes of the Commons to hinder. Forc'd they were likewise through the might and power of the great men, to admit for Tribunes militarie, all of the Nobilitie, to wit, L. Aemilius, P. Valerius the fourth time, C. Peturius, Servius Sulpitius, L. and C. Quintij Cincinnatij.

By the same strong hand also they prevailed so much, that without impeachment of any man, all the younger sort tooke the militarie oath, so that they levied three armies against the Latines C and Volscians: who joining their legions together, had encamped themselves at Satricum. One armie was gathered for the defence of the citie: another to be set out against all suddaine wars, if happily elsewhere some tumult should arise: & a third, of all other the strongest, was under the conduct of P. Valerius, & L. Aemilius, led to Satricum. Where, finding the enemies embattelled in good array upon a plaine and even ground, they charged upon them presently. But ere that they had gotten the victorie evidently in sight, and were but only in some good hope of having a fair day of their enemies, the raine so poured down with huge storms and tempests, that it parted both hosts asunder. The morrow after began a fresh conflict. And for a good while, the legions of the Latines especially, which by long alliance with the Romanes had learned their manner of warfare, stood to it as valiantly, and sped as fortunately as the Romanes. At length, the Romane D horsemen that rode in amongst them, brake their rankes; and when they were once disarraied, the footmen displaied their ensignes, and advanced upon them: and looke how much the Ro-manes battaile set forward, so much the enemies gave backward. But when they began once to faint in their fight, than the violence of the Romanes was intollerable. Thus the enemies were discomfited and scattered: and flying not toward their campe, but to Satricum, which was two miles off, they were by the horsemen especially beaten downe, trode underfoot and slaine. Their tents were taken and rifled. From Satricum they dislodged, the next night after the battaile was fought, and marched in great hast (as if they fled) to Antium. And albeit the Roman armie followed them by the tracks hard at heeles, yet their footman ship served them better in their feare, than it did the Romanes, for all their anger. So the enemies put themselves within the town wals, E before the Romanes could overtake them, and either cut off the taile of their rereward, or force them to stay. After this, some daies were spent in wasting the countrie. For neither were the Ro-manes sufficiently provided with warlike engines of batterie and artillerie to assaile their wals, nor they well appointed to abide battaile in plaine field. Then arose some discord within the towne, betwene the Latines and the Antiates. The Antiates, of one side wearied with calamities that follow long warres, wherewith all their life time they had been exercised even to their old age, were of mind to yeeld. The Latines, by reason of their late revolt and rebellion (whiles after so long peace, their courages continued yet fresh) were more forward and earnest to maintaine warres still. But when they saw on both sides that they might do as they purposed, and follow their owne designements, without being hindred one of another, their strife was soon ended. So the F Latines leaving their fellowship and societie of peace, so dishonest and dishonourable (as they thought it) departed from them, and stood out still to revenge their owne quarrels. But the Antiates being well rid of these Counsellors of theirs, so crosse unto all wholesome courses; tending to their good and safetie, yeilded up their towne and countrie to the Romanes. But the anger and furious rage of the Latines, for that they could neither annoy the Romanes by warres,

warres, nor keepe the Volscians still in armes, brake out thus farre, that they fired the citie Saticum, which had been the first place of refuge, after their defeature and unhappie fight. Neither left they any house in that citie standing, but set fire upon all indifferently, as well profane as holy edifices: onely the Church of Dame Matula they spared. From which, it was neither any religion and conscience of their own, nor feare of the gods that kept them, but (as men report) a fearfull voice heard out of the Temple with heauie threates, unless they held their hands, and kept them farre enough from burning the sacred habitations so impiouly. In this rage and mad fit of theirs, to Tusculum they go: for very spight that they forsaking the generall counsell of the Latines, had not onely yielded themselves to be in league with the Romans, but also became incorporate citizens with them. And comming upon them on a sodaine, while their gates were open, at the first shout the whole towne, all but the Castle, was surpris'd. The townesmen with their wives and children were thither fled: and sent messengers to Rome with certificat to the Senat of this sodaine and unlooked for accident. And with all speed (as appertained to the fidelitie of the people of Rome) an armie was led to Tusculum: wherof L. Quintus and Servius Sulpitius, had the conduct. At Tusculum they found the gates fast shut against them, and the Latines, as men both besieging and besieged. And whiles of the one side they intended the defence of the wals, on the other side assaulted the castle, at one time they were affraid themselves, and put others in fear likewise. But the comming of the Romans wrought a great change and alteration in the hearts of both parties. For it caused the Tusculanes of fearfull men to become exceeding cheerefull: and the Latines who made full reckoning to win the forresse out of hand, as being masters alreadie of the towne, had but small hope now to helpe and save themselves. The Tusculans they set up a great shout from the Keepe: and answered it was againe with a greater from the Romane armie. The Latines were put to it hard on both sides: For neither were they able to abide the violence of the Tusculans running downe the hill upon them, nor to put by and keepe off the Romans, comming hard under the wals, and assaying to breake the bars of the gates. First they scaled the walles and gat upon them: after, they brake the port-cullies downe. Thus the Latines environed with enemies both before and behind, that prested fore upon them, having neither strength enough left to fight, nor roome of ground to make an escape, were slaine in the midst between the enemies, every mothers sonne. So when Tusculum was recovered out of the enemies hands, the armie was brought backe againe to Rome.

But the more quietnesse there was that yeare without the citie by reason of prosperous wars, the more encreased the violence and hard dealing of the Senators within: and the calamities of the Commons grew every day more than other. For they wanted meanes and were not able to paie for the interest that needs must be paid. When nothing therfore was to be had, to make paiement out of their goods, they were adjudgd and awarded to satisfie their creditours in their bodie and name: and so their punishment served in steed of keeping their credit & discharging the consideration. Whereupon, not only the meanest of the Commons, but also the very chiefe, began now to let fall their hearts and to stoupe so low, that there was not a wittie & nimble headed man and of experience amongst them, that would put himselfe forth to stand to be a Tribune Militarie, in concurrence with the Nobles, (which they had so earnestly shot at and laboured for) no nor so much as to beare and sue for any offices of the Commons. So as the Senators now, seemed to have recovered againe for ever to themselves, the possession of that dignitie, which the Commons of late, for some few yeares, had usurped and occupied over their heads. But that this other side might not joy too much hereat, a small occurrent hapned betwene which (as it falleth out most commonly) gave the occasion and first footing to an enterprise of much importance.

M. Fabius Ambustus a great and mightie man, as well amongst those of his owne calling, as also with the Commons, (whom he was reputed never to despise, as other did of his condition and estate) had two daughters married forth: the elder unto Servius Sulpitius: the younger unto C. Licinius Stolo, a man verily of good worth and reckoning, but yet a Commoner. And Fabius disdaining not this alliance and affinitie, wan himselfe much love and favor amongst the Commons. Now it fell out so, that these sisters were upon a time together in the house of Servius Sulpitius, then, Tribune Militarie: and as they passed the time away (as the manner is) in much good talke, discoursing one with another of many matters, it chanced that a Sergeant or verger of Sulpitius, at what time as he was comming home from the Forum or common hall, rapped as

A the order was, with his rod at the dore. When the younger Fabius not acquainted with those fashions, was therat somewhat amazed, her sister making a wonder at her ignorance, laugh'd her to scorn. But that laughter (as womans wiles, god wot, are soone kindled with a little) yet her a worke and hammered in her head. Besides, the traine of many that came about her, waighing and giving attendance, readie to know her pleasure and what she would, mended the matter much. I suppose she thought her sister happily wedded, and repented her owne marriages upon an ill and sinister judgment, whereby every man repineth that his neighbour and nearest of kin especially, should go beyond him and doe better then he. Upon this discontentment and fresh burning of hers, her father haply seeing her distmaid, asked her whether all were well at home? But when she would have turned the cause of her grieif another way, (for that it stood

B neither with her love and kindnesse towards her sister, to envie her estate; nor yet with the reverent honour that she was to yeeld unto her husband, to finde fault with her owne) he with milde questioning came about her so, that he drew from her the truth: so as she confessed her grieif to arise upon this, that she was disparaged; and namely married not according to her qualitie, but into an house uncapable both of worship & favour. Then Ambustus, commoting his daughter, willed her to be of good cheere, and said, That ere it were long, she should see the same state, the same advancement and dignitie at home, which she had seene alreadie in her sisters house. Hereupon began he to plot with his sonne in law, joyning also unto them L. Sextius, a stout young man, and one that was like enough to come to preferment, but that he was not of noble race. Good occasion & opportunitie they seemed to have of compassing some alteration in the

C State, by reason of the excessive debts that men were grown into: for the redressing and easing of which maladie, the Com. had no other hope, but in advancing some of themselves into the soveraign room of government. They thought it needful therefore, presently to addresse themselves to the execution of these disignments, considering that by endeavour & industrie, the Commons were climbed to that degree alreadie, from whence if they would enforce & put themselves forward, they had but one step more unto the highest, & might be equall with the Nobles, as well in honour as in vertue & prowesse. And for the present, it was thought good to make them, two Trib. of the Com. in which office they might open a way unto themselves, for other dignities. So C. Licinius & L. Sex. proposed laws, all tending to abate the power & might of the Nobles, & wholly for the good & benefit of the Com. One, as touching taking order for debts: That when so much was default & deducted out of the principal, as had been paid for the use & interest

The laws of Licinius and Sextius.

D the residue should be discharged by even portions in 3. years. A second, concerning a proportion & quantitie of lands, That no man might hold in possession above 500. acres. The third, That from thenceforth there should be no Election of Trib. Militarie, but of Coss. provided alwaies, that one of them be chosen out of the Com. Matters all of right great weight and consequence, and such as without exceeding strife and contention, could not possibly be carried and obtained. Thus when all those things at once lay a bleeding, and were in hazard to be lost, which the whole world unmeasurably covereth and longeth after, to wit, land, money, and promotions: the Senators were put in a bodily feare, and began to startle. And laying their heads together both in publike consultation and private conference, they could devise no other remedie, but that

E which in many bickerments alreadie they had tried, namely, the stepping betwene and negative voice of some of the Tribunes. And so, to crosse those bills aforesaid put up by these two Tribunes, they had wrought & made to their purpose certaine of their owne brotherhood. Who so soone as they saw the wardes or tribes called forth by Licinius and Sextius, to give their suffrages, being well backed and garded with the assistance of the Senators, would suffer neither those lawes to be read, nor any other besides (as yearly they used) to passe by the voices of the Commons. Thus the two Tribunes aforesaid, having oftentimes (but ever in vaine) assembled the people together, and seeing their lawes still nipped, as it were, in the head for ever going forward; It is very well (quoth Sextius) and since yee like so well that these Inhibitions may prevaile so much: we will likewise defend the Commons with the same weapon and no other. Go to now we my masters of the Nobilitie, proclaime an Election for the creation of Tribunes Militarie: I will make I trow, that this word [Peto] shall doe your selves no good at all: howsoever now yee take to great pleasure to heare our brethren keepe that note still, and evermore sing that sweet concert of musick. And surely, those threats proved in deed to good earnest and tooke effect. For there was no Election at all but of Ediles and Tribunes, and those both of the Commons.

I forbid, I was the negative voice of the Tribunes.

For Licinius and Sextius being chosen Tribunes againe, suffered no Magistrates of the Chaire or of State, to be created. Which defect and desolation of soveraigne Magistracie continued in the citie for the space of five yeares: whiles the Commons for their part chose the same two Tribunes still, and they againe ever laid a barre and put in a caveat, against the Election of Tribunes Militarie.

All other wars, as good hap was, were a sleepe for the time. The Coloners onely of Velitæ, upon so long rest and quietnesse began to be lustie and wax wanton: and for that there was no armie of the Romanes stirring abroad, they not onely made inrodes sundrie times into the territorie of Rome, but also assailed the towne Tusculum. And when the Tuscules, the ancient Allies and new enfranchised citizens of Rome craved helpe, the Senatours and Commons both, were moved especially for very shame to succor them. And the Tribunes of the Commons yeelded at length, and permitted an assembly for Election, to be holden by an Interegent: and Trib. Militarie there were created L. Furius, A. Manlius, Ser. Sulpitius, Ser. Cornelius, A. & C. Valerij. Who found not the Commons so tractable in the mustering, as they were pliable in giving their voices at the Election. Yet, after much adoe & great contention they levied an armie, and set forward on their journey: drave the enemies not from Tusculum onely, but forced them within their own walls: besieged Velitæ more streightly a great deale, and in more forcible manner, than Tusculum had been by them. Howbeit, they that began the siege were not able to win the towne. For before that time, were new Tribunes Militarie chosen, Q. Servilius, C. Peturius, A. and M. Cornelius, Q. Quintius, M. Fabius. Neither performed these Tribunes any notable exploit at Velitæ. But the State at home stood in more dangerous termes than before. For besides that Sextius and Licinius, the publishers of those lawes aforesaid, were now the eighth time made Trib. of the Commons againe, Fabius also a Tribune Militarie, stole his wives father, was scene openly in the action, to set forward and perswade for the same lawes, which in verie deed himselfe had deviled. And whereas at the first, eight of the Colledge or companie of the Tribunes of the Commons, had crossed the proceeding of them: now there were but five left that shewed themselves, and those (as commonly they vie to doe that disband from their owne faction) like men bestrait of their wits and amazed, being indeed the tongues and trunks that others spake by, pretended and made allegations in their prohibition, onely as they were schooled and taught their lessons at home: (to wit) That a great sort of the Commons were in the army at Velitæ & absent, and that the solemne session or assembly for enacting lawes, ought to be adjourned untill the returne home of the soldiours: to the end that all the Commons generally, might give their voices concerning their owne commoditie and benefit. Sextius and Licinius with part of their brethren Tribunes, and M. Fabius one of the Tribunes Militarie, being their owne craftsmasters, knew well enough by so many years experience, how to mannage and handle the mindes of the Commons: and plied the chiefe of the Senatours (produced forth before the people) so hard, with intergatories of everie particular that was propoſed, that they wearied and tired them out. Demanding, how they could require to be allowed themselves to possesse more than 500 acres a man: whereas the Commons had but two a peece divided amongst them? Whether that everie one of them might in equitie hold the lands, well neere, of three hundred citizens: and a commoner to have hardly ground enough for to build him a necessarie house upon, and to serve for a place to burie his dead? Also, whether their will and pleasure was that the Commons oppressed with usurie, should yeeld their bodies to beare yrons and suffer torment, unlesse they paid the interest before the principall? And that daily by whole companies they should be had away from the barre, condemned to thraldome; and Noble mens houses to become goales, filled and pestered with prisoners? And whersoever a Patitian dwelt, there should be a private prison? These indignities and piteous matters to be heard, when they had with a loud voice charged upon them, even before those that were afraid of the like measure themselves; with more indignation and disdaine of all that heard them, than they themselves shewed in the uttering, and deliverie: But these Senatours (say they) (and that they redoubled) will never make an end either of getting more land still into their hands, or spoiling and undoing the Commons with usurie, M untill the Commons make once out of their bodie one Consull, for to be the maintainer and protectour of their libertie. As for the Tribunes of the Commons, they were now just nothing set by: as who by their priviledge of Inhibitions and negative voices, spoiled themselves and overthrew their owne power. And never will there be any indifferent and equall course taken, so

- A so long as the Nobles keepe the soveraigne place of command, and the sword to strike whiles the poore Commons have onely the buckler hand to ward all venues. For unlesse the government be parted betweene both alike, the Commons shall never have their due and equall portion, in the Commonweale. Neither is it reason that any man should stand contented with this onely, that in the Election of Consuls, the Commons are eligible and capable of the dignitie: for in case, it be not concluded absolutely, that one Consull at the least shall be of necessity a Commoner, there will never be any at all. Have yee forgotten already (say they) that notwithstanding an Act made, That there should be Tribunes Militarie created rather than Consuls, for this intent, that Commoners might aspire and reach unto the chiefe place of honour: yet for all that in 44 yeares space, there was not so much as one of the Commoners chosen Tribune Militarie? And will any man beleve that they will of their own accord conferre upon the Commons (when otherwise they may chuse) that dignitie in the disposing onely of two places, who were ever wont in the making of Tribune Militarie, to take up eight roomes all wholly to themselves? And will they allow them a way unto the Consulship, who thus long have held the (Consular) Tribuneship so guarded, as no man might have access thither but themselves? Nay, it must be gotten by a positive law, which in their assemblies for Election, by favour and grace might not be obtained. One of the Consuls rounes must be set aside, past all peradventure and question, and that for a Commoner, to enter into. For as much as if it stand still upon a choise, the mightier man will ever go away with the game cleere. And whereas heretofore they have been wont to alledge and say, That the Commons afforded not sufficient and able men to beare the offices of the chaire and of state: that, now can not be truly objected. For was the Commonweale, I pray, you more slackly and negligently governed upon the (Consular) Tribuneship of P. Licinius Calvus (who was the first Commoner that ever was made Tribune Militarie) than it was ruled for those yeares space, in which there was no a Tribune Militarie but of the Nobilitie? Nay, on the contrarie side, it will be justified that some of the Nobles were condemned after they were out of their Tribuneship, and not one of the Commoners. And whereas not many yeares past, we began to make Questors or Treasurers out of the Commons, like as we did Tribunes Militarie, the people of Rome repented never of the choise of any one of them. It remaineth now, that the Commoners beare the office of Consuls too. That were a fortresse of their libertie, that were a strength and sure hold to trust unto. If they were once come and stept to that degree, then may the people of Rome thinke assuredly and be perswaded, that the Kings are banished indeed out of the citie, and their freedome fully established for ever to endure. For, from that day forward shall the Commons be partakers of all those things, wherein the Nobles now surpass them: namely, soveraigne rule and authoritie, martiall renowne, parentage and Nobilitie: great ornaments doubtlesse, unto themselves to enioie here in this life: but farre greater to leave behind them unto their children and posteritie. These and such like Orations when they saw to be plausible, and willingly accepted, they preferred a new Statute, That in steed of the two Duumvirs for holy ceremonies and matters of the Church, there might be chosen 10 Decemvirs: Provided alwaies, that one part of them should be created forth of the Commons, and another from among the Nobles. The Session for enacting of all those lawes, they deferred untill the armie was returned, which lay then at the siege before Velitæ.

But the yeare was come about and fully expired, before the legions were reduced home from thence: and by that meanes the whole businesse about these new lawes, hung still in suspence, and was put off unto the entrance of the new Tribes Militarie. As for the Tribunes of the Commons, the Communitie chose the same againe, even those twaine who had bene the proposers of those lawes. And the Tribunes Militarie were these, T. Quintius, Ser. Cornelius, Ser. Sulpitius, Sp. Servilius, L. Papyrius, L. Peturius. Presently in the beginning of the yeare, they put it to the verie jumpe and finall triall what should become of those lawes. And when as the Tribes were called, and none of the Tribunes collegues stepped betweene to stop the proceeding of the lawgivers: the Nobles were afraid, and ran unto their two last helpes, to wit, the highell and absolute office, and the greatest man among them. They thought it good therefore to create a Dictatour. And M. Furius Camillus was nominated, who Elected unto him L. Amylius for General of the horse. The lawmakers likewise for their part, against so great preparation of their adversaries, armed at all parts the cause of the Commons, with stout stomacke and courageous heart. And having assembled an Hall of the Commons, they called forth the wardsto give their voices. At what time the Dictatour accompanied with a great traine of Nobles, full of wrath and menacing frownes, tooke his place and set him downe. And after the matter was canvassed first by the ordinarie conflict of the Tribunes among themselves, whiles some propounded, and others gainesaid the law with their negatives forces; and that by how much in right the prohibition was the stronger, so much it was overweighed in favour and affection both of the lawes and lawgivers: and when the first Tribes had given their voice,  Fur rogans* affirmatively: then Camillus, for as much as, (quoth hee) o Quirites, yee are ruled now by the will and pleasure, and not by the authoritie of the Tribunes, & as in times past ye obtained the priviledge of a negative voice and  Intercession* by your departure & secession, so now ye make it void & nothing worth, even by the same force that ye got it by: I, chosen Dictatour as well for your sake as for the whole Commonwealth, will assit your priviledge of Intercession, and by mine absolute authoritie maintraine this your helpe and succour, now reversed and overthrowne. If therefore C. Licinius and L. Sextius, give place unto the negative voice and interceding of their fellowes in office, I will not in a meeting and assemblie of the Commons, once intermeddle, nor bring in the authoritie, of a magistrate of the Nobles: but if they shall go forward still (notwithstanding all Prohibition) to impose and give lawes unto the citie, as if it were woon by conquest of the enemy, I will not suffer the Tribunes power by their owne selves to be defaced and come to nothing. But (all these big words notwithstanding) when the Tribunes of the Commons made but a tush therat, and went never the latter forward with their enterprise, then Camillus throughly angered in deed, sent his Licitors and sergeants to commaund the Commons to avoid the place and depart: Threatning withall, that if they proceeded thus, he would take a Militarie oath of all the younger people, and lead an armie presently forth of the citie. This put the Commons in a verie great fright, but it set their captaines and ringleaders, rather in a greater heat of contention, than abated their courages one jot. And when he saw no relenting on either side, he gave up his office: Whether it were that there was some error in his creation, (as some have written) or because the Tribunes of the Commons had put up a bill to the Commons, and they granted it: that if M. Furius (as Dictatour) had proceeded to any action, he should have a round fine set on his head of 500000  Asles*, I know not certainly. But I beleve that he was terrified upon some unluckie signes of the birds, rather than with any such strange Act never heard of before, and without precedent. And hereunto am I induced, both in regard of the disposition of the man, so well given and of so good conscience, and also for that M. Manlius was immediately named Dictatour in his stead. For to what end should Manlius have beene created Dictatour for that broile and sturre, wherein M. Furius had taken the foile before? Again, seeing the same M. Furius was Dictatour the next yeare following, doubtlesse, he would never for shame have resumed that office, wherein the yeare before he had received the foile and disgrace, to be so overruled. Over and besides, at the same time when as this bill was supposed to have beene preferred, concerning his fine, either he might have withstood it too, (whereby he saw himselfe to be bridled) or else he had not beene able to have hindered so much as those, for which this also was proposed. Finally it was never scene to this day wherein we live, so long as the Tribunes and Consuls with their factions and parts taking have beene at variance and debate with all their might and maine, but evermore the authoritie of the Dictatour controlled them all, and put them downe.

Betweene the former Dictatorship of Camillus now resigned up, and the new by Manlius accepted and begun, there was an assembly of the Commons summoned by the Tribunes, in time as it were of a vacancie or Interreigne: wherein the overture was made and evidently it was seen, which of the lawes proposed the Commons liked better, and which the lawgivers. For those that concerned usurie and land, they granted to passe, but that other of a Commoner to be Consul, they denied and dashed quite. And surely both matters had beene dispatched fully and established at once, but that the Tribunes said directly, that they required the Commons, to give their voices and speake to all three, directly together. After this, P. Manlius the Dictatour favored somewhat, and helped the cause of the Commons, by nominating out of the Commons for his Generall of horsemen, C. Licinius, who had beene a Tribune Militarie before time. The Senatours stormed hereat, as I find in records. And the Dictatour was wont to excuse the matter unto them, alledging for himselfe the neere affinitie and kindred that was betweene him and

A and Licinius: saying also, that the dignitie of the Generall of horsemen was no greater than of a Tribune Consular. Now when the Election day was published for the Tribunes of the Commons, Licinius and Sextius so demeaned themselves, that by pretending that they would not any longer now continue in the office, they set the Commons on to be most earnest and hotely bent for that, which they under colour of refusal, desired and fought for. They seemed, forsooth, to alledge and say, That for these nine yeares they had stood as it were in battaile array, and affronted the States and Nobles of the citie, to the right great perill of themselves in privat, and to no good effect at all in publicke: and now together with them, both the lawes proposed, and the whole strength of the Tribunes authoritie, were waxed old and decayed. At the first their lawes were crossed by the interceding of their brethren Tribunes: afterwards, by packing away the youth of the citie to the Velitern warre: and last of all, the Dictatours lightening flashed in their faces, and their thunderbolts shot against them. Now (say they) neither their fellow Tribunes withstood them, nor foraine warres hindered them, ne yet the Dictatour himselfe, as who for his part hath given a good foretoking and presage of a Consull Commoner, in electing his Generall of horsemen from out of the Commons. The very Commons and none els, are they that hurt themselves, and delay their owne goods. Who might presently if they would, have their citie, their common hall, & place of assemblies freed from these creditors: yea, and their grounds recovered againe from the unjust Landlords. Which benefites and liberties, when are they like to weigh and esteeme with thankfull minds accordingly, if in the very time that they are to accept the lawes devised for their owne wealth and good, they cut off all hope of promotion and honour, from the publishers and proposers thereof? For it standeth not with the modestie of the people of Rome, to require to be eased themselves of Usurie, and to be set in possession again of the land, wrongfully withheld from them by the mightie men: and then to leave those old Tribunes, by whose meanes they have come by those good commodities, to shift for themselves, not only without honor, but also without all hope of honor. Let them first therefore set downe with themselves, & resolve, what they are minded to do: and afterwards in the election of Tribunes, declare the same openly. If they would be willing to speake affirmatively to those laws, all jointly as they were propounded, then there were some reason to chuse the same Tribunes againe: and then would they enact & establish finally that which they had published. But in case their wil was to accept of that, and no more than which served each private mans turne, then there was small need or none at all to have them still in office, with the envie and grudging of so many. And to bee short, neither would they accept of the Tribuneship any longer, neither should the Commons have those laws ratified, which were already granted. When as all the rest of the Senatours were stricken into their dumps and blanke, for the very indignitie to see things thus goe. At the last, one Appius Claudius Crassus (the nephew or sonnes sonne of that notorious Appius the Decemvir) upon a malicious mind and fell stomacke, as it is reported, rather than for any hope hee had to dissuade the matter, stood up, and to this effect answered that so stout & peremptorie speech of the Tribunes, in this manner. It can be no strange matter to me, nor unlooked for, o Quirites, if that which hath beene the onely thing at all times objected by seditious Tribunes against our house, I also should hear at this present: to wit, that the whole name and lineage of Claudij, have ever from the first beginning, regarded nothing more in the Commonweale, than the majestie and honor of the Senatours and the Nobles, and alwaies set and opposed themselves against the good and welfare of the Commons. Of which two challenges, the one I neither can, nor will deny and disavow: namely that wee, since the first time that wee were enfranchised citizens, and therewith at once taken into the number of Senatours, have endeavored and strained our selves, that it might be said, and that truly, that the honor and dignitie of that state and degree, into which it was your good pleasure we should be incorporate, and graced with, was by us augmented, rather than impaired. And as for the other challenge, this I dare be bold, in mine owne behalfe, and in the name of mine auncestors and progenitors, to averre, o Quirites: that (unless a man would thinke whatsoever is done for the weale publicke generally, is directly against the Commons, as if they were mere aliens of another citie) we to our knowledge have practised nothing, witting and willing, either whiles we lived private, or during the time we bare office, prejudiciall to the Communal tie: and that neither in deed nor word, wee can be justly charged to have wrought and contrived any thing contrarie to your good: although peradventure somewhat hath fallen out crosse against your will and mind. But were I not a Claudius, and of that familie, nor descended of no-

blebloud, but some one of the Burgeoises or citizens: and knew my selfe to be but free borne, both by father and mother, and to live in a free citie: could I (thinke yee) hold my tongue? but frankly speake and say, that these perpetuall Tribunes (God save all) L. Sextius, and C. Licinius I meane, have for nine yeares (for so long they have plaied Rex) taken so much upon them, & been so bold as to say they will not permit you to have free voices, neither in solemn assemblies for elections, nor in Sessions and Parliaments for allowing and ordaining lawes? Vpon condition (quoth one of them) you shall make us Tribunes againe the tenth time. What is this els but to say? That, which other sue for, we so scorne and disdain, that accept of it wee will not, with our good hire and recompence. And what reward and consideration is this, good Sirs, for which we may have your Worthships, our ever-Tribunes? Marrie (quoth hee) that yee will accept jointly together and at once, all our lawes, whether they like you or dislike you: whether they bee good and holefome, or bad and noisome. Now I beseech you good Tarquines (Tribunes of the Commons I would have said) imagine I were one of the ordinarie citizens, and should from out of the multitude assembled, speak out and say: Pleaseth it your good grace, Sir, that out of these lawes propounded, wee may chuse those that wee thinke good and holefome for us, and refuse and disannull the rest. [Oh (quoth he) that may not be. Thou maist allow, belike, and ordain, concerning Vsurie, concerning lands, which tend to the commoditie of you all. But now beware of bugs. This monstrous and portenteous wonder must in no case be permitted in Rome, that thou shouldst see L. Sextius and this perillous fellow C. Licinius to bee Consuls, which thy heart riseth at, and which goeth against thy stomacke. Nay, nay, either accept of all, or I will propound none at all.] This is all one, as if a man should give him that is hunger-bitten, and readie to starve, poison and meat together: and bid him either forbear the wholefome food to preserve his life, or else to take the deadly bane to hasten his death. But if this were a free State indeed, would not many a one have cried out and said, Avant you and your Tribuneships, out upon you with your lawes. What Sir? How if your Mastership will not put up & prefer that which is commodious and profitable for the people to accept: is there none, think you besides, that will propound it? If any Nobleman, or if any Clandius (which they take to be more odious) should thus say, Either take all, or I will propose none at all. Which of you, Quirites, would endure it? why? will ye never regard the substance more than the person; the matter rather than the man? But all is wel taken & heard quickly, which that magistrat shal say. And wil ye alwaies hear with the wrong or deafe eare, whatsoever any of us shal happen to speake? Well, the words are naught, & the speech (without question) very un civile and rude. Now let us see what maner of law it is, that they storme so at, because by you it is rejected. In good faith o Quirites, much like unto their language. This I require (qd, he) that it might not be lawfull for you to make Coss. whom ye will. For what els demandeth he, who would have it enacted by expresse terms, that one at least of the Coss. must be a Commoner of necessity, & leaveth it not unto your choise to make two Noblemen Coss. If we had wars at this day, such as sometime the Tuscan war was, when Porcena was master of the Ianicle & kept that piece against us; or such as the Gaules war of late daies was, when the enemies were LL, and possessed of all the citie here, but the Capitoll and fortresse onely; set case, that L. Sextius should be prickt and propounded either with this M. Furius here in place or with any one other of the Nobles, and stand to be Coss. would ye abide that Sextius should be undoubtedly Coss. and Camillus at devotion and in hazard to take repulse? Is this indeed to bestow your dignities indifferently with even & equall hand? That two of the Commons, forsooth, may be elected Consuls, and not two likewise of the Nobles? And that one of them must needs perforce be created out of the Commons: and in the electing of both, the Nobles may be overthipt? What societie is this, what communie & participation? Will not this serve thy turne and content thee, that wherein thou hadst no title nor interest afore, thou shouldst now have thy part: unlesse in seeking to have a portion, thou pluck all unto thy selfe? I feare me (quoth he) if both Consuls might be made of the Nobilitie, ye would chuse none at all of the comminalltie. What is this els but to say? Because willingly of your selves, ye would not chuse unworthy persons and unmeet, I will bind you therfore of necessity, to elect those whom otherwise ye would passe by. And what followeth hereupon but this, M that the Commoner who standeth with two Patricijs, may plainly say, and that truly, he is not by voices chosen, but by vertue of a law, and so acknowledge no benefit received of the people, nor be beholden at all to them, for their grace and favour? Thus seeke they meane to wring your dignities from you, and not the way to sue for them: and would so obtaine the greatest, as that they

Appius speaks in the person of Sextius or Licinius, without this markes []

Now Appius speaks in his own person

A they mought not be obliged and bound unto you for the least: and had rather get honours and offices by advantage taking and cunning sleights; than by their owne vertue, desert and worthinesse. But there is some one that scorneth to be pried and looked into; and to be considered as he deserveth: who thinks it meet, that he alone among the other Competitors, that contest and stand in suit, should be sure of offices and promotions, and will not submit himselfe to your censure: who would have your suffrages, of voluntarie, to be constrained: of free, to be thrall & servile. I speake not of Licinius and Sextius: whose yeares of their continuall government ye reckon upon, and make up in the Capitoll, as they used sometime, to count the yeares of the Kings raigne. But what is he this day in the citie, of so base, so abject and low condition, that by the advantage and benefit of this law, hath not easier access to a Consulship, than we and our children have? As for us truly, ye may sometime misse of chusing us, would you never so faine: but for them ye must needs, yea though full against your mind. And thus much concerning the indignitie and unworthinesse of the thing. For, dignitie and worthinesse, I take, to be matters properly to men pertaining. What shall I speake now of Religions, and of the solemnitie of the Auspices, which employ a meere contempt and injurie done to the immortall gods? Who knoweth not, that by the approbation of the gods, testified by flight of birds, this citie was first founded: that by the same Auspices, all hath been ordered and directed, as well in war abroad, as in peace at home? And who be they that have to doe with these tokens & presages, by auncient custome and tradition from our forefathers? Forsooth even the Nobles and none els. As for the Magistrates of the Commons, none are chosen with regard of flight, sight, and feeding of the birds. C But to us, they doe so properly belong, that not onely those Magistrates of the Nobles, which the people create, they doe not otherwise elect but by observation of the birds; but we also our selves, without the assent and voice of the people; doe nominate an Interrex by meanes of the birds: yea and in the private actions of our life, we are guided by them at home, which these Commons use not in their very offices. What then meaneth he els, but to take these Auspices out of the citie, who by creating Commoners to be Consuls, depriveth the Nobles thereof, who onely may have and use them? Now let them mocke on and scoffe at our religions. Let them deride our ceremonies. What makes matter (say they) if those pullets pecke or eat not? What if they come somewhat late out of their coupe or cage? What if a bird sing ake or crowe crosse and contrarie? How then? A great piece of matter surely. Small things but, I confesse, they be: D but as small as they are, our auncelours by not contemning them, have brought this C. VV. to a flourishing state. And we now a daies, as if we stood not in neede of the grace and favour of God, pollute all holie rites and ceremonies. And therefore let our prelates and high priests, our Augurs, and King at Sacrifices bee created (it skilleth not how) even out of the common multitude: Let us set upon any mans head (it matters not whose, so he come in likeness of a man) the miter of Iupiter his Flamme. Let us commit the keeping of the Anciles or heavenly shields, and the secret Sanctuaries; let us commit the gods themselves and the charge of their holy service to those, unto whom we may not lawfully nor without impietie. Let no lawes be published nor Magistrates created solemnly, with regard of birds at all, and of the will of the gods. Nor in the Centuriate assemblies holden by degrees, and Curiae-meetings by the wardes and parishes, E let not the Senatours be presidents and have their authoritie and roiall assent. Let Sextius and Licinius, like Romulus and Tatius raigne together, as fellow KK, in the citie of Rome, because they give away so freely, the monies, lands, and territories from others. So sweete and favorie it is to prey upon other mens goods. Never consider they, nor looke so farre into the matter, that by one of these goodly lawes, our fieldes will be desert and wast, by ejecting and dispossessing the rightfull land-lords: and by the other, all credit in borrowing and lending, in taking and putting forth of money shal be abolished. And then farewell all human societie, commerce, & intercoure whatsoever. In these respects therfore, thus I conclude, and would counsell you, in any wise to stop, frustrate and disannull the overture and proceeding of these lawes: and in so doing, I praie God blesse and speed you well. This Oration of Appius thus farre onely prevailed, that the time of publication of these Actes, was cut off and differed. But the same Tribunes Sextius and Licinius, being chosen againe the tenth time, propounded this law and had it enacted, That of the Decemvirs for divine service and church matters, some should be created of the Commons. So, F five of them were of the Nobles, and five of Commoners: whereby they seemed to have gained already one good step onward unto the Consulship.

The Decemvirs created.

The

The Commons contenting themselves with this victorie, yielded unto the Senatours, that for the present without any mentioning of Consuls, there should be elected Tribunes Militarie. So there were created A. and M. Cornelij the second time, M. Geganius, P. Manlius, L. Veturius and P. Valerius the sixth time. At what time, when as (but for the siege of Velitæ, which was like to be for service a long piece of worke, rather than for issue, doubtfull in the end) the Romanes were at rest for any forreine troubles, the fodaine and unlooked for newes of the Gaules war, drave the citie to chuse M. Furius Dictatour the fifth time: who tooke unto him for his Generall of the horfmen, T. Quintius Penus. Claudius writeth, that this yeare the Gaules were fought with, about the river Anio: and that there was that noble combat upon the bridge, in which, T. Manlius, in the sight of both armies slew in single fight a Gaule that had challenged him and given defiance, and despoiled him of his collar of gold. But there be more writers that induce me to beleve, that this exploit was performed ten yeares after: and that in this yeare the Gaules had a batteile given them by M. Furius Dictator, in the Albanes land: where the Romanes had neither doubtfull nor dangerous victorie, although the French made them afraid at first in remembrance of their former overthrow. Many thousands of this barbarous nation were slaine in field, many also fell upon the sword in their campe after it was won. Some were scattered & fled, and those most (who tooke the way to Apulia) saved themselves from the enemy, both by flying so farre, and also for that upon feare they were so distracted and parted one from another. The Senatours and Commons agreed and made a decree, that the Dictatour should triumph. Who scarcely had made an end of that war, but he was welcomed home with a more hotter and more dangerous Sedition within the citie. For after many sharp bickerings and contentions, the Dictatour and Senat both, were overmatched and overcome, yea & forced to accept the Tribunes lawes aforesaid. And also malgree the Nobilitie and doe what they could, there was an assembly holden for Election of Consuls: in which L. Sextius was created Consull, the first Commoner that ever sat in Consuls chaire. But the broiles staid not there. For, by reason that the Nobles denied to approve and give assent thereto, the matter was like to grow unto a Seccession and generall departure of the Commons, yea and to other fearfull tearmes and perilous threats of civile wars and intestine troubles. Howbeit, by meanes of the Dictatour, the flames were quenched and the discords appeased upon these capitulations. Imprimis, that the Nobilitie should accord unto the Commons, to have one Consull from among themselves. Item, that the common people should be content that the Nobles might out of the Patritij create a Pretor or Lord chiefe Justice for oyer and determiner in causes within the citie. Thus when after long anger the two states of the citie were grown to unitie and concord, the Senate thinking it a worthe matter (and good cause they had verely as ever any time before) willingly to determin, for the honour of the immortall Gods, to set out those most stately [Roman] plaies. And whereas before, they had continued but three daies, to ad one more, & to celebrate them full foure. And when the Ædiles of the Commons refused that charge and excused themselves, the younger Gentlemen of the Nobilitie cried all with one voice, That they would most gladly doe that service and honour to the immortall Gods, so as they might be made Ædiles for that purpose. Thanked they were generally of all hands; and the Senate made a decree, That the Dictator should propose unto the people, that two men of the Nobilitie might be Ædiles and that in all the Assemblies and Elections for that yeare, whatsoever passed, should be ratified by the soveraigne assent of the Senatours.

L. Sextius, the first Commoner that was chosen Consull.

THE SEVENTH BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Citie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the seventh Booke.

TWO new officers of State, to wit, the Pretorship and Ædileship of the Chaire, were adjoined to the rest. The citie was sore visited with the pestilence: which was more noted by reason of Euricius Camillus who died therein. The remedie and end whereof, whiles they sought to procure by bringing in new and strange religions, at length they desired strange plaies, which then first were set forth. M. Pomponius a Tribune of the Commons, arrested L. Manlius for his exceeding rigour in taking muster of soldiors: and for confining and hardly intreating his owne sonne T. Manlius, for no crime or bawinous offence. And the young man himselfe, whose confining and misusage was laid unto his fathers charge, entered the bed-chamber of the said Tribune, drew his sheane and forced him to sweare unto him, that he would let fall his suite and proceed no further. Then all mischiefs entended, were laid apart and had an end. Curtius armed at all pieces, mounted upon a chafur, rode headlong into the wide gaping chinke or gulf within the citie of Rome, and so it presently filled up againe. The same young Manlius, who had freed his father from the troubles of the Tribune, entered into comb at with a French man, that challenged any one of the Roman soldiors to single fight: slew him, tooke from him his collar of gold, which he wore about his necke afterwards himselfe, and thereof was called Torquatus. Two Tribes more were added, Pontina and Publicia. Licinius Stolo was condemned by a law of his owne making, because he held in possession more than 500 acres of ground. M. Valerius a Colonell of 1000 foot killed a Gaule, who challenged him to fight: and th. at, by the means and helpe of a vulture that sealed upon his morrow, and with talons and bill annioed his enemy, and thereupon was he named Corvinus. For which vertue and valourous Act, he was the yeare next following created Consull, being not full three and twentie yeares old. Amities was concluded with the Carthaginians. The Campanes being waied up by the Samnites, craved aid of the Senate against them: and when they could not speed, yielded their citie and victorie to the people of Rome. Whereupon it was thought good, seeing both they and theirs were now become proprietaries to the people of Rome, that they should be defended by force of armes against the Samnites. When A. Cornelius the Consull, had led his host into a place of disadvantage and was in great perill, he was by the industrious service of P. Decius a Colonell saved: Who having gained the hill top, which commanded the ridge, whereon the Samnites lay encamped, gave the Consull opportunity to escape and passe into a plaine ground: and himselfe, notwithstanding he was environed by the enemy, brake through them, and gat away. The Roman soldiors left in garison at Capua, having conspired to keepe the citie to their owne behoofe, were detected and their plot disclosed: and for feare of punishment revolted from the people of Rome contrary to their allegiance: but by the policie and wisdom of M. Corvinus, they were reclaimed from their outrage, and restored againe to their countrie. Moreover, this booke containeth the fortunate warres against Hernicks, Gauls, Tyburtis, Privernates, T. Aquinians, Samnites, and Volscians.

THREE ensueth a yeare of especiall note and marke, for the Consullship of a man newly risen: also for two new offices, the Pretorship and Ædileship of the Chaire. Both which dignities, they of the Nobilitie purchased to themselves in lieu of granting to the Commons one place of the two Consuls. The Commons bestowed the Consullship upon L. Sextius for his good service, in propounding the law, whereby that promotion was first obtained. The Nobles conferred the Pretorship upon Sp. Furius Camillus the sonne of Marcus: and the Ædileship upon Cn. Quintius Capitolinus, and P. Cornelius Scipio, personages of their owne order and degree: So gracious were they with the people in Mars field. L. Sextius had companion with him in government, L. Aemilius Mamercus one of the Senatours. In the beginning of the yeare, much debate there was and hard hold, both as well about the Gaules, who at the first ranged abroad over all * Apulia, and were now (as the report went) gathered together: as also concerning the * Phylæa rebellion a prison and house of correction: where, a Dictatour his sonne, a young Gentleman highly descended, by this daily miserie of his, was taught to know, that hee had indeed a lordly and imperious Sir, to his father. And for what great offence, I pray you? Because hee was not so faire spoken, nor all the readiest with his tongue. Which infirmities and defects of nature, ought not a father to have borne withall and cloked (if there had ben any goodnesse, any common humanity in him) rather than to punish it, and by rough handling, and sharpe usage, to make it more knowne and notorious? Why? even the very brute beasts, if it chauce that any of their breed or young ones prove but untowardly, feed and cherish them still never thelesse. But as for this L. Manlius, he augmented one inconvenience & default in his son, whom, being but soft and flow of nature, he keepeth down the more: and that little life & smal mettrall that is in him, he goeth about to quench and dull at ones by this peasants life and rusticall usage, and conversing amongst the cattell and beasts. These bitter complaints and accusations moved the patience, and stirred the stomackes of every man els; sooner than the yong man himselfe. Who contrariwise was grieved in his mind, that he should be a cause of his fathers troubles, thus to incur the ill will and obloquie of the people. And that all the world, both heaven and earth might know, that hee desired rather to succour and helpe his father, than to assist his adversaries and foes, he entred into a course becomming and bewraying (I must needs say) a rude and rustical mind. Which, although it favour nothing of civilitie, yet for his kinnesse and dutifull pietie to his father, deserveth commendation. One morning betimes he gets him up, and unknowne to everie one of the house, with a good skeine close by his side, to the citie hee goes: and from the gate straightwaies directly to M. Pomponius the Tribune his house. He telleth the porter, that hee must needs speake with his master out of hand, willing him to let him understand, that T. Manlius, the sonne of Lucius, was there. And being immediatly let in, (for the Tribune hoped, that the son was thoroughly angered with his father, and brought new complaints, and one matter or other against him, or some devise and overture, how to proceed in the commensed Action) and salutations passed to and fro betwene the Tribune and him, hee said, that hee was to talke with him apart out of all mens hearing. So the rume being voided, and all commaunded to depart farre ynough out of the way, he draweth out his skeine: and leaping aloft upon the bed, stood there, and held it full bent against him, and threatened presently to give him the stab, unless he would sweare the oath he should tender unto him, namely, never to call an assemble or hall of the Commons together about his fathers enditement, or impanell a Iurie against him. The Tribune affrighted (seeing the naked weapon glittering before his face, himselfe all alone and unarmed, the other a tall and lustie young fellow, and, that which was as much to be feared as the rest, foolehardie, and presuming upon his strength) tooke the oath in that forme as he put it unto him. And afterwards he gave it out plainly and confessed (for his excuse) that by this meanes hee was forced in spite of his heart, to surcease his suit, and give over his enterprize. But the Commons were not so much offended at the sonne, for giving such an adventure in his fathers quarrell: but they could have bene more contented and better pleased, that it had lien in their power to have passed their voices, for the condemnation of so cruel & proud a prisoner, as they had under their hands. And the more praise-worthie was this desigine of the sonne, because so great rigor of the father, wrought no alienation at all in his heart, from the affectionate dutie that hee owed unto him. So not onely the father escaped his arraignment, but this action of the yong man turned to his owne honor and preferment. For whereas, this year it was first ordained, that the Tribunes or Colonels should be chosen by voices of the legionarie fouldiours (for aforetime, as at this day, the Generals themselves made them, whom they call Ruffuli) in sixe places (for so many were elected) he obtained the second rowme: and that, in regard of no desert otherwise, either at home or abroad, which might win him this favour, as who had spent his youth in the countrie altogether far from the civile societie of men.

The same yeare, by earthquake or some other forcible violence, the common place called Forum, clave and opened wide, welneere in the mids; and suncke downe to an exceeding depth: neither could that chyncke or pit be filled up, by casting in of earth (notwithstanding every man laboured and brought what he could) before that they began to enquire, according as they were admonished by the divine Oracles, what it might be, wherein the most puissance and greames of the people of Rome consisted. (For the wisards prophesied, That if they would have the state of Rome to remain sure for ever, they should dedicat and offer it, whatsoever it was, unto that place.)

And

A And when they were in doubt what this should be, it is reported, that M. Curtius, a right hardie knight and martiall yong gentleman, rebuked them therfore, because they doubted whether the Romanes had any earthly thing better than armour and valor? Herewith, after silence made, he lift up his eyes, and beheld the temples of the immortall gods, situate neere to the Forum, and the Capitoll likewise, and stretching forth his hands, one while toward heaven, another while to the gaping chynckes and gulfe in the earth, toward the infernall spirits beneath, hee offered and devoted himselfe to assured death. And mounting upon a brave courser, as richly trapped and set out, as possible he could devise, armed as he was at all peeces, he leapt horse and man and all into the hole. The people, both men and women, threw in after him sundrie gifts and oblations, and fruits of the earth in great plentie. The place was after called Curtius Lacus, of his name, and not of that Curtius Metus in the old time, who was a fouldiour under Titus Tatius. If I could by any meanes search out the truth, I would not spare for any paines in that behalfe. But now seeing that by reason of antiquitie the certaintie is not fully knowne, wee must goe by the common voice and report of men. And verily the name of the lake is more renowned and noble by occasion of this later and fresher tale, than the other.

After the expiation of so great and prodigious a wonder, much consultation there was in the Senate that yeare, as concerning the Hernicks: for having sent their heraulds unto them for an appendate of harmes done, but to no effect, they determined with all convenient speed to propose unto the people, for to proclaime warre against the Hernicks, and bid them defiance. The people generally with one voice liked thereof, and approved it. The charge of that service

C and exploit tell to L. Genutius his lot, to undertake. Now, for that he was the first Consul of the Commons that by his owne auspices and conduct should manage warre, the citie was in great expectation of the sequele and issue: and according to the event that should fall out, good or bad in this journey, they were to judge, whether they had done well or amisse to communicate these dignities with the Commons. But it fortunod so, that Genutius being with great preparation and power set forth against the enemies, was entrapped by an Ambuscado, his legions upon a suddaine feare unlooked for defeated, himselfe (the Consul) environed round about, and slain by them, that wist not whome they slew. Which tidings being brought to Rome, the Senatours were not so pensive and sorrowfull for the common calamitie, as they frowned and tooke on most insolently, for this unhappy expedition and conduct of the Commoner Consul: and muttered in all places these and such like speeches: Now let them go and create Consuls againe out of the comminaltie, and translate the Auspicia whether they ought not. What? Because the Senatours by an Act of the Commons, might be defeated and dispossessed of their dignities, could so inauspicate and irreligious a lawe, prevaile likewise against the gods immortall? Who now themselves have taken the matter into their own hands, and maintained their power, their deitie and Auspices: which were not so soone medled withall, and polluted by one that had no right thereto, nor lawfull title, but both the whole armie, and captaine also, were vanquished and overthrowne; to teach them for ever hereafter, how they make their solemne Elections of Magistrates confusedly, without regard of the rightes and roialties of noble houses. These speeches both Counsell house and common place rong againe withall. So the Consul

E full Servilius with consent of the Nobles, named for Dictatour Appius Claudius, who had aforetime in an oration before the whole assembly of the Commons, dissuaded the proceeding of that law; and now with greater authoritie blamed the mishap of that counsell, which was by him misliked and reproved. A multer was proclaimed, and a publike Vacation. But before that the Dictatour and these new enrolled legions were gone as farre as the Hernicks confines, the other armie under the leading of G. Sulpitius the Lieutenant, by occasion of an occurrent that fell out there, got a good hand against their enemies. For when as upon the death of the Consul, the Hernicks advanced in scornfull and contemptuous manner, close under the campe of the Romanes, with a full hope to be masters of the same; behold, what with the exhortation of the Lieutenant, and what for anger and indignitie, wherewith the fouldiours stomacks were full, they made a sallie out against them. Whereupon the Hernicks came so farr short of their accompt, that they had no hope to assaile, no nor approach the rampier: and so in disaray they dismarched and departed. Afterwards by the coming in of the Dictatour with a fresh power, the old armie was reinforced double. The Dictatour in a solemne audience, having praised the Lieutenant & his fouldiours for defending their tentes so manfully, both encouraged them that heard themselves so highly commended according to their deserts, and also whetted on the rest to performe the like valorous service. The enemies on the other side were nothing slacke to prepare themselves to fight againe: who in remembrance of the honour they had already won, albeit they were not ignorant that the Romans forces were redoubled, increased their own power also. For the whole nation of the Hernicks, even as many as were able to draw sword, were called forth to the wars. Eight cohorts by themselves consisting of foure hundred in a band were enrolled, even the most able and choise men of all others. These elect and especiall floure of their youth and manhood, they fed with hope and encouraged themore to this service, because they had taken order they should have double paie. Freed they were besides from all other labour and Militarie toile, that being thus reserved to intend the fight and nothing els, they should make reckoning and know, that they were to indeavour and straine themselves above the ordinarie carriage of souldiours. Placed also they were in the battaile, apart from the other ranks: to the end their valour and devoir might be more scene and marked. Betweene both camps of the Romanes and Hernicks, there was a plaine of two miles in length: and there in the mid way in a maner, was the battail fought. First, the fight was doubtfull on both sides, whiles the Romane horsemen charged and recharged againe, but ever in vaine, to see if they could breake their battailions. Thus when the service on horseback, proved lesse in effect than in attempt, they asked the advice and craved leave of the Dictator: which being granted, they abandoned their horses, and with a mightie shout, ran forth before the ensignes, and renewed the battaile afresh. Neither could they have beene any longer endured, but that those extraordinarie bands opposed themselves, and received them with equall might of bodie and valour of heart. Then was the fight maintained betweene the brave youth and principall floure of both nations. And looke what slaughter there was by common hazard of warre, as well of the one side as of the other, the losse was greater for the qualitie of the persons, than the proportion of the number. For the rest of the common souldiours, as if they had thured from themselves the whole conflict, and betaken it to the vawards only, reposed their owne event and hap in the manhood of others. Many a man on both parts was smitten downe and died in the place, but more were hurt and wounded. At last, those horsemen that dismounted, fell to call and rebuke one another, asking what hope remained els besides? If neither on horseback they were able to drive the enemies back, nor on foote force them to give ground and remove them, what third kinde of service looked they for? Why leapt they out so lustily and bravely into the forefront before the ensignes? and fought in the place of others? With these words provoking one another, they pluckt up their hearts, and with a fresh shout set forward and gave a new charge. First, they compelled the enemies to recuile & loose their standing: then to give more ground: and at length plainly to turne their backe and run away. Hard it is to say, being so equally and indifferently matched as they were, what it was that turned the ballance and gave the victorie: unless it were the perpetuall fortune that ever followed both nations, able to advance the spirit and courage of the one, and to daunt and abate the hearts of the other. The Romanes had the Hernicks in chafe, all the way long, so farre as to their campe: but because it was faire in the evening, they staid from assailing it. For by reason that it was long ere the Dictator could by sacrifice gather any assured token of Gods favour, he sounded not the battaile before noone: whereby it continued untill night. The morrow after, were the Hernicks fled and their campe abandoned: only some hurt and wounded souldiours were found left behind. But one troupe of them that forooke their ensignes (when as neere unto their wals and fortres their banners were discovered, slenderly accompanied, and with few about them) was scattered abroad over the fields, and in great feare stragled all about, and shamefully fled away. And yet this victorie of the Romanes cost them well the setting on, and spent some blood: for they lost a fourth part of their men: and that which was no small damage unto them, some of the Romanes horsemen also were slaine.

The next yeare following, when C. Sulpitius and C. Licinius Calvus the Consuls, were gone with a power against the Hernicks, and finding not the enimie abroad in the countrie, had by force wonne Forentinum a towne of theirs: in their returne homeward, the Tyburts kept their gates shut against them. And after many complaints & unkindnesse ripped up betweene them: this last quarrell was it, that moved the Romanes by their Heraulds (after restitution and amends demanded) to send defiance, and proclaime war against the people of Tybur. That Titus Quintus Penus was Dictator that yeare, and Serg. Cornelius Maluginensis Generall of his horsemen,

- A it is agreed upon by all authors. Macer Licinius writeth that he was created for the holding of an assembly for Election of Magistrates, and that, by the Consul Licinius: because when his fellow Consul made hast to have the Election before the warre, thereby to continue his owne Consulship, it was thought good to withstand and meete with his naughtie desire in that behalfe. But Licinius [Macer] in searching to his name and family, that praise and commendation, maketh himselfe to be of lesse credite in writing of the rest: especially, seeing that in none of the olde records, I finde mention of any such matter. Mine owne minde giveth me rather, that the Dictator was created because of the Gaules tumultuous warre. For certes that yeare they encamped themselves three miles from Rome, beyond the bridge of * Anio, in the way Salaria.^{T. Livius}
- B the Militarie oath of all the younger sort; and with a puissant armie departed the cittie, and upon the very banke on this side of Anio pitched his tents. In the mid way betweene them and the enemies there was a bridge: which they would not breake downe on either part, least they should be thought fearfull cowards. But about the seising and gaining of that bridge, first, there was many a skirmish: and judged it could not be, considering the equall forces of both sides, who should be masters of it. Then advanced forward unto the bridge (void of all guards) a mightie tall and bigge Frenchman, and as lowd as ever he could set out a throte, maketh this challenge; Now (quoth he) let the bravest gallant that Rome hath, come forth and spare not, to combat if hee dare, that the event of us twaine may shewe whether nation is more valiant and warlike. The brave Knights and youtnes of Rome, held their peace a good while, both abashed to refuse the challenge, and also unwilling to run upon the present hazard of a single fight. Then T. Manlius, the sonne of Licinius, even he who released his father from the Tribunes troubles, goeth forth of his quarter unto the Dictator. Without your leave and expresse commandement (quoth he) o Noble Sovereigne, I would never presume to fight out of my ranke and standing, no, nor if I should see assured victorie before mine eyes: but if it will please your excellencie to give me licence, I will shew unto that beast yonder (that so proudly and lustely is come forth leaping before the enemies ensignes, and braving as you see) that I am descended of that house and race, that gave the whole armie of the Gaules the foile, and turned them downe the Cliffe Tarpeia. Then said the Dictator unto him, God blesse thee T. Manlius: On forth a Gods name, in this thy dutifull mind and zeale that thou carriest both to father and countrie: Go on I say, and with the helpe of the gods, performe the Roman name to be invincible. Then his feeser and companions holpe to arme the younge Gentleman. A light footmans shield he takes unto him, and a spanish blade by his side, more handsome to fight short and close. Being thus armed and set out, they bring him forth against this vainglorious Gaule, set all upon joy tull foolishly, and (as the auncient writers have thought it worth the noting and remembrance) scornfully lelling and blaring out his tongue. Then the rest departed every man to his owne quarter and warde: and the two armed champions were left in the midst, more like a festivall spectacle and pageant to behold, than any fight at utterance, suiting to the manner, guise, and law of combat, considering they were not equally matched, if a man should judge by the eie and outward view. The one of them of personage mightie and exceeding tall, his coate armour of sundrie colours and gay, his harness glittering and all damasked and engraven with gold. The other, a man of a middle stature of Souldiours, no great shew of armor, and that rather fit and handsome, than gaudie to behold: without any houping, singing, and joyous vaunting of himselfe, without vaine flourishings and shaking of his weapons in the aire: but he had an heart full of resolute courage, stomacke, and close anger within, reserving all his fiercenesse and eagenesse unto the very bickerment and triall of fight. As they stood thus betweene the two armies, and so many men all about looking on, in doubtfull suspence between hope and feare, the Gaule like as he had beene a huge mountaine aloft over the other, readie to fall upon him, held forth his target with the left hand to bear off the sword of his enimie comming against him, & let drive a down-right blow edgelong, that it rebounded againe upon his shield, and did no harme at all. The Romane bearing his own sword with the point upward, and with his shield having smitten the nether part of his enemies target, and turned it aside, got with his whole bodie close within him, and without the danger of being hurt: and when he had wound himselfe betweene his enemies bodie and his swords point, he redoubled one or two foines, and thrust him up into the bellie at the groine, and so overthrew him. There lay the Gaule along, and rooke up a great ground in length. When he was
- Z ij downe,

downe, without any further mangling and tormenting his carcasſe, he deſpoiled him only of his colar of gold, which embued as it was with blood, he did about his own neck. The Gauls with fear and admiration of this ſight, were aſtonied. The Romans with great cheerfulneſſe came forth of their wards & quarters to meet their champion, and with great praife & congratulation brought him before the Dictator. And as they merily caſt forth (as the maner of ſoldiours is) certain pleaſant ditties, ballad wiſe, but without artificial ſkil of poetrie, they were heard to ſurname him * Torquatus: which afterwards was taken up & commonly uſed, & became an honorable name to his poſteritie, & the whole houſe beſides. Beſides all this, the Dictator beſtowed upon him a coronet of gold for a reward, and openly before the whole audience of the armie, highly and wonderfully commended that ſight of his. And certainly, that combat was of ſuch conſequence, & made ſo much to the event of the whole warre, that the night next following, the hoſt of the Gauls, fearfully abandoning their tents, departed into the Tyburtine countie: and being drawne into a ſocietie offe arre with the inhabitants of * Tybur, and liberally by them relieved with victuals, they paſſed within a while into Campania. Which was the cauſe that the next yeare, C. Petilius Balbus the Conſull (when his fellow M. Fabius Ambuſtus was by lot, ſent with commiſſion againſt the Hernicks) led an armie, by the appointment of the people, againſt the Tyburtines. To the aid of whom, when the French were returned out of Campania; there was ſoule ſpoile & havocke made in the Laviane, Tuſculane, and Albane territories, by the leading and conduct, no doubt of the Tyburtines. And wherasthe State ſtood well contented that the Conſull ſhould be the Generall commander, againſt theſe enemies the Tyburtines; this new trouble and tumult of the Gauls, cauſed a Dictator ſor to be created. And that was Q. Servilius Hala, who named for his Generall of horſemen, T. Quintius. And by the authoritie and aſſent of the Senatours, he vowed to ſet out the great games, in caſe he ſped well in this warre. The Dictator having commaunded the Conſull with his armie to tarry ſtill, that by his own conduct of warre he might keepe in the Tyburtines, tooke the oth of all the yoonger people: and there was not one reſuſed to go to the warre. Not farre from the gate Collina was this battaile fought, in the ſight of their parents, wives and children. Great encouragements, doubtleſſe, to cheere up and animatenem, abſent and farre off: but now before their eyes, partly for ſhame, and partly for pittie and compaſſion, they ſet the ſoldiours all on fire. After much blood ſhed on both ſides, at the laſt the armie of the Gauls turne backe: and being put to flight, they made haſt to Tybur, the very ſtrength and fort of the Gauls warre. But as they fled ſtragling one from another, they were encountered by the Conſull Petilius not farre from Tybur. And when the Tyburtines iſſued forth to ſuccour them, they with the reſt were beate into the towne. Likewise the other Conſull Fabius, firſt in ſmall skirmiſhes, and at laſt in one notable pight field, vanquiſhed the Hernicks, at what time as his enemies charged upon him with all their forces and whole puiſſance. The Dictator having highly commended the Conſuls, both in the Senate houſe and alſo in a publicke aſſembly of all the people, and attributed the whole honour of his owne Acts unto them, gave up the Dictatorſhip. Petilius obtained a double triumph, over the Gauls and the Tiburtes. For Fabius it was thought ſufficient, that he ſhould enter into the cittie Ovant in a petie triumph. The Tyburtines ſkoffed an i made good game at the triumph of Petilius. For, where was it (ſay they) that they encountered and joined battaile with us? There went forth indeed out of the cittie gates a few of us to behold the flight and fright of the Gauls: but ſeeing our ſelves alſo to be ſet upon, and killed one with another as we came in the way, we retired backe, and got the cittie over our heads. And was that ſuch a doughtie deed, that the Romanes ſhould thinke, it deſerved a triumph? But that they may not deeme it ſtill, ſo noble and ſo wonderous an Act, to make ſome ſtirre and raiſe a tumult in the enemies gates: they ſhould themſelves ſee ſhortly greater fearfullneſſe, even under their owne wals. Heerupon, the yeare following, when M. Popilius Lenas, and Cn. Manlius were Conſuls, at the firſt watch of the night, they came from Tybur in warlike manner to the cittie of Rome. This ſuddaine occurrent, happening ſo fearfully in the night ſeaſon, ſtroke a mightie terror into them, that haſtily awakened out of ſleepe. Beſides, many there were that wiſt not, either what enemies they were, or from whence they came. Howbeit they cried Al arm with all ſpeed, on every ſide. The gates were fortified with warders, the wals manned with ſtrong gardes. When as early in the morning, they were deſcried to be but a mean number of enemies before the town, and thoſe none other but Tyburtines; the Conſuls ſallied out at two gates, and aſſailed both waies their forces, as they were now come under the wals readie to ſcale. Then was it ſeen that they were thither

A thither come, preſuming rather on the vantage of the time, than truſting in valour & manhood: ſo little were they able to abide the firſt brunt and charge given by the Romanes. Furthermore; it was well knowne, that this their coming turned to the Romanes good: for, the diſcord that was now breeding between the Senators & the Com. ſor feare of this ſo neer danger was quite ſtaied. But in the next war that enſued, the enemies came after another ſort, & were more terrible to the fields and countie, than to the cittie. For the Tarquinians overran all the marches of the Roman pale, waſting and ſpoiling all thoſe parts, eſpecially that border upon Hetruria. And after reſtitution & amends demanded, but to no effect, the new Coſſ. C. Fabius & C. Plantius, by the ordinance of the people proclaimed war againſt them. The rumors alſo of the Gauls war began to be riſe. But amid theſe manifold and fearefull troubles, this was their comfort, that the Latines had peace granted unto them, upon their own ſure: & from thence a great power was received, according to the ancient league, which for many years ſpace, they had forelet & diſcontinued. The Roman forces by this aid well ſtrengthened, made a lighter matter of it, when they heard that the Gauls were arrived already at Preneste, and were ſet down & encamped about Pedum. It was thought good, that C. Sulpitius ſhould be choſen Dictator, named by C. Plantius, ſent ſor to the ſame purpoſe. Vnto whom M. Valerius was appointed for Commander of his horſemen. Theſe marched againſt the Gauls with the choiſe ſoldiours of two Conſular armies. This was a lingering war and protracted longer a great deale, than both parties liked of. At the firſt, the Gauls only were ſharpe ſet and eger of battaile: but afterwards the Roman ſoldiours, by ruſhing into fight and ſkirmiſh, exceeded farre the ſearceneſſe and forwardneſſe of the French. The Dictator, was nothing pleaſed herewith, to put all up on the hazard of fortune, when there was no need at all, eſpecially having to deale with that enemy, whom tract of time and diſadvantage of the place, made daily worſe and worſe: being unprovided beſides of victuals and making long abroad without any fenced fort: moreover, of that ſtomacke and conſtitution of bodie, as ſerved wholly for expedition and quicke ſervice, and by ſmall delaies waxed feeble and faint. Vpon theſe conſiderations, the Dictator held off ſtill and drew the war on length, and had proclaimed a grievous puniſhment, if any without his expreſſe commaundement ſhould fight with the enemy. The ſoldiours could not well brooke this: but firſt within their wards and watches began among themſelves to carpe at the Dictator: and otherwhiles they let ſie at the LL. of the Senate in generall, blaming them for their direction, in that the Conſuls had not the managing of this warre. They have choſen D indeed (ſay they) a ſingular Generall for the nonce, a captaine alone, who thinks whiles hee ſiteth ſtill and doth nothing, the victorie will fall from heaven, or ſie into his verie lap. After this they began openly abroad, and in the day time, to caſt out the ſame, yea and worſe ſpeeches too and more malepart: namely, that they would either fight, and aſke the Dictator no leave, or go along in order of battaile to Rome. The Centurions alſo joined themſelves to the ſoldiours: and not onely in conventicles and knots together, there was whispering and grumbling: but in the verie * Principia, yea and within the quarter of the L. Generall his pavilion, were heard conſuſed ſpeeches together in one accord. So as the multitude began now to grow to a full aſſembly, and from all parts to call and crie aloud, to go preſendy to the Dictator: and that Sex. Tullius ſhould in the name of the whole armie ſpeake unto him, as beſeemed his vertue and courage. This Tullius now had ben ſeven times already a primipila or principall Centurion: neither was there in the whole armie, of all thoſe that ſerved on foot, a man more renowned for ſeats of armes. He going before the armie of footmen, ſteppeth to the Tribunall. And when as Sulpitius intervailed, not ſo much to ſee that companie, as the leader of the companie Tullius, who of all the ſoldiours had ever been in beſt order and moſt obedient. This is the matter (quoth he) o Noble Dictator and nothing elſe, The whole armie in generall, ſuppoſing themſelves by you condemned of cowardice, and in a manner to their utter ſhame abandoned, & diſarmed, have intreated me to plead their cauſe before your maieſtie. And I for my part, I aſſure you, in caſe we might be charged to have loſt ground any where, in caſe we had turned our backs upon the enemy, in caſe we had loſt our enſignes ſhamefully, would think it yet a reaſonable ſuit to be obtained at your hands, that you would give us leave to amend that which is amiſſe, to correct our former fault with hardines and valour, and by ſome freſh and glorious exploit, to cancell the remembrance of ſo ſoule ſoile and ſhamefull diſhonor. Even thoſe very Legions that were defeated and put to flight at Allia, afterwards in their returne from Veij, recovered the ſame countie of theirs by valiancy, which they had once before loſt through cowardice. But we by the goodnes of God, through the felicitie of your selfe and the people of Rome, have hitherto kept both the armie unfoiled, & honor unstained. And yet I scarce dare say, honour; if so be, that not only our enemies may with all reprochfull tearmes scorne and flout us, as if wee were women pent in and mewed up close within our rampier: but also you our Generall (the more is our greefe) deeme us your armie, to be heartlesse, handlelesse, and armourlesse: and before any trial of us made, so despaire of us, as if you tooke your selfe to bee a commaunder and leader of a sort of maimed and feeble persons. For what else may wee thinke of it, that you, an old experienced capitaine and a most valiant warrior, should sit, as they say, with one hand in another, doing nothing? For howsoever the truth is indeed, more meet it is, that you should bee thought to doubt of our valour, than wee of yours. But if this be not a devise of your owne setting, but a publick plot laid: and some matter agreed upon among the Senators at home, rather than any warre of the Gaules, keepeth us away from thence, confined as it were from the cittie and our owne houses: then I beseech you, whatsoever I shall say, you would thinke it as spoken, not by the souldiours to their Lord Generall, but by the Commons to the rulers and Senators. Who may thus replye, that as yee have your pollicies and counsels, so will they have their designs and waies of their owne likewise. For who would thinke, I pray you, that wee are your souldiours, and not your slaves; sent to war, and not into banishment? If any set out the banner of warre unto us, lead us forth into the field, & found the battell, readie wee are to fight like men, and like Romans: but if there bee no need of warre, we will rather sit still at home, than in the campe. And thus much, suppose as spoken to the lords of the Senate. But wee thy souldiours, o worthe Generall, beseech thee first to give us leave to fight, then desirous are we to conquer, and under thy standard and conduct to conquer: to present thee with a glorious garland of lawrell, and in triumph to enter with thee into the cittie: and after thy chariot to go up with joy and mirth to the temple of Iupiter Optimus Maximus. This Oration of Tullius, the multitude seconded with their petitions, calling aloud unto the Generall on everie side, to found the al arme, and commaund them to arme. The Dictatour, albeit hee thought the matter in it selfe good, but not handled in good manner; and for example sake not to be allowed: yet promised to satisfie the souldiours desire. And calling Tullius secretly apart, questioned with him what this geere ment, what precedent or custom they had for their warrant? Tullius earnestly besought the Dictatour, not to thinke him to have forgotten either militarie discipline, or his owne place, ne yet the majestie of his soveraigne. And whereas he had not withdrawn himselfe away from the multitude being in a mutinie, nor refused to bee their speaker (who lightly remember those that are their ringleaders) it was onely for feare lest some other should have stept in place, such as the unruly people in mutinies are wont to set up for their Chieftaines. As for himselfe, do nothing he would, without the pleasure of the Generall. Howbeit, hee would advise him to looke well about him, and carefully to see to it, that he keep his armie in order, government, and obedience. And high time it is now, and would not be deferred. For considering their harts were kindled already, and their bloud up, they would be their owne carvers, and chuse themselves both time and place, if the Generall would not graunt it them the sooner. Whiles they were thus in sad communication, there happened two Roman souldiours to take perforce from a Gaule certaine sumpter horses, which feeding without the campe, he was driving away. At whome, the Gaules let stie stones good store. And thereupon rose an al arme from the Roman Corps de guard, and running out there was avie, on both sides. So as now they had growne to a full skirmish and battaile indeed, had not the Centurions speedily stickled them, and ended the fray. Vpon which occurrent, the credite of Tullius with the Dictatour was confirmed: and seeing the case would abide no delays, he proclaimed battell against the morrow. The Dictatour notwithstanding hee had yielded to fight a field, as presuming more upon the courage of his men, than their forces: began to devise with himselfe, and cast about every way, how by some stratageme he might strike a terrour among the enemies. And having a subtile wit and nimble head of his owne, this new pollicie hee thought upon: which afterwards many warriors, both of our owne countrie, and of others also, yea and some even in our time, have used and put in practise. He gave order, that the mules sumpters should bee taken off their backs, leaving onely two course twillies or coverings upon them, and fettereth the muletours aloft thereon, furnished with the armour of certaine captives, and sicke and diseased persons. Of these he made weel neere one thousand, and joined unto them one hundred good horsemen. All these, hee chargeth in the night time to get above the campe into the hils, and among the glins and woods, to bestow themselves close: and not to stir from

A from thence, before that he gave them a signall. Himselfe, so soone as it was day light, began with great warinesse and considerate care to embattaile and arrange his armie in length, along the very foot of the mountaines: to the end, that the enemy might have the hils full against him. Thus having set out and directed these counterfeite cornets of horse, to skare the enemies with, who, as it fell out, did more good in a manner, than the other forces indeed: at the first, the vaward of the Gaules thought that the Romanes would not come downe on even ground: but afterwards, when they saw them upon a suddaine descended, they also, as desirous of fight, ran on forward presently to joine battaile, and began the fight before the captaines had sounded. The Gaules charged the right wing more fiercely, so that hardly they might have been abidden, had not by good hap the Dictatour been there in person. Who called upon Sextus Tullius by name, and rebuked him, demanding whether hee had given his word unto him, that the souldiours should in that sort fight? What is become (quoth hee) of these, that with out-cries and open mouth called for battell? Where are those threats now, that they would begin to fight a field without commandement of the Generall? Lo, your Generall himselfe calleth upon you as lowd as he can, to fall to your businesse, and goeth armed before the ensignes in the vaward: will anie now follow after, that erewhile would needs lead the way afore? Fierce (I see well) in campe, fearefull in the field. And no fable it was that they heard him speake. Whereupon for very shame they were so pricked forward, that without casting any perils, or minding present danger, they ran upon the darts and shot of their enemies. This violence of theirs, as if they had bene welneere out of their right wits, at the very first troubled and disordered the enemies. The horsemen that were sent out hard after them, forced them to turne backe, when they were once in disarray. The Dictatour himselfe seeing the battell of one side to shrinke, advanced forward with the ensignes against the left wing, unto which he saw the maine multitude to resort and gather together, and withall hee gave the signe to them that were within the hils, according as it was before agreed. And when from thence also a new shout arose, and that they were seene to march sidelong overthwart the hill, toward the Gaules campe; then for feare, lest they should be shut out from their hold, they gave over all fighting, and ran by heapes to their camp. Where M. Valerius, the Generall of the horsemen encountred and affronted them. For hee seeing the right wing discomfited, had set a compass about, and ridden to the fortifications and munitions of the enemies. Whereupon they fled to the mountaines and the woods. Most of them were received by the counterfeite shew of horsemen, and by the muletours caught up, and came short home: but as many of them as feare drave through into the woods, were (after the heat of the battaile was past) cruelly slaine and hewen in peeces. Neither was there any one, setting M. Furius aside, that triumphed more worthily over the Gaules, than did C. Sulpitius. He consecrated also in the Capitoll a good weightie masse of gold, gotten out of the Gaules spoile, and compassed it within an encloure of square stone. The same yeare, the Consuls likewise warred, but with diverse fortune and successe. For by C. Plantius, the Hernickes were vanquished and subdued. But his companion Fabius fought rashly and unadvisedly against the Tarquiniens. The losse in the battaile received, was not so much, but that the Tarquiniens sacrificed three hundred and seven Romane souldiours, whome they tooke prisoners. This foule and shamefull execution, caused the ignominie of the Romanes decrease afore, to bee much more notable, and talked of abroad. Besides this losse, was the Romane territorie much wasted (to helpe the matter withall) by the Privemates, and after them by the Veliternes, who made sodaine inrodes into the countrie. The same yeare also were two more Tribes added, Pomptina and Publicia. The votive solemne plaies or games likewise, which Marcus Furius the Dictatour had vowed, were then set forth and performed.

Then and never before was the first law put up to the people by P. Petilius, a Tribune of the Commons, and that by the consent and approbation of the Senatours, against the excessive suit and ambitious standing for dignities. By which law men supposed, that the ambition principally of certaine persons new risen and of the first head, who were wont to haunt faires and places of great resort for that intent, was repressed and kept under. But the yeare ensuing, when C. Marius and Cn. Manlius were Consuls, M. Duellius and M. Menenius two Tribunes of the Commons, went through with a law and got it enacted, which was not so well liked of the Senatours, to wit, concerning Vsurie of one in the hundred. But the Commons were so much the more forward and better contented, to grant and accept it. Over and besides those new wars the yeare before entended, the Falisci were declared new enemies: and that, for two quarrels pretended against them. One, for that their youth had served against the Romanes under the Tarquiniens: the other, because they had not delivered againe those Romanes which fled unto Falerij, after their defeature and unluckie fight, notwithstanding the Heralds had made claime unto them and demanded them. This province fell to Cn. Manlius. But Martius had the leading of an armie into the land of the Privernates, which by reason of long peace was unfoiled yet, and in very good state, and thereby enriched his souldiors with good prizes. For, to the plentie and store that there was found, he added his owne bountie and liberalitie; in that he set out nothing for the common treasure, but favoured the souldiors, and gave them leave to better their owne private estate. The Privernates lay strongly encamped before their own cittie: and when he had assembled all his souldiors together, Now (quoth he) I give unto you the enemies campe and their cittie for a bootie, so you will promise me to quit your selves like men, and to be as readie to fight as to spoile. Hereupon, with a great crie they call for the Signall of battaile: and so advancing forward and exalting themselves bravely and courageously, with assured hope of victorie, to battaile they go. There, even before the ensignes in the vanguard, Sext. Tullius, of whom wee spake before, cried out aloud, Behold, Noble Generall (quoth he) how thine armie performeth their word given unto thee: and therewith laying downe his Javelin, with drawne sword confronteth the enemy. Then follow after Tullius, all they that fought in the vaward before the Standerds, and at the first shooke put the enemies to flight, followed the chase & drave them into the towne. And as they were scaling the wals, the towne was rendred up into their hands. So he triumphed over the Privernates. By the other Consull there was no worthie exploit done, but that as he lay encamped before Sutrium, he proposed a law to passe by the Tribes, (a course never taken before, and without example) concerning a twentieth part or vicesime, to be levied of their goods that were made free. The Lords of the Senat (because by that Act there accrewed no small revenue to the Exchequer, that was now wasted) allowed thereof and gave their assent. But the Tribunes of the Com. moved not so much at the qualitie of the law in it selfe, as at the dangerous precedent given, ordained under paine of death, That no man ever after should in making of lawes withdraw the people apart: For, if that were once by law permitted, there would be nothing, were it never so pernicious to the people, but it might be enacted by souldiors, that have sworn to their Consuls allegiance, and were at his devotion. The same yeare was C. Licinius Stolo at the suit of M. Popilius Lenas, condemned upon his owne statute in * 10000 Asles, for that he together with his sonne, was possessed of a thousand acres of land, and under colour of freeing his sonne, he had deluded the statute in that case provided.

After this, the two Consuls M. Fabius Ambustus the second time, and M. Popilius Lenas the second time made two wars. That which Lenas fought with the Tyburtines was performed with ease and facilitie, For having driven the enemies into the towne, he forraied their fields. But in the other war, the Falisci and the Tarquiniens, discomfited in the first battaile the other Consull. Their greatest feare arose upon this occasion. For, their priests carrying afore them light burning torches, and snakes besides, went after a lunaticke and franticke manner, and with so strange and uncouth a shew troubled and disordered the Romanes souldiors. And therewithall, at that very instant the souldiors, as if they had been besought, besides themselves, and astonished, dismarched fearfully and stumbled upon the munitions and fortifications of their campe. But after, when as the Consull, Lieutenants and Colonels mocked and rated them, for being skared like children with these vaine bugbears: for shame sodainly they tooke heart againe, and like blinde men ran upon those very same things, that before they had fled from. And so after they had dispatched this vaine devise & preparation of their enemies, they fell upon the armed men indeed, discomfited their whole armie and put them to flight: and being the same daie masters of their camp, with a rich bootie returned victours, both recounting in their militarie merie ditties and songs, the foolish preparation of the enemy, and also condemning their owne fearfulness. After this, the whole nation of the Tuscanes arose, having for their leaders the Tarquiniens and the Falisci, and came as farre as Saline. Against which fearfull danger, was C. Martius Rutilus chosen, the first Dictator that ever was of the Commoners: who named for his Generall of the horsemen a Commoner likewise C. Plantius. But the Senatours thought this a shamefull indignitie, that the Dictatorship also should now be chosen in commune: and did all they could possibly to hinder, that there should be nothing decreed toward the war, nor any preparation made for

C. Martius Rutilus first Dictator of the Commoners.

A for the Dictatour. But so much the sooner, and with more readinesse, all that the Dictator proposed, the Commons granted. So he departed from the cittie, and marched on both sides of the Tyber (transporting his armie in boats and planks fastened together) to what place soever he heard the enemies were gone: and surprised many forraiers of them, as they wandered and straggled one from another, in the fieldes. He set upon their campe also, and wanne it: and after that he had taken eight thousand prisoners, and either slaine or chased all the rest out of the Romanes pale; he triumphed, by the suffrages of the people onely, without the approbation and assent of the Senatours. And for as much as they would not in any case have an assemblie for Election of Consuls, held either by the Dictatour a Commoner, or by the Consull: and because the other Consull Fabius was busied abroad in the warres, and not returned; therefore, the matter fell againe to an Interregne. So there were Interregents one after another, Q. Servilius Hala, M. Fabius, Cn. Manlius, C. Fabius, C. Sulpitius, L. Aemilius, Q. Servilius, and M. Fabius Ambustus. During the second Interregne, there arose some variance, for that both Consuls were Patritij, i. of the Nobles. And when the Tribunes interposed themselves, and crossed those proceedings, Fabius the Interregent, alleaged a law out of the twelve tables in these termes, THAT WHATSOEVER THE PEOPLE ORDAINED OR GRANTED LAST, THE SAME SHOULD BE GOOD, AND STAND FIRME AND RATIFIED: and in the suffrages and voices of the people, were comprised their graunt and ordinance. But when the Tribunes, for all their gainfaying and stepping between, could prevaile no more, but to prologue the * Comices for the Election, there were at length two of the Nobles created Consuls, C. Sulpitius Peticus the third time, and M. Valerius Publicola: who the same day they were chosen, entred into their office. Thus in the 400 yeare after the foundation of the cittie, and the 35 after it was recovered from the Gaules, the Commons lost the Consullship againe, when they had enjoied it nine yeares. And two Consuls of the Patritij, upon the Interregne, began to governe, to wit, C. Sulpitius Peticus the third time, and M. Valerius Publicola. The same yeare was Emptulm woon from the Tyburtines, without any memorable warlike exploit: were it that, under the conduct of both Consuls there jointly together, the warre was managed, as some have written: or that about the same time the Tarquiniens countrie was by the Consull Sulpitius overrun and wasted, whiles Valerius led forth a power against the Tyburtines. But more adoe had the Consuls at home, with the Commons and Tribunes. The Consuls thought now, it concerned them in trust and credit, as well as in vertue and valour, that as they, being Patritij both of them, had received the Consullship, so they should make over the same againe to twaine of the Nobilitie: and either wholly to give up their interest and title for ever, if so bee the Consullship should now become a Commoners dignitie: or els to keepe it wholly in their possession, wherof they were first seized intirely, in right of their auncestours. On the other side, the Commons frownded and stormed in these and such like tearmes. What shoulde we live any longer? and why are we accounted citizens? In case, that which was first gotten by the vertue and power of two only persons, L. Sextus, and C. Licinius, we cannot now all of us together hold and keepe? Certes, better wee were to endure the KK. and Decemvirs againe, or any other heavier and more fearefull name of absolute and lordly Empire, than to see both Consuls of the Nobilitie: and that wee, may not both rule and obey in turnes, but that the one part settled in the place of rule for ever, should thinke us, the Commons, were borne for nothing els but to obey and serve. The Tribunes themselves were nothing behind to set forward these troublesome mutinies. But when people are up once altogether and in an hure, the principall leaders are hardly seene above the rest in the action. And when as they were come downe into Mars field sundrie times to assemblie, but ever to no purpose and effect, and that many Comitall daies of assemblie were passed over, only in seditious troubles: at the last, the Commons being overmatched through the stiffenesse and obstinacie of the Consuls, tooke the matter so greevously to the heart, that when the Tribunes brake forth into these speeches, Now farewell freedome for ever: now are wee driven, not onely to forbear come ming into Mars field, but also to abandon and forsake the cittie, taken captive and oppressed by the lordly rule of the Nobles, and therewithall departed: the Commons with sorrowfull cheere did the semblable, and followed after. The Consuls being thus left destitute of one part of the people, yet nevertheless went through with the election, as few as they were there remaining. And Consuls there were elected of the Nobilitie both, M. Fabius Ambustus the third time, and T. Quintius. In some annales or yearely records, I find C. M. Popilius, in Reed of T. Quintius.

In that yeare, were two warres performed with prosperous successe. And the Tyburtines were fought withall untill they yeelded. From them was the cittie Saffula woen by force: and other townes had tasted of the same fortune, but that the whole nation laid armes aside, and submitted themselves to the Consul his mercie. He triumphed over the Tyburtines: otherwise the conquest was mild and gentle ynough, without extremitie of execution. But the Tarquiniens were cruelly dealt withall: and many a man of them slaine in field. Of the prisoners that were taken, whereof there was a mightie number, there were 358 of the Noblest and greatest Gentlemen chosen out, and sent to Rome. The rest of the common sort were put to the sword. Neither sped they better at the peoples hands that were sent to Rome. For in the mids of the Forum, were they all beaten with rods and beheaded. This execution made quittance with them, for sacrificing the Romanes in the market place of the Tarquiniens. This good successe in warre caused the Samnites also to seeke for peace and amitie. Their Embassadors were courteously answered by the Senate, and so upon covenants they were received into societie. But the Commons sped not so well at home in the cittie, as abroad in warfare. For albeit the Viurie was well eased by bringing it downe from twelve to one, in the hundred: yet the poorer people were overcharged with the payment of the very principall, and became bond & thrall to their creditors. Whereby the Commons in regard of their private freights, that they were driven unto, never troubled their heads with the making of both Consuls of the Nobles, nor with the Assemblies and Elections, nor other publicke affaires. Still the two Consulships remained among the Patritij. And created there were Consuls, C. Sulpitius Peticus the fourth time, and M. Valerius Publicola the second time.

Now when as the cittie was earnestly amuled upon the Tuscan war, by reason that the newes went, how that the people of Cere, for very pittie and compassion, and in regard also of consanguinitie, tooke part with the Tarquiniens: behold the Embassadors of the Latines turned them cleane against the Volscians. Which Embassadors brought word, that there was an armie levied already from thence and in armes, even now upon the point to invade their borders: and would from them enter the territorie of Rome, and spoile as they goe. The Senate therefore thought good to neglect neither businesse, and gave direction, that to both places certaine legions should be appointed, and the Consuls to cast lots for their severall provinces and charges. But afterwards, the greater care was taken for the Tuscan war, upon intelligence given by Sulpitius the Consul his letters, whose commission was against Tarquinij, that the countrie was wasted and spoiled all about the Romane Salinae, [or Salt pits] and part of the booties caried away into the confines of the Carites: and that the youth of that people were doublelesse employed in the driving of that bootie. Whereupon Valerius the Consul, who was opposed against the Volscians, and encamped in the marches of Tusculum, was called backe from thence, and commaunded by the Senate to nominate a Dictatour. Who named T. Manlius, the sonne of Lucius, and he taking to him A. Cornelius Cossus for his Generall of the horsemen, contenting himselfe with his Consular armie, by the authoritie of the Senate, and the peoples suffrages, proclaimed warre against the Carites, and sent them defiance. Then were the Carites afraid of war indeed, and not atore, as though there had ben more force in their enemies bare words, to denounce and signifie war, than in their owne deeds, who by spoiling and boothaling, had provoked the Romans to war. Then saw they plainly that they were overmarched and not able to make their parts good: then repented they that they had made such wast and spoile, cursing the Tarquiniens for solliciting them to revolt, not one of them making any preparation of armour or war: but every man laboring what he could, that embassadors should be sent, to crave pardon for their trespass & offence. When their Embassadors were come to the Senat, they were from thence put over to the people. And then they besought the gods, whose sacred Images they had received in the French war and devoutly kept and cherished, That the Romanes now in their flourishing estate, would take that pittie and compassion of them, which they in times past had of the Romanes in their calamitie and hard distresse. And turning to the chappels of Vesta, they called upon the Flamines and Vestall virgines, sometime their guests, whome they so chastly and religiously had received and given intertainment unto, saying in this wise. Would any man beleve we had deserved no better, but thus of a suddaine, without cause given, to be reputed enemies? Or suppose we had done somewhat sinelling of hostilitie, would any man impute it rather to deliberate counsell, than to some fit of heat and follie? And that we would blemish and marre our owne good deserts, especially conferred and bestowed upon so thankfull persons, with new misdeeds and shrewd turnes?

A and chuse to make the people of Rome their enemies now in their wealthie and flourishing State, and in their most happie felicitie of war: whose friendship in their adversitie we had embraced? Beseeching them not to terme that, considerate advice, which rather were to be called force and necessitie. For the Tarquiniens, say they, passing with a cruell & puissant armie through our countrie, and requesting nothing but away, had drawne with them some of our rusticall peasants, to assist them only in fetching of that bootie, which now so heavily is laid to our charge. Whom if you please to have them yeelded, we are readie to deliver them: if to be punished, they shall suffer accordingly: most humbly craving, that their citie Cere, the verie sanctuarie of the people of Rome, the harbour and hostell of their priests, the place of receit for the Romane sacred images and reliques, they would grant unto them safe from the calamitie of warre, and exempt from the slander thereof: and the rather for the professed vestall virgines sake, so kindly intreated, and for the love of the gods, by them so devoutly honored. The people were moved, not so much with the justice and equitie of the present cause, as for their old deserts and good turnes, to forget rather the harme sustained, than the good received. Whereupon, the people of Cere were pardoned, and agreed it was that a truce for one hundred years should be registred among the Acts of the Senate. Then were the forces diverted against the Falisci, who were tainted likewise with the same offence. But the enemies would no where be found. They waited therefore all over their confines: and forbore to assaile their townes. So they withdrew their legions to Rome. The rest of the yeare was employed in repairing their wals and towers: and the Temple of Apello was dedicated. In the verie end of the yeare, the contention between the Sertatours and the Commons, brake off the Election of the Consuls: whiles the Tribunes stily denied to suffer any assemblie therefore to be holden, unlesse it were according to the law Licinia. And the Dictatour againe was as stoutly and stily bent, to abolish wholly out of the citie the Consulship, rather than it should be indifferent for the Nobilitie & common people. Thus by adjourning the Election, the Dictatour left his office, and the matter grew to an Interreigne. And the Interregents, finding ever the Commons maliciously set against the Senatours, succeeded one after another unto the eleventh Interregent: and all the while continued the discord and variance. The Tribunes called on hard for the maintenance of the law Licinia. The Commons, they had an inward griefe that stuck neerer to them, upon the excessive usurie that still increased: and each mans privat care and grievance, brake out in their publicke contentions and debates. The LL. of the Senate weary of these troubles, commaunded L. Cornelius Scipio the Interregent for the time being, for concord and unitie sake, in the Election of Consuls to observe the law Licinia. So P. Valerius Publicola, had joined with him in fellowship of government, Caius Martius Rutilius, one of the Commons.

Now whiles mens minds were enclined oneto concord, the new Consuls labouring to ease also this matter of usurie, the onely spill or bone (as it were) between, that seemed to hinder the uniting of their hearts, and impeach the generall agreement; took order publickly for the payment of debts, by creating five officers or Quinquevirs, whom of the despening and disposing of the publicke monies, they called Mensarii. And surely, for their equitie and carefull diligence, they deserved in all monuments and records to be remembered and renowned. And these they were, C. Duellius, P. Decius, M. Papyrius, Q. Publius, and T. Aemilius. Who underwent and managed this matter, so intricate and difficult to be dealt in: so grievous and combersome to both sides for the most part, but evermore to one at the least. Which they performed both with indifferent moderation otherwise, and also with some cost and deffay of charge, rather than any losse and dammage to the State. For the long debts and more entangled, rather in regard of the debtors slacknes and negligence, than their want of abilitie, either the citie out of the common stock crossed out of the booke, by setting up certaine counters or tables with readie coine in the publicke hall (provided, that there were good securitie unto the citie by sureties and cautions put in aforehand) or els the goods of men valued at indifferent & reasonable prices discharged. So as not onely without any wrong done, but also without the complaint of both parties, a mightie deale of debts was satisfied and paid.

Five bankers instituted, called Mensarii.

All debts cleared in Rome.

After all this, a vaine feare of the Tuscan warre, upon a false Alarme given, that their twelve nations conspired and were confedered together, caused a Dictatour to be chosen. So C. Julius was named in the campe: for thither to the Coss. was the patent of the Senats decree sent. And to him was joined as Generall of the horsemen, L. Aemilius. But all was quiet withoutorth.

Within

Within the cittie the Dictator gave the attempt, that both Consuls should be created of the Patricians: which brought the government for the time to an Interregne. And the two Interregents that were in that while (to wit) C. Salpurnius and M. Fabius, obtained that which the Dictator had reached at in vaine; namely, that both Consuls might be created of the Nobilitie: for now the Commons were more pliable and tractable, by reason of the fresh benefit received, in the easement and satisfying of their debts. So there were chosen C. Salpurnius Peticius, he, who was the former of the twaine that gave over the Interregne, and Q. Quintus Pennus. Some there be that give to Quintus the addition of Cajus for his surname [and of Cajus for his forename.] Both of them went forth to warre, Quintus against the Falisci, and Salpurnius against the Tarquinians. Who, for that they could never meet with the enemy in open field, by burning and spoiling made warre with the fields rather than with the men. By which lingering continuance, as it were of a languishing consumption, the stubbornness of both nations was so well tamed, that they made petition, first to the Consuls, and by their permission after to the Senat, for a truce, and obtained the same for the space of fourtie years. Thus the care was laid aside of the two warres, which seemed to neer at hand. And whilst there was some rest from Armes, it was thought good because the payment of debts abovesaid, had changed the owners and masters of many things, that there should be held a general Selling of the citizens. But when there was an assembly summoned for the choosing of Censors, C. Martius Rutilus professing himselfe to stand for a Censorship, even he that had been the first Dictator of the Commons, troubled the peace and unitie of the States of the cittie. This he went about (as it seemed) in a verie undue and unseasonable time. For both Consuls were then of the Nobilitie, as it fell out, who gave it forth that they would not admitt to be a Competitor, nor propound his name at the Election. Howbeit, both he by earnest perseverance in his resolution obtained that which he went about: and also the Tribunes with all their might endeavouring to recover their right, which was lost in the Election of the Consuls, set to their helping hand. And as the countenance and majestie of the man himselfe, seemed worthe of the highest type of honour: so the Commons were right willing, that by the same man who had opened the way unto the Dictatorship, the Censorship also should draw to that side, and be in part conferred upon them. Neither in the assembly was there any variance in the Suffrages, but that, together with Manlius Nervus, Martius, should be created Censor. This yeare likewise had a Dictator, M. Fabius, not for any feare of warre, but because the law Licinia, for the choise of Consuls, should not be revived and observed. The Generall of the horsemen unto the Dictator was Q. Servilius. And yet for all the Dictatorship, the agreement of the Senators together, was in the Election of the Consuls of no more force than it was in the choosing of the Censors. For M. Popilius Lenas was Consull, of the Commons, and L. Cornelius Scipio of the Nobles. And the Commoner Consul, by good fortune, proved more famous of the twain. For when upon tidings brought, that a mighty armie of the Gaules were encamped in the Latine countie, this Gaules warre was laid extraordinarily upon Popilius, because Scipio lay grievously sicke. Who having soone levied an armie, and commaunded all the younger men, to meet him in their armour at Mars his Church, without the gate Capena, and that the Quellers should bring thither the Slanders and ensignes out of the Ararium, [cittie chamber] and after he had chosen out of them, fully foure Legions, he delivered all the residue of the foldiours unto P. Valerius Publicola, the Pretor: and moved the LL. of the Senate to enroll another armie to be in readines, against all uncertaine occurrences of warre, what need soever the cittie should have. And now himselfe being at all points, thoroughly furnished, setted forward to meete the enemy. Whose power because he would know, before he made triall thereof with the uttermost hazard, he began to cast a trench and raise a rampier upon the next hill unto the Gaules campe, that he could come unto. The Gaules, a feare kind of people and by nature eager of fight, having discovered a farre off the Romane ensignes, embattelled themselves forthwith, as readie to bid battaile. But when they saw the Romane armie not brought forth into the plaine and even ground, but that they were strongly defended, not onely by the height of the place, but also with a ditch and palisado, and supposing them to be smitten with feare, and the fitter therefore to be assailed, for that they were at that instant busily occupied about their other fortifications; with an hideous noise and horrible shout, gave the charge upon them. The Romanes gave over their worke never the sooner (they were the Triarii of the reereward that made these fortifications) but the spearmen or javellottiers of the vaward, and the Principes of the middle ward, who stood

A readie armed in guard for the defence of the pioners, made head and receiued them with fight. Besides their valour, the higher ground was their vantage: so as all their darts and speares light not in vaine (as commonly they doe that are flung and launced on leuell ground) but stucke all fast as though peised with their own weight: so that the Gaules being furcharged with darts either sticking through their bodies, or fast set in their shields, and so weighing them downe; having also run themselves upon the hill; first, as doubtfull what to do, made staie; afterwards, when protracting of time had discouraged themselves, and encouraged their enemies, they were driven backe and fell one upon another; and in that medley made greater havocke and worse, than the slaughter was by the enimie: and crushed they were to death, more in that crowd and thrust, than were slaine by sword. Yet were not the Romanes sure of victorie: for when they were come downe into the plaine, there was a new piece of worke to begin, and afresh trouble behind. For the Gaules, by reason of their number, little feeling such a losse (as if a new armie had started up in sight, out of the ground) stirred up their fresh souldiours and unfoiled, against the enimie in his victorie. Whereupon the Romanes made a stand and staied their egerneesse: both because they being already wearied, were to abide a new conflict; and also for that the Consul, whiles he laid about him with the formost, without regard of his own person, was wounded well neare through the left shoulder with a pike, and thereupon for a while was departed out of the battaile. By occasion of which lingering, the victorie had like to have been lost againe: but that the Consul when his wound was dressed and bound up, came backe againe with speede to the formost ensignes, and said: Why stand yee still first? yee have not to deale now, with the Latines or Sabines.

C your enemies, whom after yee have conquered by sword, yee may make of enemies friends and confederates: but upon very savage beasts we have drawne sword. Either we must have their blood, or they ours. From the campe ye have driven them backe: chased ye have them headlong downe the hill side: over the bodies of enemies lying along, now ye stand: fill the plaine also with their dead carcases, as ye have done the hills alreadie: and never looke that they will flee, so long as ye stand still. You must advance your ensignes, and charge the enimie afresh. With these exhortations they fell to it the second time, and forced the formost ranks and files of the Gaules to loose ground: and then with pointed close battailons of footmen, they brake through into the heart of the maine battaile. Whereupon the barbarous people being disaiaied, such as had neither certaine directions to follow, nor Captaines to commaund, turned their force upon their fellowes, were scattered here and there about the plaines, fled in this randon beyond their tents, & made toward the fort of Alba; which among many hills that stood of even height, they espied mounting above the rest. The Cons. followed the chase no farther than their campe: both because his hurt made himselfe unwell to, and also for that he was unwilling to put his tired armie to a new labour, considering the enimie had gained the hills tops, & so rested from farther pursuit. And when he had given the whole pillage of the campe to his souldiours, he brought backe to Rome his armie with victorie, and enriched with the spoiles of the Gaules. The Consul his wound staied his triumph: which was a cause also that the Senat wished and longed for a Dictatour, to hold the assembly for the Election of Consuls, whiles the other were sicke.

L. Furius Camillus being chosen Dictatour, had joined unto him P. Cornelius Scipio for his

E Generall of horsemen. Hee restored againe to the Senatours their ancient possession of the Consulship: and for this good turne, was himselfe with exceeding affection of them all, created Consul. And for his companion he chose unto him App. Claudius Crassus. But before the new Consuls entred into their office, Popilius, with great love and favor of the Commoners triumphed over the Gaules: who mumbling and muttering among themselves, would elsfoones aske one another, whither there were any repented of a Commoner Consul: raving withall at the Dictatour, who despising the law Licinia, had gotten for his reward a Consulship; which was more shamefull and infamous, in regard of his private seeking for it, (for being Dictatour, hee had made himselfe Consul) than for any other publicke harme and injurie. This yeare for many and sundrie troubles was very famous. The Gaules from the Albane glinnes (for that they were not

F able there to endure the cold of Winter) raunged all over the champion and the sea coasts, and wasted the countrie. The seas likewise were dangerous by reason of the Greekes navie. Also all the tract along Antium, and the river of Laurentum, even to the very mouth of the Tyber. So as the rovers and men of war by sea, and the land robbers of the French, met both together, & stucke once for all a dangerous battaile: and then departed asunder, the French unto their standing canpe,

campe, the Greekes backe unto their ships: both doubtfull, whether they had woon or lost. Amid these troubles, the greatest feare by farre, arose from this, that the Latine Nations held certaine Diets and Councils at the grove of Ferentina; and when the Romanes demanded souldiours from them, flat answere was made, That they must no more thinke to commaund them, whose aid they stood in need of. And as for the Latines, they were resolved rather to beare armes in defence of their owne libertie, than fight for the maintenance of the dominion of strangers. The Senate being grieved and perplexed, as well for these two forraigne warres, as also for the revolt of their confederates, seeing no other way, but to keepe them in by feare, whome loialtie would not restraîne, commaunded the Consuls in their mustering, to extend and straine to the utmost the whole strength of the State: for now that their Allies failed them, they were to trust upon their cittie forces onely. From all parts therefore, the youth as well without in the countie, as within the cittie were taken up, & ten legions (as men say) were enrolled of souldiours, amounting to 4200. foote and 300. horse in a legion. Which puissant armie, if now at this day any forraigne wars were toward, these mightie forces of the people of Rome, which the whole world is hardly able to containe, if they were united and brought into one together, would not easily make againe: so great are we grown in wealth onely and superfluous delights, to which we strive and apply our mindes.

Among other heaue occurrents of that yeare, Ap. Claudius one of the Consuls, in the very preparation of the wars, departed this life. Whereupon the whole government was devolved upon Camillus. To which sole Consull, either for his qualitie & worthinesse otherwise (not meete to be controlled by the absolute command of a Dictatour) or for the luckie presage of his name so fortunate in all the tumultuous wars of the Gaules, the Lords of the Senate thought it not decent and convenient, that there should be a Dictatour adjoynd. The Consull, having ordeined and appointed two legions for defence of the cittie, and parted the other eight with the Pretor L. Pinarius, bearing in minde his fathers valour and manhood, undertooke the Gaules war himselfe, without casting lots therefore: commanding the Pretor to keepe the sea coasts, and to put the Greekes backe from landing on the shore. He went himselfe downe into the countie of Pomptinum, and because he was not willing to give battaile in the champian, unforced therunto; and thought the enemy might be wearied out well enough by keeping him short, for foraging and fetching in booties, who of necessitie was driven to live of prey, chose a convenient place for a standing campe. Where, as they passed the time quietly in their wards, as a settled garrison: there cometh forth a mightie Gaule, in person tall and big, for armour brave and glorious: who clattering his shield and speare together, and thereby making silence, gave defiance and challenged by his interpreter, the Romans to a combat, man to man. There was one M. Valerius a Colonell of footmen, and a very young man, who thinking himselfe nothing lesse worthe of that honour than T. Manlius, having first knowne the Consull his pleasure, advanced himselfe forth apart from the rest, armed at all points. But this conflict (as touching the devoit of the men) was lesse notable than the other, by reason that the hand of God came between and tooke a part. For as the Roman was readie to joine and cope, behold, sodainly a raven setled upon the crest of his morion, even full in the face of his enemy. Which at the very first the Colonell tooke joyfully as a token of good lucke sent from heaven. Afterwards, he praised devoutly, that the God or goddesse who soever, that sent unto him from above that augurall soule, to presage and foreshew the future event, would be favourable and gracious unto him. And lo, (a wonder to be spoken) the bird not only held the place still, which it first light upon, but also, as often as the champions buckled and closed together, mounting up with the wings, made at the eyes and face of the enemy, with beake and claws both, so long, untill Valerius killeth him. For the Gaule being affrighted at this so strange and wonderous sight, both his eyes dazed, and his minde was mightily troubled. Then the raven tooke his rise, flew on height quite out of sight toward the East. All this while the campe on both sides was quiet hitherto. But after that the Colonell began to risse and disarme the bodie of his slaine enemy, neither could the French keepe themselves within their Stations, nor the Romanes containe, but run with more speed unto their Conquerour champion. And so about the bodie of the Gaule that lay along dead, began some skermish, and thereof grew a sharpe and cruell battaile. For now not onely the companies of the next quarters, and corps de guard, but also the whole legions on both sides, came abroad and fought. Camillus commanded the souldiours, joious for the victorie of the Colonell,

A joious also for the gods, so favourable and readie to helpe; for to go to battaile: and shewing estoones unto them the Colonell, set out bravely, and enriched with the spoiles of his enemy: Follow this brave gentleman, good souldiours (quoth he) and about the dead champion of the Gaules kill their whole troups, and lay them along. In this fight appeared the helpe of God, and man evidently: and they fought it out with the Gaules, and had no doubtfull conflict: both armies had so conceived & deeply imprinted before hand in their mind, the future event of these two souldiours that had fought together. Betwene the formost, whose concurse had raised others, there was a sharpe conflict: but the rest of the multitude, turned backe before they came to the volley of darts. And first they were scattered along the Volscian and Falerne countries: but afterward they tooke their waies toward Apulia and the lower Adriaticke sea.

B The Consull having assembled the souldiours to an audience, solemnly before them all, commaunded the Colonell, and rewarded him with ten oxen & a coronet of gold. Himselfe, by direction from the Senat, to attend the war by sea, joyned campe with the Pretor. And there, because through the cowardise of the Greekes that would not come into the field, the war was like to be long and lingering, he nominated, by the authoritie of the Senat, T. Manlius Torquatus for the Dictatour, to hold the Election of Consuls. The Dictatour having named for his Generall of horsemen, A. Cornelius Cossus, held the Election, and with exceeding favour of the people, declared for Consull one like himselfe, and tracing the steps of his owne vertue and glorie, M. Valerius Corvinus (for that was his surname afterwards) in his absence: a young man, I say, three and twentie yeares olde. To Corvinus was adjoynd companion in government a Commoner, M. Popilius Lenas the fourth time. Camillus performed no memorable exploit with the Greekes: for neither were the Greekes good souldiours on land, nor the Romans at sea. At the last, being kept from landing; and failing, besides other necessities, of fresh water, they left Italie.

C Of what people, or of what nation in Greece this fleet consisted, is not certainly known. I would thinke verely, that they were the Tyrants or potentates of Sicilie, above all other. For all Greece beyond them, at that time wearied and toiled out with civill warres, much feared the greatnesse of the Maccdonians. After the armies were discharged, and that both abroad there was peace, and also at home quietnesse, through the unite of the States: least they should be glutted with too much joie, behold, a pestilence arose in the cittie, and constrained the Senat to commaund the Decemviri, to overlooke the bookes of Sibylla: and by direction thereof, was a Lectisterne celebrated. The same yeare there was a Colonie, drawne out of the Antiates, to people Satricum, and the towne was repaired by them, which the Latines had destroyed. Also there was at Rome a league concluded with the Carthaginian embassadours, who came of purpose to sue for societie and amitie. The same rest continued still both at home and abroad, when T. Manlius Torquatus, and C. Plantius the second time were Consuls. The Vsurie which was before after one in the hundred, became now but halfe so much. The payment of debtes was dispensed and ordered into three yeares by even portions, so as a fourth part should be paid out of hand. And albeit some of the Commons (for all that) were pinched therewith, yet the Senat had more regard to see credite kept with the chamber of the cittie, than of the difficulties of private persons. The greatest matters were well eased, in that they forbore to collect the tribute and to muster souldiours.

D The third yeare after that Satricum was reedified by the Volscians; M. Valerius Corvinus the second time Consull, with C. Peilius, upon newes out of Latium, that embassadours from Antium went about to the nations of the Latines, solliciting them to rise up in armes, was commaunded to make war upon the Volscians, before the enemies forces were greater: who put himselfe on his journey with a fierce armie toward Satricum. Whither when as the Antiates and other Volscians were come to meete him, with a power provided aforehand, against any preparations from Rome, presently without any staie they joyned battaile, as being through a deepe feted and long hatred, maliciously bent one against the other. The Volscians, a nation more hastie to rebell, than hardie in fight, being defeated in a battaile, fled amaine, and highed apace to put themselves within the wals of Satricum. But when the wals were not able to save them, for that the towne being environed and invested round with souldiours, was readie to be taken by scaling, there were upon 4000. of them, besides the common sort not meete for service, that yielded themselves. The towne was rased downe and burnt. Onely they spared the firing of Matutales church. And the whole sackage and spoile was bestowed upon the souldiours. But there were not comprised within this bootie, the 4000 that yielded. Those, the Consull in his triumph caused to be led bound before his chariot: and after that, sold them; and brought a round sum of money into the treasure. Some write, that this number of captives, were bondslaves. And that is more like to be true, than that they should be sold, who yielded themselves. After this followed Consuls, M. Fabius Dorsuo, and Servius Sulpitius Camerinus. Then began the Auruncan war upon a sodaine invasion that they made. And for feare, lest the action of that one State and cittie, had been the resolution of the whole Latine nation and by their maintenance, there was created Dictatour (as if it had been against all Latium already up in armes) L. Furius Camillus: who chose for his Generall of horsemen, Cn. Manlius Capitolinus. And (as the use had been in time of great troubles and sodaine tumults) he mustered without any respect of Immunitie and Exemption, and therewith proclaimed a Cessation of all courtes of lawe: and the legions with all speed possible were led against the Auruncans. Where they found, that they carried a mind of harriers rather than of warriors. So that in the first battaile, that war was dispatched. Howbeit the Dictatour, because they not onely made the quarrell and warred first, but also offered fight without any drawing backe, supposing there was some neede of Gods help withall from heaven, had vowed a temple to Iuno Moneta: and after he had obtained that he vowed for, and thereby was charged to performe his vow, so soone as he was returned home to Rome with victorie, gave up his Dictatorship. The Senat commanded two officers called Duumvirs to be created for the edifying of that temple, according to the magnificence of the people of Rome. The place was appointed & set out on the [Capitol] hill, even the very plot of ground, where sometime before stood the dwelling house of M. Manlius Capitolinus. The Consull having imploied the Dictatour his armie in the Volscian war, surprised at unwarres the towne Sora out of the enemies hands. The temple of Moneta was dedicated the yeare after it had been vowed, when C. Martius Rutilius the third time, and T. Manlius Torquatus the second time, were Consuls. Immediately upon the dedication of that church, there ensued a strange wonder, like unto that old marvell of the hill Albanus. For it rained stones, & in the daie time it seemed to be darke night. And the bookes of Sibylla being perused (for that the cittie now was mightily given to superstition) the Senat ordeined, that there should be a Dictatour named for the ordeining of certaine feasts and holy daies. So P. Valerius Publicola was chosen, and with him, Q. Fabius Ambustus Generall of the horsemen. Order was given, that not onely the Tribes should go in solemne procession with their praier and Letanies, but also the nations that bordered upon them: with a precise direction unto them, upon what daies every one should make supplication. That yeare (as it is reported) there passed heaveie judgements and sentences of the people against the Viurers, with whom the Ediles had commensed sute. And without any notable cause to be remembered, they grew to an Interreigne. Upon which, that something might be thought thereby done, both Consuls were made of the Nobles, M. Valerius Corvinus the third time, and A. Cornelius Cossus.

Now from hence forth will we indite of greater wars, both for the puissance of the enemies, and also for their far distance: as well for their spacious countries they inhabited, as long tract of time that they continued. For this yeare began the Romans to bear armes against the Samnites, a nation powerful in wealth, and valiant in field. After which war, fought on both sides with alternative fortune, there succeeded Pyrrhus their enemy, & after Pyrrhus the Carthaginians. To see (good Lord) the wonderful stirs & troubles: and how often the Romans fel into extremities of perils, that their dominion and Empire might arise unto this greatnes and high state, which hath much ado to hold it own, and stand maintained. But the cause of the Romans war with the Samnites, being in societie & amitie linked together, arose first from others, and not upon any quarrel between themselves. At what time as the Samnites warred unjustly (as being more mightie) upon the Sidicines: they as the weaker, and forced to flee for succour unto the richer, banded with the Campanians. Who bringing with them a greater name, than power (in deed) to aid & assist their Allies, & flowing in riot and superfluous delights, hapned in the countrie of the Sidicines to be foiled & defeated by the other, who had been inured & hardened by continuall use of arms: and so afterwards drew upon their owne heads, the whole violence and poise of the wars. For the Samnites letting the Sidicines alone, went to the head, and set upon the Campanians, as it were the verie fortresse and castle of defence for all the borderers. For well they wist that there they might win victorie as easely: but riches and honour at their hands they were to achieve much more. And when they had gained and held with a strong garison, the hills called Tifata, that were adjoining,

A adjoining, and commanded the cittie Capua. From thence they descended with a four-square ranged battaile into the plaine that lieth betwene Capua and Tifata: where a second field was fought: In which the Campanians had the overthrow, and were beaten within their owne wals. Having therefore no hope neer hand, and seeing the strength of their youth greatly decayed, they were constrained to seeke for aide of the Romanes. Whose Embassadors being admitted into the Senate, and having audience given them, spake much what to this effect. The people of Capua, most noble Senatours, hath sent us in ambassie unto you, to crave at your hands friendship for ever, and succour for the present. Which amitie if we had requested in our prosperitie, well might it sooner have begun, but knit had it been with a weaker bond and not so durable. For then, remembring our selves to have entred league and societie on even ground, and in equall estate with you; friends haply we should have bene as we now are, but bounden and devoted unto you, we had never been. But now, in case by your commiseration and pittie we be gained and won, and in our distresse, by your aid, helped and relieved; we must needs affectionately embrace a benefit from you received, unlesse we would be thought unthankfull wretches, and unworthie of any helpe either of God or man. And albeit the Samnites, have been before us intainted in friendship and confederacie, yet we thinke that, no sufficient barre, but that we may also be received into the same. Onely thus much it ought to make for them, as to be preferred before us in ancientie of time, and degree of honour. For in that alliance between you and the Samnites, there is no expresse clause, no caveat or proviso contained, against the making of any new confederacies. And certes, alwaies heretofore ye have thought it cause good enough of your friendship, if the partie who fought the same, were but willing and desirous to be your friend. Wee Campanians (albeit our present condition suffereth us not to speake magnificently) giving place to no nation but your selves, either for the stately port of our cittie, or goodnesse, and fruitfulness of our soile, in entering into your acquaintance, shall not a little, I suppose increase and better your good estate. And first for the Aequians and Volscians, those eternall and perpetuall enemies of this cittie, they shall not so soone at any time stirre and put out their heads, but we will be freight upon their jacks. And looke what ye first shall find in your hearts to doe for our safetie, the same will we alwaies doe for your Empire and honour. And when those nations be once subdued that are betwene you and us (which your vertue and fortunate felicitie, promisseth will be shortly) then shall your dominion reach all the way in a continued train, as farre as unto us. A pitifull and lamentable case it is, that our present fortune urgeth us to confesse. To this exigent and hard termes of extremitie are we Campanians driven (right honourable) that subject we must be, either to our friends or to our enemies. If ye defend us, yours will we be; for sake us once, we must be the Samnites. Consult yee now therefore deliberately, whether ye had leifer, that Capua and all the territorie of Capua, should be annexed unto your power and State, or added to the Samnites Seignorie. Your mercy, your succour, o Noble Romanes, ought in equitie to extend unto all men, but especially unto those, who by yielding their reliefe and helping hand (even above their power) unto others, that implored and humbly besought succour, are now themselves fallen all, into the same streights of necessitie. And yet, to say a truth, we fought in shew and semblance of word for the Sidicines; but in verie deed and effect for our owne selves. For, considering a neighbour nation, bordering even vpon us, to be robbed and spoiled most wrongfully by the Samnites; we well foresaw, that when the Sidicines were once set a burning, the same fire would soone be driven and reach unto us. For now are not the Samnites come to assaile us, as discontented for any iniurie received: but, as well pleased that they have cause of quarrell, offered and presented unto them. For if it had been but a revenge onely of anger upon some pretended wrong, and not a meane and occasion, to satisfie their greedie appetite: had it not been enough for them, that they had vanquished and put to the sword our Legions once in the Sidicine countrie, and a second time in Campaine it selfe our owne territorie? What a cankered and mortall malice is this, which bloodshed and massacres in two battailes cannot satiate or assuage? Besides the wasting of our fields, the driving away of booties, as well of people as cattell, the firing of villages, the ruine and havocke they made; and in everie place nothing but fire and sword. Could not their anger and wrath have bene satisfied with all this? But it is their greedie and unsatiable covetousnes and nothing else, that must be fulfilled. That is it which carieth them, that haleth and hurieth them to the assault of Capua. At it their teeth water, that most goodly and beautifull cittie will they either destroy, or be LL. thereof themselves. But may it please you Romanes, to gaine it afore by your owne benefit and good desert: rather than G suffer them to seize upon it, by wrong and mischief. I speake not this before a people that useth to make it straunge and goodly to undertake any rightfull and just warres. If ye but shew a copie of your countenance, as if ye would aid and succour us, I suppose yee shall have no need at all of further warre. The Samnites overweening of themselves and contempt of others, reacheth to us onely: further it proceedeth not. So that under the very shadow of your assistance, O Romanes, we may be safely covered and protected. And whatsoever we shall hereafter gaine thereby, whatsoever we shall be of our selves (even as much as we are worth) readie are we to acknowledge it all yours. For your sake shall the Campaine ground be tided: for your behoofe shall the citie Capua be resorted unto and frequented: and accounted shall ye be of us, no lesse than founders, parents, yea and as the immortall gods. There shall not be a borough or Colonie of yours, H that shall go beyond us in obsequious dutifullnes towards you. Doe but afford unto us Campaines, O Noble Senators, a token of your gracious countenance, yeeld us your invincible name as a powrefull deitie, and bid us hope assuredly, that Capua shall remaine still and continue in safetie. What a number thinke ye of all sorts and degrees of people, followed and accompanied us, when we came from thence? How left we all places filled with their vowes, their praies and teares? In what expectation now, do the Senate, and people of Capua, our wives and children, attend our returne? Assured I am, that the whole multitude stand about the gates looking toward the high port-way that leadeth from hence thither, waiting to know what news, expecting what answer, my LL. your pleasure is that we should report backe from you unto them, so care-full, so heavie, so perplexed. One word presenteth unto them safetie, victorie, life and libertie: I the other, I dread to bode what it may import. Wherefore to conclude, determine of us, either as of them that shall and will be, your confederates and faithfull Allies; or else such as must be worfe than nothing. After that the Embassadours were withdrawne aside, and the Senate fell to counsell: although a good part of them were of opinion, that the greatest and welthiest citie of all Italie, the most plenteous countrie, and nere unto the sea, might be as it were the garner and storehouse, what ever variable chaunges of corne and victuals might happen: yet they set more by keeping their faith and promise, than of that great commodity that might accrew unto them: and thus by direction of the Senate, made the Consull answer. The Senate judgeth you O Campaines worthe of aid: but meete it is that we inttaine your amitie, so, as a more ancient socie-tie and friendship be not thereby violat and broken. The Samnites are in league, and confederate K with us. We must needs therefore debarre you from making that war against the Samnites, which should sooner dishonour the gods than hurt and wrong men. Howbeit, as equitie and reason doth require, we will to our Allies and friends send our Embassadours, to intreat them to offer no violence unto you. To this answer the chiefe man of the Embassage (according as he had in commission from home) replied and said: For as much as ye are not willing to defend our right and cause, by just and lawfull power against violence and injurie; your owne yet, I am sure ye will maintaine. Therefore, my LL. of the Senat, here we yeeld up into your hands, and to the Seignorie of the people of Rome, the whole nation of the Capuans, the citie Capua, our lands and possessions, the sacred temples of the gods, and all things else both holy and profane. And whatsoever from henceforth we shall suffer and abide, we will sustaine it as your liegemen and subjects, L wholly devoted as vassals unto you. At which words they all held up their hands unto the Consuls, shed teares plenteously, and fell downe upon their knees in the verie entrie of the Counsell house. The Senate moved with consideration of the changeable course and turne of humane fortune, in this world, to see so great & mightie a people for puissance, so pompous for superfluous abundance and magnificence (at whose hands but a while before, the nations bordering had craved and begged their aid) to cary with them now so base and broken hearts, as of their own accord, to submit themselves and all they had in the whole world, to the power and devotion of others: were perswaded now it was a matter of trust and faithfulness, not to abandon and see betraied, those that thus were reduced under their protection. Neither thought they, that the people of Samnium could in any equitie or colour of Iustice, invade that M land, or assault that citie, which was surrendered and annexed to the imperiall State of Rome.

Whereupon presently they agreed to dispatch Embassadours unto the Samnites, who had in charge and commission to make declaration unto them; First, of the Campaines petitions: secondly, of the answer of the Senate returned unto them, implying the remembrance of

A the Samnites amitie: last of all, of the Campaines surrender. Then, to request and desire them in regard of their mutuall societie and friendship, to spare and forbear those, that were their vaf-sals, and not with any hostilitie to invade that territorie, which was become subject to the people of Rome. If by this courteous dealing they could doe no good, then, to command the Sam-nites in the name of the people and Senate of Rome, to abstaine from the citie Capua and the countrie of the Campaines. When these Embassadours debated these matters in the counsell house of the Samnites, they returned so stout and arrogant an answer againe, not in these terms onely, That they would goe forward in the war begun: but (that which more was) the rulers com-ming forth of their counsell house, even whiles the Embassadours there stood, called to the captaines of the cohorts, and with a lowd voice commaunded them forthwith to make a rode into B the Campaine countrie, for to spoile and fetch booties. This Embassage being returned home again to Rome, the Senators setting aside the care of all other matters, sent their heraulds to demand restitution: and for default thereof, after the solempne manner to proclaim open war. Whereupon they decreed with al speed possible to propound this matter to the people: and by the consent of the people, both Consuls with two armies departed the citie, Valerius into Campania, Cornelius into Samnium: and pitched their tents, Valerius at the foot of the hill Gaurus, and the other at Sarricula. The Samnit legions presented themselves first to Valerius (for that way they supposed all the forces would be bent) for indignation also, against the Campaines, because they were so readie one while with their own succours, and another while in sending for the aid of others against them. And so soone as they discovered the Romans camp, in al haste (every one for his part) called C lustily to their captaines for to strike up and found the battaile: assuring themselves, and saying plainly, that the Romanes should speed as well in succouring the Campaines, as the Campaines had done before them in aiding the Sidicines. Valerius, after he had amused the enemies not many daies together, with some light skirmishes, onely to make triall of them what they could do, put forth the signall of battaile at the last, but first exhorted his souldiours in a short speech in this wise, That neither this new warre nor new enemy should terrifie them: for as much as the farther they warred from the citie, the more cowardly Nations they were, and lesse warlike still to whom they went. That they should not esteeme the valour of the Samnites, by the late losses and defeatures of the Sidicines or Campaines: For whosoever they see that contend and fight together, one side or other cannot chuse, but goe to the wals. The Campaines, doubtlesse, E had the overthrow rather through their owne effeminate tenderesse, as flowing too much in excesse and superfluitie of pleasures, than by their enemies hardinesse and valour. And what were two onely fortunate battailes of the Samnites, in so manie ages, to be set against so many honorable victories of the people of Rome? Who, from the first foundation of their citie, may number more triumphs we neede, than yeares: who have by warre subdued all Nations about them, the Sabines, Hetruria, the Latines, Hernickes, Aequians, Volscians, and Auruncanes. And as they ought to goe into the field, everie man presuming and trusting upon his owne manhood & glorious warfare: so should they have an eye, and consider, under whose leading and regiment they were to enter into battell. Whether hee were a man that in the hearing of his souldiours, could onely make goodly and magnificall Orations, fierce in brave words, void of Militarie workes: or F hee who himselfe knew how to handle his weapon, to advance before the standards, yea, and to be employed even in the middle medley of all the battell. I would have you (quoth hee) my souldiours, to follow my deeds and not my words, and of me to learne, not onely discipline, but also good example. I have not by bribing and factions, nor yet by courting and Orations (usual matters among Noblemen) but by this right hand of mine, attained unto three Consulships, and to the highest honour. The time hath bene indeed, when a man might have said thus unto me: No marvell, For why? You were a Gentleman of noble blood, descended from those that were the deliverers of their countrie: and in the same year that the citie had first a Consul, this house of yours had the Consulship. But now the case is altered, the way unto a Consulship, is as open to you Commoners, as to us of the Nobilitie. Now is it not the guerdon of birth and gen-trie, as aforetime: but the reward and recompence of vertue and valour. And therefore my sould-iours, shoot at the highest dignities, and aime at soveraine honour. And although yee that are men, have by the grace and approbation of the gods, given unto mee this new addition of surname, Corvinus yet have not I forgotten the auncient name of the Publicolas, appropriat unto our familie. I love and ever will (as alwaies I have done) the Commons of Rome, at all times alike, both abroad in warres, and also at home in peace: as well a privat person, as in mine offices, were they little, or were they mickle: whiles I was Tribune, whiles I was Consull: and no changing have I been throughout all my Consulships, one after another. Now for this present entering which we are about, with the helpe of God, and in his name, have a cast with mee for a new and fresh triumph over the Samnites. Never was there a Generall more familiar with his souldiours: as willing as the meaneft of them, to lay his hand to any base offices that were to be done; yea, and in the very training and exercises of the souldiours, at what time as equals trie maisteries of activitie and strength, one with another, gently would he otherwhiles take the foile, as well as the victorie, and ever keepe one countenance still: not rejecting or refusing any one, whosoever would offer to match him, or be his mate. For deed, benigne and bounteous to his power, and as occasion required: in his words, no lesse mindfull of the freedome of others, than respective of his owne place and dignitie: and (than which, there is nothing more popular) look by what virtuous demeanure and carriage of himselfe, he sought to attaine unto honours and promotions, with the same he bare them, and went through with them. Therefore the whole armie with incredible cheerefulness accepting this exhortation of their captaine, issued forth of the campe into the field. Never was there battaile fought more indifferently on both sides. Their hope was like, their forces equall, with full trust and confidence in themselves, and yet without contempt of their enemies. The Samnites, for to what their courage, presumed upon their fresh & late achieved acts, and their double victorie but few daies before. The Romans on the contrarie side, stood upon their honour and reputation for the space of foure hundred yeares, and their conquests ever since the foundation of their citie. Yet they were troubled, both the one and the other, to deale with a new and unknowne enemy. The manner of their fight shewed what stomackes they carried. For the conflict was such, as for a good while they seemed on neither part to yeeld one foot. Then the Consull, seeing they could not by fine force bee caused to recule, thought to set a suddaine feare among them: and therefore assaieth, by sending in the horsemen upon the foremost ensignes, to breake their rankes, and put them in disarray. But when he saw, that in so small roume of ground they toiled themselves in vaine, and could not well manage their troupes and cornets, nor breake in upon the enemies, hee rode backe againe to the vaward and forefront of the Legions, and dismounted from horsebacke, Wee that are footmen (quod he) when all is done, must doe the deed I see well. Come on then, and as ye behold me (which way soever I go) by dint of sword to make way and entrance into the enemies battell: so every man for himselfe, downe with him that stands next in his way. Straightwaies shall yee see, that where as now their speares and pikes stand glittering and bent upon us, there will be a wide lane made over their flaine carcases. Hee had not so soone spoken these words, but the horsemen at the Consuls commaundement, ran upon both the wings and points, and made way for the footmen to enter the maine battaile. First and foremost the Consull in person chargeth the enemy, and whomsoever he happened to encounter, him hee killeth in the place. This goodly sight set the rest on fire: and then every man did his best, laid about him manfully, and carried it afore him right worthily. The Samnites stood to it still and moved not, albeit they got more knockes and wounds than they gave. Thus when the fight had continued a good while, notwithstanding much bloody slaughter about the Samnites ensignes, yet no flying was there on any side: so resolute were they, by death onely to bee vanquished. Whereupon, the Romanes feeling their owne strength for wearinesse decayed and spent, and but little day left, inflamed with anger, gave a fresh charge all at once upon the enemies. Then (and not before) began they to shrink and give ground, and encline to flight: then were the Samnites taken prisoners, and flaine thicke. Few or none had escaped alive, but that the night came so fast upon them, that it interrupted the victorie, rather than ended the battaile. Both the Romanes themselves confessed, they never fought with a more stubborn and obstinate enemy: and the Samnites also being demanded the primitive cause, which forced them (so stiffly bent as they were) to run away at the last, said, that the Romanes seemed to have burning fire in their eyes, and to carrie in their faces and visages the furious rage of mad & frantike persons; and therefore first began they to bee affrighted, more than at any thing else. Which fearfulnesse of theirs, they bewraied not onely by the present event of the battaile, but also by their dislodging and departure away in the night. The morrow after the Romanes were masters of their empty and naked campe: unto which all the whole multitude of the Campaines came running in numbers to reioice and congratulate their victorie.

A correct battell between the Ro-manes and Sam-nites.

- A But this joy had like to have been foulely blemished with an overthrow and defeature in Samnium. For Cornelius the Consull being departed from Saticula, had engaged his armie unadvisedly within a Forrest, through which went an hollow valley or lawne, forelaid on both sides with an ambush: neither discovered he his enemies over his head, before such time as he could not retreat with his ensignes into a place of safe receipt. But whiles the Samnites staid, onely until hee had brought his armie fully downe into the bottome of the vale, P. Decius, a Colonell of footmen, espied in the Forrest one little high hill, which commaunded the place where the enemies lay encamped: and as it was for an armie heavily armed, and charged with carriage, hard to bee gotten up unto: so for them that were lightly appointed and deliver, nothing difficult. Hee perceiving the Consull troubled in mind and affrighted: See you not (quoth hee) o Aulus Cornelius yonder hill top above the enemy? That is the very fortresse of our hope and safetie, if so be that we can gaine the same lustily, as the Samnites have left it blindly. I require no more of you, but to let mee have the Principes and spearmen of one onely Legion. And when with them I have once seized the top thereof, set forward you from hence and feare not, neither make doubt to save your selfe and the armie. For the enemy being under us, and lying open to all our shot, cannot stirre without great losse and present mischeefe. As for us, either the fortune of the people of Rome, or our owne manhood shall worke our evasion. Being commended by the Consull, and having received that troupe & guard which he demanded, he marcheth close through the wooddie pace, and was not descried by the enemy before he approached the place that hee went to get. And whiles they all were amazed thereat and wondered, and wholly turned their eyes to him-ward, he both gained the Consull some time to withdraw his armie into a more convenient and open ground, and possessed himselfe of the hill top, and there rested. The Samnites, whiles they turne their ensignes to and fro, (as men that had lost the vantage of both sides) could neither make after the Consull, but through the same valley, wherein a while before they had him under their shot, nor yet erect their squadrons, and march up that hill, which Decius over them had already gained. But being more angry with those, that thus had disappointed them of the faire meanes they had of a brave exploit, and considering withall the neerenesse of the place, and their small number which were gotten thither, they were one while of mind to environ the hill round with armed men, and to keepe Decius from the Consull; another while, to make them way, that when they were come downe into the valley, they might set upon them. Thus whiles they were in doubt what to doe, the night overtook them. Decius at the first, was in good hope to fight with them from the higher ground, as they mounted up against the hill: but afterwards he marvelled much, that they neither began to charge upon him, nor yet when they were disappointed and put by that purpose, through disadvantage of the ground, fortified themselves with trench and rampier, and other piones worke. Then calling the Centurions unto him, What unskilfulnesse (quoth hee) of militarie service, what supine slackenesse and slouth is this? and how got these lozels the victorie of the Sidicines and Campaines? Yee see their ensignes waving hither and thither: one while huddled they are in one together, another while advanced & displayed at length. As for munitions and fortifications, no man beginneth any: & by this time we might have been entrenched round about. But if wee stay here longer than for our vantage, wee might bee counted lazie lubbers like them. Come on then, goe with mee, that whiles day light serveth, we may see in what places they quarter their guards, and what way wee may get from hence and escape. All this went hee to espie and discover himselfe in person, clad in a common souldiours jacket, leading with him the other captaines in the habite of their souldiours; to the end, that the enemies might not take marke of the Generall himselfe, how he went about to view them. After this, when hee had disposed the sentinels and corps de guard, to all the rest hee commaunded a watchword to be given, that when the trumpet sounded the second watch, they should come all unto him armed, and make no noise at all. When they were thither assembled with silence, as hee had commaunded, This stilnesse my fellow souldiours (quoth hee) must yee keepe, whiles yee heare me speake, and forbear all giving assent by uttering your voices (as souldiours use to doe).
- F When I shall have delivered my mind to you, let as many as like thereof, go softly on the right hand, and not speake a word: and looke what side is greater, that course shall stand & take place. And now listen what my conceit is, and what I would have done. The enemy hath not invested you here, as men either fled away for feare, or lagging behind for slouth and idlenesse. The place have yee woon by manhood: by manhood must yee from thence escape. In comming hither, yee have have already saved a brave armie of the people of Rome: and now by breaking out from hence, G save your owne selves. Worthie you are, that being but a few, have succoured many, yee should not stand in need your selves of any mans helpe. With that enimie yee have to deale, who yesterday through their senselesse slouth, overslipped their happie oportunitie to defeat our whole armie; who were so blind, that they saw not this hil of so great importance, even over their heads, before it was by us gained: who being so many thousands, could neither debarre us from climbing up, as few as wee were, nor when wee had gotten the place, compasse us about with a trench, having so much day as they had. These enemies, whom ye have thus deluded & beguiled, whiles they were awake, and had their eyesight: yee are to deceive when they are fast asleepe: nay, you must doe so indeed, there is no other remedie. For at that passe wee are now, that I am rather to shew you, in what tearmes of extremitie yee stand, than to advise you to the execution of any H good counsell. It is no consulting at this time, whether ye should here stay, or depart hence; sith that besides your weapons, and hearts setting up rest upon their weapons, fortune had left you nothing at all. And die wee must, pardie, for hunger and thirst, if wee dread the sword point more than becometh hardie men, and valerous Romanes. One way there is therefore, and but one way of safetie, even to make a brave fallie through and away. This must wee doe, either by day or by night. And that doubt is soone cleared. If we looke for the morrow day, what hope have wee, but that the enimie will cast a ditch and bancke, even round about us: who already as ye see lying under this little knap, have compassed it with their very bodies. Now, if so be that the night be a convenient and favourable time for irruptions and fallies, as in truth it is: then, this houre of the night certainly, is of all other the fittest. At the second watches found ye are come hither, at I which time all men are in their most sound and dead sleepe. Amid their bodies being fast asleepe, shall ye goe. Either by silence deceive them unware, or if they perceive you, affright them with a suddaine outcrie. Doe but follow mee, as yee have done already. I, will follow the same fortune that guided me hither. Now as many of you as think this good counsel, and a course like to speed well, make no more ado, but passe on my right hand. So they all passed, and followed after De- cus as hee went through the quarters, void of watchmen and warders. Now were they escaped the mids of the campe, when a souldiour, as he clambred over the watchmens bodies, lying hea-vie asleepe, chanced to stumble at a shield, which gave a sound againe. Whereat the watchman being awakened, raised his next fellow; and they being start up, call up other, not knowing whither they were enemies or fellows, whether the garrison of Decius on the hill was broken forth, K or the Consull had surpris'd the campe. Decius then, seeing his souldiours could not passe cleer and undefried, commaunded them to set up a shout. And therewith he amased them with a new fright, who were already drowned in drowsinesse, so as they could neither take weapons readily, nor make head against them, nor yet pursue after them. While the Samnites were thus maske-red and in confusion, the Romane garrison had by this time slaine the warders whom they met, and were marching toward the Consull his campe. As yet was somewhat of the night to come: but now they seemed to be safe, and past all danger. Then (quoth Decius) on forward in this courage of yours, o hardie Romanes. This your passage and returne, to and fro, all ages shall extoll and praise. But for the full sight and view of so great valour, we had need of broad day light: for yee deserve better, than that the still night should hide you in so glorious a returne of yours into L the campe. Let us here rest, and wait for day. His words were obeyed; and so soon as the day brake, he dispatched a messenger afore unto the Consull: and so with exceeding great joy they made speed unto the campe. And when it was knowne in the campe by the privie watchmen, that they who had put their lives in most dangerous hazard for the safetie of them all, were themselves returned safe; then everie one came forth to meet them as fast as they could, with praises and commendations, calling them both all and some, their saviours: praising the immortal gods, and giving thanks, yea, and extolling Decius to the skie. This was the triumph of Decius in the campe, as hee marched through the middelt thereof with his armed garrison, whiles everie man cast his eyes upon him, and made him a Coronell, equall to the Consull in all kind of honour. When hee was come to the Pretorium, the Consull by found of trumpet, called all the armie to an audience, and as hee entred into a discourse of the deserved praises of Decius, Decius himsele interrupteth him, and cutteth off his speech. Whereupon the Consull put off the Oration.

Decius then persuadeth the Consull, to set aside all other things, and while the occasion and opportunitie was offered, he urged him effectually, to give an alarme to the enemies, both while

A they were amazed with this skare by night, and also lay skattering about the hill, as it were in their severall skonces. Besides, he thought verily that some were sent out after him to make fieth fuit, and wandred astray in the Forrest. So the Legions were commaunded to arme, and being departed out of the campe, and by meanes of the espials better acquainted with the Forrest, they were conducted by a wider and more open way toward the enimie: whom sodainly they surpris'd and charged, unawares and unprovided as he was. And for as much as the Samnite soldiors were stragling abroad, and most unarmed, and could neither rally themselves & take armes, nor retire into their trench, they drave them at first with feare into their camp: after, whiles the gards about it were disordred and troubled, they were masters therof also. The noise was heard all about the hill, and caused everie man to flee out of his hold: So a great part of them took their heeles, before the enimie could come. But so many as for feare were driven within the trench (and those were some 30000) were all slaine: and the campe rifled and spoiled. The Consull having achiev'd this exploit, called an assembly: and not only finished the praises of Decius, as he before began, P. Decius for but also amplified them with fresh commendation of this new service. And besides other militarie gifts, he rewarded him with a crowne of gold, a hundred oxen, and one especiall white one, fat and faire above the rest with gilded hornes. The soldiors who together with him held the hill aforesaid, had given unto them for ever after, a double proportion of corne, and for the present one oxe a peece, and two single liveries. After the Consull his reward was bestowed, the Legionarie soldiors themselves put upon Decius his head a wreath of greene grasle, in token of a de-liverie from sieg, and with notable shouts and loud cries approved this gift. Another chaplet or garland, also, in token of like honour, did his owne band and companie set upon him. And thus being adorned with these ornaments of honour, he sacrificed that chosen white oxe unto Mars; and bestowed his owne hundred oxen among those his soldiors, who had accompanied him in that exploit and service. To the same soldiors the legions gave a pound measure of wheate meale, and a sextare of wine, a peece. All these particulars were performed and done with great cheerfulness, and seconded with shouting and acclamation of the soldiors, to signifie their good liking and generall assent.

A third battaile was fought at Sueffula: wherein by M. Valerius, was put to flight the host of the Samnites. When upon the whole manhood and flowre of their youth that remained at home were sent for and assembled, determining to fight it out and trie their fortune once for all. Fear-full newes hereof came from Sueffula to Capua: and from thence couriers and postes were dispatched to Valerius the Consull, for aid. Forthwith he advanced the standards, and leaving the cariages belonging to the campe, with a strong gard, he marched forward in great hast: and not farr from the enimie, he tooke a little plot of ground to encampe in; as having besides their hories of service, no beasts at all for cariage, nor a rabble of slaues and varlets that follow the campe. The Samnites (as if without further delay they were to fight) embattelled themselves.
 But seeing none to encounter them, they came with banner displaid to the verie campe of the enemies. And there so soone as they beheld the soldiors upon the rampier, and understood by them that were sent out of purpose to view the circuit of the campe, in how small compasie they had fortified, guesing thereby how few their enemies were; there ran a noise throughout the armie, to make no more ado, but to fill up the ditches, to cut through the banks, and so presently to brake into the campe. And even in that rashnesse had the warre beene decided and dispatched, but that the captaines held in the violence of the soldiors. But for as much as their own number so great, required good store of victuals, and was both by their lying before Sueffula, and also by their long stay there without fight brought to scarcitie well neere of all things: it was thought good, that while the enemies kept within their hold as affrighted, the soldiors should be sent about the countie a foraging. In which meane time they supposed that the Romanes likewise, would have spent all, who were thither come lightly appointed, and had brought no more come with them, than they could carie on their shoulders, besides their armour. The Consull having espied the enemies stragling over the countie, and their guards scenderly manned, after a brieve exhortation to his soldiors, led them forth to give an assault upon their campe. Which when he had woon at the first shout and onfet, and killed more of the enemies within their tents, than either in the gates or upon the rampier; hee caused the ensignes that he had taken, to be brought together into one place: and leaving there two legions, for a guard and defence; with a straight charge, that untill he came againe, they should forbear to rise and make make spoile, he went forward in order of battaile. And when the horsemen which hee made out afore, had like hunters driven the scattered Sannites, as it were, within net and toile, he fell upon them and committed an exceeding great carnage. Fortrighted as they were, they knew neither at what signall they should rally themselves together, nor whether they should make speede to the campe, or flie further away. But so great was their fright and flight both, that there were brought to the Confull, 40000 shields, more in deed than there were men slaine: besides 170 ensignes, together with those that were woon in the campe. Then returned he unto the enemies tents, and bestowed the whole pillage there, upon the souldiors. And such was the happie successe of this war, that it both caused the Falisci being in truce, to sue unto the Senat for a league: and also turned the Latines, who had prepared their forces alreadie from warring with Romans, to wage warre upon the Peligni. Neither rested the fame of this so fortunate a victorie within the marches of Italie: for even the Carthaginians also, sent their embassadours to Rome, with gratulation, and a present of a golden crowne weighing ^{twentie five pounds}, to be set up in ^{the} ^{ancient} temple within the Capitoll. Both Consuls triumphed over the Sannites: and Decius followed after, all goodly to be seene, with his gifts and worthie praises: whilst the souldiors as their maner was, with merie jests and rude ditties, magnified and renoumed the name of the Colonell no lesse than the Consuls.

The Mutinie
and conspiracy of the Sannites,

After this, the Embassies of the Campanians and the Suesians had a daie of audience: and upon their humble request it was granted, that thither should be sent a standing garrison to winter there, for to stop the excursions & invasions of the Sannits. But Capua, even then no good place for militarie discipline, wrought an alteration in the souldiors there: who having once gotten a smatch, and taken a delight in a world of pleasures of all sorts, quite forgot their owne naturall countrie. For they of the garison, began to lay plots and devise how to get Capua from the Campanians: even by the same wicked practise, by which themselves had woon it first from the auncient possessours and inhabitants: saying it made no matter, and they were but rightly served, in case their owne precedent lewd example, should returne upon their owne heads. Againe, why should the Campanians, not able to defend themselves, nor maintaine their liberties and goods, be LL. of the most plentifull countrie of Italie, and of a citie answerable and correspondent therunto: rather than the victorious army, which with their sweat & bloud, had repelled and expelled the Sannits from thence? And was it any reason, that they who had yielded to be vassals unto them, should enjoy that fruitfull and pleasant tract; while they themselves perished with fighting, struggled still & wrestled in a pestilent aire, & drie barren soile, about the citie of Rome? and within that citie, indured the settled, inveterat and intestine mischiefe and plague of usurie, that turcharged them daily more and more? Whiles these projected conspiracies were contrived in secret conventicles, and as yet not broched and divulged in all mens knowledge, the new Confull, C. Martius Rutilius came in place: whose lot it was to be L. Deputie of the province Campania, leaving his fellow Q. Servilius in the citie. Who having intelligence by the Captaines and Coronels, of all the particularities of those designs: being a wise man, both for his olde age and long experience (as who was now Confull the fourth time, and withall had been Censour and Dictatour) thought it best to dissimule the matter and to make voide and frustrate the present heat and outrage of the souldiors, by differing and prolonging their hope, as if they might put in execution their plots at their best leisure, whensoever they pleased. He raiseth therefore a rumour, that the garisons should in the same townes winter againe the yeare following. [For divided they were into sundrie citties of Campania: and the webbe begon at Capua, was spread from thence through all the forces.] By meanes of this good respite to bethinke themselves and devise of these matters, the mutinie for the present was well quieted. The Confull then led forth the souldiors into the summer places of abode and repose, and purposed whiles he had the Sannites in quietnesse, to cleanse the armie by cassering and discharging those busie-bodies & troublesome spirites: pretending colourably, and saying, That some of them had served alreadie so long as the law required, others were now well stept in yeares, or waxen feeble and their strength decayed. Some had their passports limited, and were sent home: at the first, one by one singled out; afterwards, certaine whole cohorts or bands, as having wintered far from their dwelling places, from their goods and substance. Under a pretence and colour also of militarie services and imployments, whiles some were dispatched one way, some another, a great part of them were rid cleane away. All this multitude, the other Confull and the Pretor kept still at Rome; devising thus

A this cause, and that, of delays and abiding behind. And verily at first, they being not ware of this delusion, were not unwilling to visit home. But after that they perceived, that neither they who were dismissed first, returned againe unto their colours, nor any in a manner discharged els, but such as had lien in winter garrison at Capua: and those especially, who of them were the authors of the conspiracies; first they marvelled, and afterwards feared in very deepe, that their complots were revealed and come to light, and that now presently, they should be put to examinations and tortures, abide arraignment and judgement, be executed secretly apart one by one, & suffer the insolent lordlinesse, and cruell tyrannie of Consuls and Senatours over them. These and such like speeches low they and whisper secretly, that were in the campe, when they saw the principall authors of the mutinie, who were the sinewes and strength thereof, by the wily pollicie of the Confull to be dismembred from them. One cohort of them, being not far from Anxur sat them downe at Lautula, in a narrow pafe or wood betwene the sea and the mountaines, to intercept and staie, whomsoever the Confull sent about this or that pretended businesse as is above-said. Soone were there gathered together a right strong power: and nothing wanted to make a shew of a full armie, but onely a head and captaine. And disordered as they were, they went robbing and spoiling, as far as the Albane countrie, and under the hill of long Alba they encampe themselves within a trench and rampier. Which worke being finished, they spend the rest of the day in consultation about chusing a Commander, little trusting any one there present in place. And who possibly (say they) could be sent for as far as from Rome? What Senatour or Commoner was there, that either wittingly would venture upon so great and dangerous an enterprise: or to whom the cause of an armie, enraged upon an injurie received, might safely be committed? The next morrow, whiles they reasoned still about this point, and sadly debated the matter, some of the wandering and vagarant forraiers of the countrie thereabout, bring certaine intelligence, that Titus Quintus employed himselfe in husbandrie, and held a farme in Tufculanum, minding neither the citie, nor dignities of state and common weale. This man was come of noble linage, and having served with great credit and honour in the warres, by a wound received, was lame of a legge, and gave over soulderie, determining to lead the rest of his life in the countrie, sequestred far from all courting and ambitious suing for civill offices. They had not so soon heard his name, but presently they tooke knowledge of the man, and (that which might turne to their good) agreed with one accord, he should be sent for. Small hope there was that he would willingly doe any thing: they thought therefore to use force and to bring him to it by feare. So, in the dead time of the night, they that were sent thereto, entred the ferme house, and finding Quintus sound & fast asleepe, they awakened him: propounded unto him either rule and honor, or els present death: and no mean between, in case he made stay & refused to go with them: and so they haled and brought him to their camp. Incontinently he was saluted L. General at his first comming. And when the man was affrighted at this sodaine and wonderfull occurrent, they endue him with the ornaments and ensignes to that honor belonging, and will him to lead them as their commander to the citie of Rome. Thus having plucked up the Standerds, in this headie fit of their owne, rather than upon any advise or counsell of their Captaine, they march in warlike maner with an armie, toward Rome, within eight miles of the citie, upon the cauley or strete way, now called Appia Via: & had approched immediatly in that train to the very citie, but that they heard there was a power coming against them, & a Dictator created to withstand them, to wit, M. Valerius Corvinus, together with L. Aemilius Mamercus Generall of horsemen. So soon as they were come in interview one of another, and took knowledge of the armor & ensignes: the remembrance of their native countrie wrought in them straightwaies a mitigation of their mood. They were not yet so far gone, nor so hardie, as to shed civil blood: neither had they knowledge of any other wars but forrein: & the uttermost rage & maddest fit that ever they proceeded unto, was counted their Seccession & departure away from their own countrymen. And therefore both captaines and souldiors on either side, sought means to meet together, and draw to emparle. Quintus for his part, who having had alreadie his hands full of wars in defence of his countrie, could worse brooke taking arms against the same: Corvinus likewise for himselfe, as one that with loving affection embraced all his fellow citizens, but the souldiors especially, & above all others those of his owne armie, that fought under his banner, came forth to a parle. And forthwith as soone as he was once knowne, he had no lesse reverence done unto him of the adverse part, than silence and audience given of his owne men. you. Occasions there have been, and will be ynow elsewhere, to win glorie and warlike renowne:
From hence, peace onely is to be fought. And even that which among my vowes that I made, I besought so devoutly of the immortall gods, it lieth in you to make me enjoy. Doe but call to mind that neither in Samnium, nor among the Volscians yee are encamped, but upon Roman ground: that those hills which yee behold, are the hills of your native soile: this armie which yee see, are of your owne countriemen and fellow citizens: and my selfe your Consull, under whose conduct and Auspice, yee have the yeare past twice defeated the Samnite legions, twice by fine force woun their campe, and driven them out of the field. I am, sirs, that M. Valerius Corvi- H nus, whose noblenesse yee have had triall of, not by any wrongs done, but by good turnes on your part received. Author have I bene of no proud law, nor cruell Act of Senat against you: a man in all my government and rule that I bare, more rigorous to my selfe than severe to you.
And it ever there were one, who might be proud either of Noble race and gentrie, or of his own vertue and valour, of majestie and high calling or honorable dignities; of such progenitors am I descended, such prooffe of prowesse have I given: at that age attained I to Consular honour, that being three and twentie years old, I was able to have bene feared and dread, not of Commons onely, but also of the Senatours. But what deed or word hath passed from me in your knowledge, more grievous & odious when I was once Consull, than all the time I was but a Colonel?
The same course held I still during my two Consulships ensuing: and such shall my carriage be, and none other, whiles I am Dictatour: that I will be no more mild and gracious to these here about me that are mine own and my countries soldiours, than to your selves affronting; who are,
I tremble to speake it forth, mine enemies. Yee shall therefore draw sword upon me, before I draw upon you. The trumpets from thence shall begin sound, the shouting from thence shall arise, the charge from thence shall be given first, if we must needs go to it and fight. Now, find in your hearts (if you can) to doe that, which neither your fathers nor grandfathers before you ever could: no, not they who went away and departed into the mount Sacer, nor those who afterwards held and kept the Aventine. Expect, untill your mothers and wives, with their haire hanging about their eares, come forth of the citie to meet with you one by one, as sometime they did to Coriolanus. Then, the Volscian legions were quieted and pacified, because they had one Ro-mane for their leader: will not yee then, being a whole armie, all of the Romanes, surcease this unkind and impious warre? And thou T. Quintius, howsoever thou art come there to stand, whether with or against thy will; in case there bee no remedie, but fight wee must, retire thy selfe among the hindermost: nay, with more honestie flie thou shalt, and shew thy naturall countri-men a faire paire of heeles, than fight against thy countrie. But stand still hardly with honor and credit among the foremost, to make attonement: thou shalt be a truchman in this our parley and conference, to all our goods. Ask and have, any reasonable and indifferent conditions: although in truth we were better to yeeld unto hard and unequall capitulations, than wickedly and ungodlie, one to fight with another. Then T. Quintius with teares gushing out at his eies, turning to his owne companies: And even me also (quoth hee) o soldiours (if need there be at all of me) ye have a much better captaine for peace than warre. As for him who even now uttered those words in your hearing, was neither Volscian nor Samnite, but a Romane, even your owne Consull sometime, soldiours, and your owne Generall heretofore: whose Auspicate conduct, you having tried for you and in your defence; doe not prove now against your selves to your perdition. Others had the Senat to send as captaines, who would have fought more maliciously with you: but they have made choise of him who above all others, could beare with you, yea and for-beare you that have been his soldiours: whom you of all others especially must trust, as having been your Generall. Peace, yee see, even they desire that are able to get the victorie. And what is it then that we ought and should desire? Why then set we not anger and hope aside, two false motives, two deceitfull guides and counsellors; and betake our selves and all we have to a man of approved trust and fidelitie? These words being liked well of all (as appeared by a generall shout) T. Quintius went forth before the ensignes in the forefront, and pronounced that the soldiours should be at the Dictatour his devotion and pleasure: beseeching him to consider and undertake the cause of poore and wretched citizens; and having taken it into his hands, to maintaine

the Dictatour.

A and protect the same, according to that faithfulness wherwith he used to governe the Commonmonweale. As for himselfe privately, he would not indent ought for his owne securitie: neither reposed he hope in any thing else but innocencie. The soldiours indeed were to capitulate, as once heretofore the Commons, and a second time the legions had done with the Senatours: namely, that this their revolt and petie rebellion, might not be laid unto their charge, to their hurt and utter undoing. Then the Dictatour, after he had first commended Quintus, and willed the rest to be content and of good cheer, rode post to the citie, & by the advise of the Senators, preferted a bill unto the people in the grove Petelinus: THAT THE MUTINIE AND INSUR-RECTION SHOULD TURN NO MAN TO SCATH AND DANGER. He besought the Quirites also of thus much favour besides, THAT NEITHER IN POUER NOR EARNEST, THIS SHOULD BEE LAID IN NO MANS DISH. The same time therewas proposed besides, a sacred militarie law under pain of death, THAT NO SOLDIORS NAME ONCE ENTRED INTO THE MUSTER-MASTER HIS BOOKE, SHOULD BE RAISED OUT AGAINST HIS WILL: With this branch annexed over and besides, THAT NO MAN WHO HAD BEEN AFORETIME A COLONEL OR TRIBUNE, SHOULD AFTER HAVE THE LEADING OF BANDS, AND BE A CORPORAL. This was followed hard and urged by those of the conspiracie, in regard of one P. Salinius, who in manner each other yeare had bene either a Colonel, or a chiefe Centurion, whom now they call Primi- pili. Him the soldiours spighted much, & were maliciously set against, because he had alwaies opposed himselfe against their conspiracies and innovations, and tooke not part with them who fled from Lantula. But when this one point could not be obtained of the Senat, for the favour they bare to Salinius: then Salinius himselfe besought the Senators that they would not regard his honour, more than the concord of the whole citie: and so at length it also was granted and enacted. As unreasonable a damaund was this also, That of horsemens pay, (and that was triple at that time) some Ases should be deducted for that they also had withstood the conspiracie. Over and besides, I find in some writers, that L. Genutius a Tribune of the Commons, published this law unto the people, That Vsurie might be made altogether unlawfull. Likewise in other Acts of the Commons it was provided, That no man within ten years space, should be capable of the same office twice: nor in one yeare beare two offices: and that both Consuls might be of the Commons. Which if they all were granted to the Com. it appeareth that this insurrection caried some sway and force with it.
In other Chronicles it is recorded, that neither Valerius was chosen Dictatour, but that all this busines was by the Consuls managed: nor so great a multitude of conspiratours rose, before D they came to Rome, but even in Rome tooke armes: ne yet that they came by night, in forcible manner into T. Quintius ferme-house, but into the dwelling house of C. Manlius: and that he was taken up by the rebels to be their Generall, and from thence went as farre as foure miles end, and there encamped in a fortified place: that the motion of concord arose not from the captaines, but that of a suddaine, when both armies stood aranged in order of battaile, they fell to greeting one another: and that the soldiours began to take one another by the hands & embrace with tears: and that the Consuls seeing the soldiours so backward from fight, were forced to move the Senat for an atonement. So as among ancient writers, there is no certentie set downe, but that a sedition there was, and the same appeled. But the rumor thereof, and the cruell warre which the Samnites E begun, withdrew certaine nations from the Romanes societie and alliance. For besides the faithlesse and untrustie league (a long time) of the Latines: the Privernates also with suddaine rodes, invaded and wasted Norba and Setia, two Colonies of the Romanes neere bordering and adjoining.

THE EIGHTH BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS

of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the eighth Booke.

H The Latines together with the Capuans revolted: and the Latines having sent their Embassadors to the Senate (of Rome) offered and presented peace, upon this condition onely, that they would create one of their Consuls out of them. This Embassie thus declared, Annii their Pretor, who had audience in the Capitoll, in going downe from thence, took such a fall, that he died in the place. T. Manlius caused his owne sonne to loose his head, because contrarie to his expresse commaundement, he had sought against the Latines, notwithstanding his good successe in that combate. At what time as the Romans were greatly distressed, and like to lose the field, P. Decius then Cons. with Manlius, devoured and offered himselfe to present death, for to save the armie: and setting spurs to his horse, rode into the midst of the enemies battaile: where he was slaine, and by his death recovered victorie to the Romanes. The Latines yielded and rendred themselves. When T. Manlius returned into the cittie, there was not one of all the youth came forth to meet him, and doe him honour. Manlius, a professed Virginitie, was condemned for his incest, or incontinent life. The *Ausoni*ans being subdued, a Colonie was planted in Calio, and another like wise in Evagella. Many Romane dames were detected of practising poison: and most of them were forced to drinke of their owne empoisoned cups first, whereof they died presently. Whereupon was the first law then ordained against poisoning. The Paleopolitans were defeated in battaile first, and after siege, surrendered upon composition. Quintus Fabius, who besieged them within their walls, was the first man that had his commission renewed, and continued still in government, when the ordinarie time was expired: and by means of the Consuls, had a triumph granted unto him. The common people were delivered from the danger of their creditors, by occasion of the filthy lust of one of them, Lucius Appur, who would have forced, and against nature abused C. Publius, a debtor of his. When L. Papirius the Dictator was returned from his omie into the cittie, for to take the Auspices anew, by reason of some error supposed in the former, Q. Fabius the Generall of the hosten, having in his absence espied the oportunitie and advantage of performing a wartime exploit, gave battaile contrarie to his Edict, and put the Samnites to the worse. For which cause, when the Dictator would come to punish him accordingly, Fabius made an escape and fled to Rome. And when his cause would not bear him out, he had his pardon, at the earnest sute and prayers of the people. This booke containeth also the fortunate exploits against the Samnites.

Now was C. Plautius Consull the second time, with L. Aemilius Mamercus: when as the Setines and Norbans brought tidings to Rome of the Privernates revolt, with complaints of harms sustained at their hands. Newes came likewise, that an armie of Volscians, under the conduct of the Antiates, were encamped at Satricum. Both these warres fell by lot to Plautius. Who taking his journey first to Privernum, forthwith had them battaile: and with no great conflict gave his enemies the overthrow. The towne was woon and restored againe to the Privernates, with a strong garrison therein placed, but two parts of their lands were taken from them. The armie thus having obtained victorie, was conducted thence to Satricum against the Antiates. Where was a cruell battaile fought with much bloodshed on both sides: and when as the tempestuous and stormie weather parted them asunder, before that either side inclined to victorie, the Romanes no whit wearied with that conflict so doubtfull, addressed themselves to fight against the morrow. But the Volscians having taken a view and account what men they had lost in fight, were not of like mind to adventure the hazard againe: and therefore as vanquished men they dislodged

A dislodged by night in disorder, and fearefully took their way to Antium, leaving behind them their wounded, and part of their baggage. Great store of armour was there found, both upon and among the slaine bodies of the enemies, and also within the campe. Which the Consull promised to dedicate to dame Luna, and so hee harried and spoiled the confines of the enemies, even as farre as the sea coast. But against the other Consull Aemilius, who was entred into the Sabellian land, neither were the Samnites encamped, nor their legions opposed any where. Whiles therefore with fire and sword hee wasted their countrie, the Samnites Embassadors came unto him, craving peace: but being by him posted off to the Senate, after they had audience given, they let fall their stout stomackes, and requested peace for themselves with the Romanes, and libertie to make warre against the Sidicines: which petition they enforced with more reason and equitie. First, in that they had entred into amitie with the people of Rome, during their prosperitie, and not as the Campaines in their adversitie: againe, they were to take armes against the Sidicines, enemies alwaies to themselves, and never friends to the people of Rome: who also, neither in peace (as the Samnites) sued for friendship and alliance, nor in time of warre (as the Campaines) sought for aid and succour: and finally, were neither under the protection of the people of Rome, ne yet their vassals and subjects. When as T. Aemilius the Pretor had consulted with the Senate, about these points demanded by the Samnites, and that the LL. thought good that the league with them should be renewed; the Pretor in the name of the rest, made answer to the Samnites, That neither the fault was in the people of Rome, that the confederacie betweene them, was not perpetuall; neither gainesaid they, but for as much as they were wearie themselves first, and repented of the warre commensed through their owne default, the league might yet be newly made againe. Touching the Sidicines, they would be no hinderance, but that the Samnite people, might use their libertie, & do what they thought best, either for war or peace. The league being thus concluded and confirmed, and they returned home, presently the Roman armie was brought from thence upon receipt of a yeeres pay, and came for three months, according to the capitulation covenanted with the Consull, in consideration of a truce granted, untill their Embassadors were returned.

The Samnites, with the same forces which they had employed to withstand the Romane war, went forth against the Sidicines with undoubted hope, speedily to win the citie of their enemies. Then, had the Sidicines before made an offer to yeeld themselves unto the Romanes, but seeing the Nobles to reject them, as comming too late, and wrested as it were perforce from them in their last extremitie, they rendered the same to the Latines, who were already of their owne accord risen up, and had taken armes. The Campaines likewise (so readie and forward were they to beare in mind an injurie of the Samnites, rather than a good turne of the Romanes) forbore not to join in this quarrell. Thus was there raised a mightie power of so many Nations banded together, under the conduct of the Latines, and invaded the borders of the Samnites, where more hurt was received by rodes than skirmishes. And albeit the Latines in fight had the better hand, yet were they well content for avoiding so many conflicts, to depart out of the enemies countrie. Which gave the Samnites leasure to send Embassadors to Rome, who before the Senate complaining, that they endured the same measure still, being now associates, which they had abidden before when they were enemies: besought most humbly, that the Romanes would bee satisfied with that victorie of the Campaines and Sidicines, their enemies, which they had gotten out of the Samnites hands, and not suffer them to bee troden underfoot by those Nations, the most dastards and cowards of all others: requesting moreover, if so be the Latines and Campaines were under the dominion of the people of Rome, that they would commaund them by vertue of their authoritie, to forbear the Samnites countrie: and if they refused to obey, then to chastise & keep them in by force of war. To these demands they framed a doubtfull answer, as being loth & ashamed of the one side to confesse, that the Latines were not at their devotion, & fearing againe on the other side by reproving & provoking them to turn away their harts, and loose them for ever. And this was the answer. As touching the Campaines, their case was otherwise, who were not by covenants and conditions in form of league, but by voluntarie & simple submission, under their protection; and therefore they should be quiet whether they would or no: but as for the Latines, by any capitulation comprised in their accord, they were not prohibited to levie war with whom they list. Which answer, as it sent the Samnites away, in doubt what to think the Romanes would do; so it estranged and alienated the Campaines for feare: and made the Latines more stout, as supposing the Romans now would give them the head, and yeeld any thing unto them. And therefore under a colour of preparing warre against the Samnites, they summoned and helde many Councils one after another: and in all their meetings and consultations, their princes & chiefe men secretly amongst themselves did nothing but plot & practise war with the Romans. In which conspiracie also, the Campaines had their hand as deepe as the rest, even to beare arms against those, who had been their Protectors. But although they did what they could to keepe all close of purpose, and were desirous before the Romanes should stir, to be secured from the Samnites, (an enimie pressing hard on their backs) yet nevertheles this complot was discovered, and intelligence thereof given at Rome, by meanes of certaine persons linked to the Romanes in private acquaintance and mutuall hospitalitie. Hereupon were the Consuls commanded to resigne their magistracie before the ordinarie time, that so much the sooner there might be new created against so great a danger and preparation of warre. But here rose a scruple of conscience, that the assembly for Election should be holden by them, whose government was thus shortned and abridged. Whereupon they proceeded to an Interreigne. And two Interregents there were one after another, M. Valerius and M. Fabius: who created Consuls, T. Manlius Torquatus the third time, and P. Decius Mus.

In that yeare, it is recorded for certaine, that Alexander King of Epirus, arrived in Italie with a navie: who, no doubt if he had sped well at his first entrance, would have proceeded farther and warred upon the Romanes. In this age flourished Alexander the Great in glorious conquests, who being this man his sisters sonne, and a warriour invincible, whiles he achieved feats of arms in another part of the world, hapned to die in his best time and prime of his youth. But to proceed forward. The Romanes although there was no doubt but that their associates, and namely the Latines, were revolted: yet as though they were carefully busied about the Samnites only, and nothing intended them; they sent for to Rome ten of their chiefe Peeres, pretending to give them in charge what their pleasure was to have done. At that time the Latines had two Pretors or Provolls, L. Annius of Setia, and L. Numitius of Circeia, both Romane Colonies. By whose means, besides Signia and Velitre, being also Colonies of Rome, the Volscians were solicited likewise to take armes. And thought good it was, that those Latine Pretors by name, should be cited with the rest. No man was ignorant for what intent they were sent for. The Pretors therefore, called a Councell before they went, and there declared how they were convented by the Senat of Rome, demanding their advise what answere to make as touching those matters, wherewith, as they supposed, they should be charged. When some were of this opinion, some of that; then Annus spake & said: Although I myselfe have moved you to resolve upon an answere, yet I thinke, it concerneth us more in our main estate, to determine what to do, than what to say. And when we are growne to a resolution once of our affaires, and what course to take, an easie matter wil it be to frame words fit for the purpose. For if even now already under a shadow & pretence of an indifferent league, we can abide and finde in our hearts to endure bondage, what standeth in the way, but that having abandoned & betrayed the Sidicines, we be obedient not only to the Romanes commandement, but also to the Samnites? and answere the Romans in these plaine termes, That at their beck only, and if they doe but nod their head, we will presently lay downe all armes? But if at length, the desire and longing after libertie doe touch our hearts, and give an edge unto our spirits: if there bee a league betwene us: and if confederacie ought to be no thing els but a societie and equall fruition of libertie and priviledges: if I say, we may now glorie and vaunt, wherof sometimes we were ashamed, that we are of kin to the Romanes and of their blood: if they have an armie of associates, by the addition wherof they redouble their forces, and which the Consuls in leaving or levying their proper wars, will not part and sever from their owne: why is there not equalitie in all things els? Why is not one of the Consuls a Latine? Look where is part of power and forces, there also is part of rule and command. And certes, even this in itselfe, is not a matter of so great honour unto us, as who have granted and confessed Rome to be the head of Latium: yet by long patience and continuall sufferance onely, we have brought to passe that it might seeme honourable. But if ever yee wished to see the day M wherein ye might participate in government and recover your liberties again, lo, that time is now come, presented unto you by your own valour, and the gracious goodnes of the immortall gods. Tried their patience ye have in denying soldiours: who doubteth not but that they were in a great choler and angrie at the heart, when we brake a custome of two hundred yeares prescription and

A and above: yet neverthelesse this griefe have they put up, and given us not one foule word. We warred upon the Pelignians in our owne name and quarrell: and they, who sometimes allowed not us the libertie so much as to defend our own marches of our selves, nothing gaind & crossed it. That the Sidicines were taken to our mercy and protection, that the Campaines revolted from them and sided with us, that we levied an armie against the Samnites their confederats, they heard and knew well enough: and yet they stirred not once forth of their cittie. How come they to be so calme and quiet, but upon a privy and knowledge, both of our puissance and of their owne weaknesse? I am able to avouch by the report of men of good credit, that when the Samnites complained themselves of us, they had such an answere againe of the Senat of Rome, that it plainly appeared that they themselves pretended not to require that Latium should be under the Romane Empire. Doe yee but take upon you, and lay claime unto that which they secretly do yeeld unto you themselves, & repossede it at your pleasure. Now if any man be affraid to be the speaker, Lo, here am I, who professe to be the man, and to say thus much not onely in the audience of the people and Senat of Rome, but also of Jupiter himselfe, who is resiant in the Capitoll, namely, That if they will have us to be of the league and confederacie, they shall admit from among us one of the Consuls, yea and a part also of the Senat. As he with great spirit and boldnes, not onely advised this, but promised also thus to doe; all that were present with a generall applause & assent, permitted him, to doe & say what soever he thought expedient for the common good of the Latine nation, according to that trust which they reposed in him. So soone as he was come to Rome (with other Embassadors) he was admitted into the Senat, and audience given him in the Capitoll. Where when T. Manlius the Consul by the authoritie and direction of the Senatours, had dealt with him and the rest, not to make warre upon the Samnites their confederats: Annus faring like a conquerour, as if he had woon by force and armes the Capitoll; and not as an Embassador, who was to deliver his mind and message safely, by the protection of the law of nations, began in this sort: The time required (quoth hee) now at length, O T. Manlius and yee Senatours of Rome, not to treat and deale with us in any affaires by way of authoritie and commaundement, namely, when you saw Latium by the favour of the gods to flourish exceedingly both in men and munition, as having subdued the Samnites, confedered with the Sidicines & Campaines, and now also combined with the Volscians: and besides even your own Colonies and townships, to have made choise to submit themselves to the Latines rather than the Romanes. But for as much as you cannot find in your hearts of your selves, nor see, how to make an end of your proud and outrageous lordship and tyrannie; Wee, albeit we are able to restore Latium into her auncient freedom by force of armes, yet for kined sake wil be content to offer indifferent articles and equall conditions of peace, for as much as it hath pleased the immortall gods, that we are egall unto you in power and puissance. Imprimis, there is no remedie now, but your two Consuls, must be one a Romane, and the other a Latine: Item, that the number of Senatours be elected as well out of the one nation as the other. Item, that we become one people incorporate, and one Commonwealth. And to the end that there may be one imperial seat, and one name of al, and therefore we or you must needs yeeld, we are content a Gods name (and to the good of both nations may it prove) that this cittie and state of yours be counted the better and more noble: and let us be called all, by the name of Romanes. By good hap it so fell out, that the Romanes also had for their Consul, T. Manlius to match him; one as stout & hot as the other: who could not contain his anger no longer, but openly said, That if the Senatours were so farre oversene and besides themselves, as to take conditions of a Setine, he would come with his sword by his side into the Senat house, and what Latine soever he saw there in counsell, he would not faile but sleigh him with his own hand in the place. And therewith turning to the image of Jupiter: Hearken (quoth hee) O good god Jupiter. Heare this wickednesse and indignitie: heare O Iustice, and pietie to godward. Wilt thou abide to see, O Jupiter, in this thy holy and sacred temple, wilt thou indure, as taken captive & troden under foot, to see Consuls of aliens and a Senat of foireiners? Are these the covenants O yee Latines, which Tullus king of Rome made with the Albanes your forefathers? or which L. Tarquinius after him, concluded with you? Remember yee not the battaile at the lake Regillus? Have yee so forgotten indeed, both your owne calamities and overthrowes of old, and also the good turnes and benefits received at our hands? When this speech of the Consul, was seconded with the indignation also of the Senatours, it is recorded, that when they called upon the gods, witnesses of those covenants, and reiterated iterated their names oftentimes. Annus in mockerie of those protestations, was over-heard G to despise and skorne the power and godhead of the Romane Iupiter. But this is certaine, that as he in heat of anger stepped hastily to the entrie or porch of the temple, and went apace, hee fell downe the staires, and so hurt his head that dashed against the bottome staire, that hee swoyned withall, and lay for dead. But because all writers agree not, that hee yeelded up his last breath thereupon, I also will leave it doubtfull as I find it: as also this, that in the very charging of him with breach of covenants, there poured downe a tempestuous storme with many mightie thunderclaps. For, as these and such like things may be very true, so they may be prettily devised and invented for the nones to represent and shew the wrath and vengeance of God. Torquatus being sent by the Senate to give the Embassadors their dispatch, seeing Annus there to lie H along, cried out aloud, in the hearing both of the Senate and the people, and said, No force, it is well, and as it should be; thus begin and blesse, o yee immortall gods, our just and rightfull war. Surely there is a god above, there is a power divine and deitie in heaven, thou art no feigned, imaginary god, o mightie Iupiter, and not in vaine have we hallowed thee in this place, as the father both of gods and men. Why stay yee then, o Romane Quirites, ye likewise my LL. of the Senat, to take armes in the name of the gods, having them already as you see, to bee your Leaders? I for my part, shall soone so overthrow and lay the legions of the Latines along on the earth, as yee now see their Embassadors, lying here at the staires foot. The words of the Consull, received with so great applause of the people, animated and enkindled them in such sort, that had not the caretull diligence of the Magistrates ben more (who by commandement of the Consull accompanied the Embassadors as they went) than the ordinarie safeconduct of the law of Nations, they had not escaped the rage and furie of the multitude.

The Senate also gave their assent to this warre, and the Consuls having levied two armies, and passed through the countrie of the Marfians and Pelignians, & joined unto them the Samnites power, encamped themselves before Capua, whither the Latines with their associates, were already come together. There, as the report goeth, the Consuls both of them in their sleep, had a vision: and there appeared unto them, one & the same shape of a mans personage, much greater and more stately than the ordinarie port of men, who should deliver these words unto them, That of the two armies embattailed and affronting one another, the one was appointed as a due tribute to the infernall spirits, and to Mother Earth: and of the other, the cheefe Generall only. And looke of whether armie the said soveraigne Generall should devow and offer unto those K infernall spirits, and to mother Earth, the Legions of the enemies, and his owne person withall, that part and that Nation shall have the victorie. When the Consuls had imparted one to the other these night-visions, it was thought good and agreed (for to divert and appease Gods anger) that certaine sacrifices should be laine, and also if the same shewed in their inward, as appeared in their sleepe, then one or other of the Consuls should fulfill the destinies, and accomplish fatall appointment. When as the answers of the Soothsayers agreed also to that secret religion which was now entred and settled already in their minds, then the Consuls calling together the Lieutenants and Colonels to a counsell, and openly declaring before them all, the pleasure of the gods, (to the end, that the wisfull and voluntarie death of one of the Consuls, might not fright his armie in the field) they agree betwene themselves, that of whether side the Roman battailions began first to give backe and recule, the Consull of that armie, should devow and be take himselfe to die for the people of Rome and the Quirites. It was debated also in that assembly, that if ever at any time before there had ben warre managed by severe rule and government, the militarie discipline should now be revived and reduced to the old manner and ancient rigour: their care in that behalfe was the greater and more redoubled, for that they were to fight against the Latines, sitting altogether to them in language, fashions, armor, & especially above all, in the orders and lawes of warfare. For, many a time, in these two armies, souldior with souldior, Centurion with Centurion, Colonell with Colonell, had sorted and conversed together, as colleagues and compeeres in the same garrisons, yea, and under the same colours and pennants. By reason whereof, to the end, that by no error the souldiours should be mistaken or deceived, M the Consuls made proclamation through the campe, That no man should fight with his enemy out of his owne rancke, and place appointed unto him. It fortunied now, that among other Captaines and guidons of horsemen, which were sent out every way as skouts and espials to discover the coasts, T. Manlius the Consull his sonne, together with the rest of his cornet and troupe,

A was passed above the enemies campe, so neere, as he was within an arrow shot of their next camp de guard. In which was quartered the cavallerie of Thufculum, under the leading of Geminus de guard a knight, both for birth, and also for his noble feats of armes highly esteemed in his countrie. He espying the Roman horse, and knowing the Coss. sonne, advancing before them, and of especiall marke above the rest (for all Noblemen and of qualitie, were well ynought knowne one to another.) What will ye Romanes (qd. he) with one cornet of horse, fight with the Latines & their confederates? What shall your Consuls, what shall two Consular armies doe the meane while? Manlius (quoth Manlius) they will be here time enough for you, and with them Iup. himselfe, a witness of league and covenants by you broken. Iupiter I say, who only can do more, than all mens forces in the world. And we who at the poole Regillus, have given you fighting your bellies full, will here also quit our selves so, that never after yee shall have any great joy and pleasure, to encounter and joine battaile with us again. With that, Geminus, riding forth as he was on horse backe, a little from his companie, Wilt thou then (qd. he) till that day come wherein ye meane with so great a doe, to set forward your armies to a generall set field, break a staffe with me in the meane time; that by the prooffe and event of us twaine, it may henceforth appeare, how far the Latine men of armes, surpass the Romane? The young man his blood and courage was soone up either upon anger and choler, or for very shame to refuse the combat, or because God would so have it, and it was his destinie that could not be avoided. Forgetting, therefore his fathers commandement, and the expresse edict of the Consuls, he runneth on head and rashly to a single fight: wherein, it skilled not much, whether he had the better or the worse, for any great odds thereby in the maine triall of the quarrell. Thus when the rest of the horsemen of both parts were retired aside (as it were) to behold some spectacle or running at tilt in the void place of the plaine field that lay betwene, they ran their horses in full carriere one against the other, with sharpe and deadly speare in reit. Manlius with his launce aloft, glid over any thing the motion of his enemy, and Metius with his speare lightly touched, and passed by the horseneck. Then having turned about their horses, Manlius came upon him first with a second charge, and so redoubled the push, that he thrust the others horse in, between the eares. At the snart of which wound the horse reared and cabred with his forefeet, and with great force shaking his head, cast his rider. And as hee bare his speare and shield, to raise himselfe from his greivous fall, Manlius ran him through at the throat, so as the spear head came forth at his ribs, & nailed him fast to the ground. And having disarmed & spoiled him, rode back to his own troupe: and both together with exceeding joy, hastened to the campe, and so to the Generals pavilion, even to his father; full little knowing his fatall destinie, & what was to befall unto him, whether he had deserved praise, or incurred danger of punishment. That all the world qd. he (o father) may be persuaded & report truly that I am defended indeed of your blood, and your undoubted son, Lo here I am, who being defied and challenged to fight man to man, have killed mine enemy a man of arms: see here the spoiles of him slain and dead. Which so soone as the Coss. heard, presently he could not abide to look on his son, but turned away, & by sound of trumpet, commanded the host to a publicke audience, Which being assembled in great number. For as much (qd. he) as thou, T. Manlius, without regard of Coss. authoritie, or dread of thy fathers majestie and power over thee, against our edict and expresse commandement, hast fought with the enemy, and that without thy ranke & place; and as much as lay in thee, hast broken the discipline of warre, whereby to this day the State of Rome hath stood maintained, and hast brought me thy father to this hard point, that I must forget either the Commoweale, or else mine owne selfe and mine: we will abide rather the punishment and snart for our own misdeeds, than the whole state, to her so great prejudice & damage, should pay for our folly and transgression. A fearefull and dolorous example will wee afford: but good and profitable to all youth for ever hereafter. As for mee verily, both the unbred love and affection of all fathers to their children, and also this shew & prooffe of thy valor and knight-hood (although seduced with deceitfull apparence and vaine resemblance of honour), moveth me not a little: but since that, either by thy death the Coss. herests must bee established, or by impunitie of thy disobedience, for ever disannulled, I would not with thee to refuse (if there be any of my blood in thee) but by thy punishment to restore & set up again, the militarie discipline which thus day by thy default is fallen down & ruinate. Go serjeant, & bind him to a stake. At this sentence, they were all amazed and in an extasie, that were present: and as if they had seen the edge bent against themselves, for fear more than for any modestie or reverence, they were quiet.

So when they were come againe to themselves, as if their spirits had bene recovered after some deep impression of a wonder which had astonished them, they stood still with silence: but so soon as the poore wretch his head was chopt off, and his blood seen to gush & spin out, then began they all of a suddaine to speake freely and complaine with open mouth, so as they forbore neither lamentations nor curses: they covered the youth his bodie with his owne victorious spoiles, they erected a funerall pile of wood over his corps without the trench and rampiers, set it on fire, and burnt him accordingly; and so with as great love and affection as soldiors could shew, performed their last dutie unto him, and solemnized his obsequies. Thus the commandements of Manlius were not onely dreadfull for the present, but gave an heave and fearfull precedent for the future, to all soverain Commanders of an armie. Howbeit, the rigor of this punishment made the soldiors more dutifull to their captaines and leaders: and besides that, the rounds and sentinels, and the set corps de gard, were everie where more carefully looked unto and observed: even in the verie hazard & extremity also of the battaile afterward, that austere severitie did much good. For their fight was much like unto a civile warre. So little, or nothing at all in a manner, differed the Latines from the Romanes Commonwealth, but onely in heart and courage.

Aforetime they used Romane long large sheilds, covering their whole bodies; but in proceffe of time, after that they became Stipendiaries and to take pay, they bare shorter targets. And where as aforetime they had their battaillons thicke and close together, like to the Macedonian Phalanges, afterwards they began to range their battails into bands more loosely and distinctly, and last of all they were divided into thinner orders and squadrons: everie such order or squadron contained threescore soldiors, two Centurions, and one Port ensigne. The forefront of the vangard, were javeliniers called Hastati, in fifteen squadrons, distant some litle way one from another: such a squadron had twentie soldiors lightly armed, and all the rest a sort of targaters. And those were called light armed, who caried onely a speare or javelin to fight with at hand, and other darts to launce from them aloofe. This forefront contained the flower of youths, that grew up as apprentices to warre-service. Then followed after them of stronger and riper age, as many bands or squadrons, which were called Principes; whom there followed hard at heeles, thirte squadrons, all targaters or shieldbearers, with brave armor above all others. And this battailon of thirty companies, they called Antepilani [avant-darters] for that the other fifteen orders or bands, were placed hard before the ensignes. And of these, everie band consisted of three parts: and ech of them they called Primum pilum, & it was composed of three banners or pannones: and everie such banner contained 186. men. The first Pannone or banner conducted the Triarij, who were old soldiors of approved valour: the second, those that were called Rorarij, of lesse puiſſance both for age and prowesse: the third, such as were named Accensi, who were of least account and trust, and therefore they were cast behind unto the taile of the battailon. When the armie was thus ordered in battaile array into these bands and squadrons, the javeliniers foremost of all began the fight: if they were not able to discomfit the enemies, then they with steedie footing and soft pace retired back into the void places betweene the squadrons of the Principes, who received them: then began the Principes to enter in the medley and to maintaine fight, and were seconded by the Hastati or Javelins. The Triarij remained standing all this while firmly, about their ensignes, setting out their left legs afore them at length, with their targets on their shoulders, & their pikes or javelins sticking on the ground, with their heads somewhat bending forward, much like as if their battaile were fortified with a Pallisado or rampair of pales and sharpe stakes. Now if those Principes had not good successe in fight, they retired themselves by litle and litle from the forefront, to the Triarij. And hereupon grew the proverbe, that when a thing was at a dead lift and in distresse, they would say, We are come to the Triarij. Then the Triarij standing up right, so soon as they had received the Principes and Hastati, into the void place between their files, presently drew in their rankes and files close together, and shut up as it were all waies of passage and entrance, and with one maine joinct and close battailon (as if now there were no more hope behind) advanced toward the enemy. And this most of all feared and terrified the enemies, when thinking to chase those that they seemed to have vanquished, they saw a new battaile of fresh men starting up, and the same increased in number.

Now were there commonly foure legions enrolled, consisting of five thousand foot, and three hundred horse to everie legion. As many more were added unto them, and those mustered out of the Latines, who at that time were enemies to the Romanes, and had ordered their battaillons

A battaillons after the same manner in all respects. And they knew well enough that not onely ensigne with ensigne, all pikes and javelins with pikes and javelins, Principes with Principes, but one centurion with another, if the arraies were not broken, were to encounter. Two Principi or chiefe Centurions, there were amongst the Triarij in the one armie & the other. The Roman, of bodie not so strong and well set, howbeit a good souldior otherwise, skillfull and of great experience: the Latine, exceeding mightie, and a notable fighter of all others. Well knowne they were one unto the other, because at all times they had the same conduct and equall place of charge. The Roman not greatly trusting to his owne strength, was permitted even at Rome by the Coss. to chuse unto him an under-centurion whom he would: who might protect and defend him safe from an enemy, that should happen to deale with him hand to hand. And it fortuned that the yong man by him elected, fought in the medlie & got the victory of the Latine centurion. B As for the battaile, it was stricken not far from the foot of the hill Vesuvius, in the very way that leadeth to Veris. The Romane Consuls before they came into field, killed their beasts for sacrifice. And the bowell-prying Soothsaier (as it is reported) shewed to Decius the head of the Liver on the inner side wounded (as it were) and cut off: otherwise in all respects, his sacrifice was acceptable to the gods. As for Manlius, he had as good signes of Gods favour in his, and all as well as might be. That is well yet (qd. Decius) if my colleague speed well, and have good successe by his sacrifice. Their battels being so arranged, as I said before, they marched into the field. Manlius led the right wing, Decius the left. At the first they fought on both sides with equal forces and like courage & heat of stomach. But afterwards, on the left wing, the Roman Hastati, not able to sustaine the violent charge of the Latines, retired to the Principes. In which trouble and fearfull disorder, Decius the Col. called aloud to M. Valerius. We have need of Gods helpe (qd. he) o Valerius. Where art thou, the publike high priest of the people of Rome? Come & say afore me that forme of words, whereby I may devow and betake my selfe for the legions. The priest commanded him to put on his long purple robe embroidered before, called Pretexta, to cover his head, and to put forth his hand under the said robe at his chin, & standing upon his javelin, with both his feet, to pronounce these words after him, as follow. O IANUS, IUPITER, FATHER MARS, QUIRINUS, BELLONA, O YEE LARES AND DOMESTICAL GODS, THE GODS NOVENTES AND INDIGETES; YE GODS LIKEWISE, WHOSE POWER EXTENDED OVER US AND OUR ENEMIES, AND O MANES THE INFERNALL GODS, YOU I INVOCAT D YOU I WORSHIP AND ADORE, YOUR PARDON I BESEECH AND FAVOUR, CRAVE, THAT YEE WOULD PROSPER ALL POWVER AND VICTORIE UNTO THE PEOPLE OF ROME AND QUIRITES; AND PUT TO FEARE, FRIGHT, AND DEATH, THE ENEMIES OF THE PEOPLE OF ROME AND QUIRITES. AND IUST AS I PRONOUNCE IN SET VWORDS, SO FOR THE VWEALE PUBLICKE OF THE QUIRITES, THE ARMIE, LEGIONS AND AIDS OF THE PEOPLE OF ROME, I BETAKE WITH ME UNTO MANES THE INFERNALL SPIRITS, AND DAME TELLUS, THE LEGIONS AND AIDS OF THE ENEMIES; AND MY SELFE AFTER THEM. Having made this praier, hee willed the serjeants or Lieftours to go to Manlius, and with all speed to tell him, that his colleague was devowed for the armie. Him selfe gyrded after the Gabine fashion, and armed at all peeces, mounted on horseback and E so rode into the midst of his enemies. Of both armies he was seene, to carrie with him much more stately and venerable port than a man, as sent from heaven to be a satisfaction of all gods wrath, and to turne away all plague and mischief from his owne people upon the enemies. All terror and feare he caried with him as he went, and first disordered the ensignes of the Latines in the edge & border of the battaillons, and afterwards entred withinforth into the whole armie. This was noted and seene most evidently, that which way so ere he rode, the enemies were smitten with feare, as if they had been blasted and stricken with some untoward aspect and influence of a planet. But so soone as he was fallen and overcharged with shot of darts, presently from that place all about, the cohorts of the Latines (out of all question) as amazed men, fled away and avoided. And therewithall likewise, the Romanes as if they had been discharged and freed from their religious feare and scruple of conscience, and as if they had but then and not before, heard the sound of trumpet to battell, began to charge and fight afresh. For both the Rorarij advanced forward and ran among the rankes of the Antepilani, and thereby reenforced the Hastati and Principes, and caused them to fight more stoutly: and the Triarij kneeling on their right knee, waited till the Col. gave them some token to arise. Afterwards in proceffe of fight, when in other parts the

the Latines in their number prevailed, Manlius the Consull, having heard of the finall ende of G his companion, and (as right and pietie would) accompanied as wel with plaints and tears as with due praises so worthy & memorable a death, for a while doubted, whether it were yet time for the Triarij to arise. Afterwards thinking it better that they should bee reserved in heart and fresh, unto the last push of extremitie, he biddeth the Accensi from the hinmost taile of the reeward to come forth before the standers. Who so soone as they were come in place, forthwith the Latines, supposing the enemies had done the like, raised their Triarij. Who having for a good while fought fiercely and wearied themselves, and either broken their javelins or dulled their points, and yet by fine force repulsed their enemies; thinking now all had been done and the victorie atchieved, as being come as farre as to the utmost skirts of the battaillons; Then, quoth the Consull to the Triarij, Rise now fresh and lustie as ye are, against the wearied, mindfull of your H countrie, parents, wives and children, mindfull of the Consull, who for your victorie hath taken his death. The Triarij all heartie and unfoiled, were not so soone risen up, shewing themselves in their bright and glittering armor, but there began on a sodaine & unlooked for, a new medley and conflict. For they receiving the Antepilani between their files, set up a shout & outcrie, troubled & disordered the Principia of the Latines, gored their faces with their javelins, slew the principal flower and strength of their best & formost men, and passed untouched in a manner through the other bands, as if they had beene disarmed: yea and brake through their pointed and close battaillons, with so great a murder, that scarcely they left behind them a fourth part of their enemies alive. The Samnites also under the foot of the hill, being seene a farre off in battaile aray, smote a terror among the Latines. But among all either citizens or allies, the especiall commendation of that service, rested in the Consuls: of whom, the one turned all the threats & dangers from the gods both above and beneath, upon himselfe alone; the other in that battaile shewed such valour and policie, that it is confessed both of Romans and Latines, who have written of that journey and commended it to posteritie, that of whether armie T. Manlius had the conduct, that way doubtlesse would the victorie go. The Latines after their defeature and flight, retired to Minturne: their campe presently upon the battaile was woom, and many a man there surprised alive and cut in pieces, but the Campaines especially. That day, could not the corps of Decius be seene, for that the night came upon them as they sought for it: the morrow after it was found amongst a mightie companie of Ilaime enemies, overwhelmed with swords, darts and javelins: and with all honour and solemnitie according to his death, performed by his brother K Consull were his funerals.

This also amongst the rest, seemeth worth the remembrance and to be inserted in this place, namely, That it was lawfull for Consull, Dictatour, and Pretor, whensoever they sacrificed and betooke to the Divell the Legions of their enemies, for to devow & offer withall, not themselves in any case, but any citizen whom they would: provided alwaies that he were one of the enrolled legion of the Romanes. AND IF THE MAN WHO IS THUS ADDICTED AND DESTINED TO DEATH, HAPPEN TO DIE, ALL IS WELL, AND AS IT OUGHT TO BE: BUT IF HE DIE NOT, THEN VVAS THE IMAGE OF HIM, 7. FOOTE HIGH OR ABOVE BURIED IN THE GROUND, AND A PURGING OR PROPITIATORIE SACRIFICE VVAS SLAIN IN HIS STEED: BUT VVHERSOEVER IT CHAUNCED THAT IMAGE TO BE SO ENTERRED; THEN VVAS IT NOT LAVVFULL FOR ANY ROMAN MAGISTRAT TO SET FOOT AND COME. BUT IF A MAN WOULD NEEDES OFFER AND DEVOWY HIMSELF TO DEATH, AS Decius DID, AND DIE NOT, HE SHALL NOT PURELY PERFORME ANY SACRED DUTIE, OR DOE SACRIFICE, EITHER FOR HIMSELFE OR THE CITTIE, THAT HATH ONCE THUS BETAKEN HIMSELFE. IF HE WILL BEQUEATH AND OFFER HIS ARMOR TO VULCAN, OR TO SOME SAINT WHOMSOEVER HE LIST, BE IT PERMITTED AND LAVVFULL FOR HIM SO TO DOE, EITHER BY VVAY OF SACRIFICE OR OTHER OFFERING AS HE PLEASETH. AS FOR THE VVEAPON OR SPEARE OVER VVHICH THE CONSULL STANDING ON BOTH HIS FEETE, MADE HIS PRAIERS AND INVOCATIONS, IT IS NOT LEFFULL THE ENEMIE TO SEISE THEREON: BUT IF HE FORTUNE M TO VVIN THE SAME, A PROPITIATORIE SACRIFICE MUST BE OFFERED TO APPEASE MARS, TO VVIT, A SVVINE, A SHEEPE, AND A BULL. And albeit the records both of all devine and humane customes and traditions, make no mention hereof, and are now growne out of use and remembrance, by reason that we prefer new and forreine ceremonies, before the olde

A olde auncient rites of our owne countrie and auncestours, yet I thought not a misse, to make report thereof, even in those verie wordes and termes, as they were used, delivered, and pronounced.

In some writers I finde, that the Samnites having waigted to see the event of this battaile, came to aide the Romanes when all was done and past. Also, that there was succour a coming from Lavinium unto the Latins, but not before they had the overthrow; by reason that they spent a great time in deliberation. And when as now, the formost ensignes and some part of the armie was gone forth of the gates, and newes came of the defeature and slaughter of the Latines; as they turned their banners and returned into the cittie, it is said, That their Pretor or Provostual mede Millonius, spake these words, That so finall a way as they had gone, must cost them deare, B and full sweetly would the Romanes be paid therefore. Such as were remaining of the Latines after the battaile, and were scattered a sinder in many and divers waies, when they were rallied together, shrowded themselves for safetie in the cittie Vesicia. Where, in their Councils and assemblies, Numisus their Generall, averred, and assured them, that Mars in deede was common, and the hazard indifferent to both parties, as having made an equall massaker in the one armie and the other; & that the bare name only of Victorie went with the Romanes: for otherwise, they carried away with them the fortune of men vanquished, and sped no better than they. For (saith he) The two roiall pavilions of their Cos, are polluted & defiled; the one with the paricide of his own son, the other for the death of the Cos, who had devowed himselfe to die: all their forces in manner flaine: their Javeliniers & principals killed: a bloudie slaughter committed both before C and behind the Standers: and onely the Triarij at the last upshot, renued the medley and set all upright. And albeit (quoth he) the power of the Latines also be shrewdly abated, yet for a fresh supplie, either Latium or Volscie are nearer than Rome. And therefore if they so thought good, he would with all speede raise the lustie floure and chosen manhood, both out of the Latins and the Volscians, and retume againe with a fresh armie to Capua: and with his sodaine coming unlooked for, surprise and decaie the Romanes, expecting as then for nothing lesse, than a second battaile. So by dispatching his cautelous and deceitfull letters into all parts of Latium and the Volscian nation, (by reason that they who had not been present at the battaile were sooner induced to give rash credit) there was a tumultuarie armie in great hast levied, enrolled, and assembled together out of all quarters. This host as it marched, Torquatus the Consull met at Tifanum, a place betwene Sinuessia & Minturne. And before they could chuse out a plot of ground D to encampe in, they bestowed their eariages and baggage on heaps, of either side: fell to a battaile presently, and made a finall end and conclusion of all the war. For the enemies were brought to encampe in, and this their rendring the Campaines likewise followed. Thus Latium and Capua forfeited and lost part of their territories. The lands of the Latines with the Privernates laied thereto, and the territorie of Falerij which belonged to the people of Capua, even as farre as the river Vulturinus, was divided amongst the Commons of Rome. Two acres in the Latine countrie, with a supplement of three foure parts out of the Privernates land to make up the whole: and three acres in the territorie of Falerij, with addition of a fourth part to boote for E amends because it was so farre off, were assigned for a man. The Laurentines only, of all Latium, and the horsemen of the Campaines, escaped this punishment and were exempted from the rest, because they had not revolted. And a decree passed, that the league with the Laurentes should bee renewed: and from that time usually every yeare, is it renewed, after the tenth daie of the Latine holidays. Those Campaine horsemen were made free denizens of Rome: and for a monument and memoriall thereof, they set up and fastned a brazen table at Rome in the temple of Castor. The people of Capua were enjoined to pay yearly to every one of them, (and they were a thousand and vi. hundred in all) 45. * Deniers.

Thus after the war fully determined, and both rewards dealt, and punishment inflicted according to each mans desert, T. Manlius returned home: whom the elders onely (for certaine) went forth to meete on the way: the youth, not onely then, but ever after, during his life abhorred and with curses detested him. The Antiates made certaine rodes into the territories of Hostia, Ardea, and Solonæ. And for that Manlius the Consull was not able himselfe in person to intend and manage that warre, by reason of sicknesse, he nominated for Dictatour, L. Papyrius Crassus, who as it hapned was at that time Pretor: by whom was named for Generall of the horsemen, C c men, L. Pappyrus Cursor. This Dictatour, albeit he kept the field and lay encamped certaine months within the confines, yet achieved no worthie and memorable exploit. After this yeare thus renowned for the victorie of so many and so puissant nations, and withall for the noble and famous death of the one Consull, and for the government of the other, albeit sterne and rigorous, yet notable and renowned; there succeeded Consuls, T. Aemilius Mamercus, and Q. Publius Philo, who met not with the like subject and matter of great affaires: and they themselves were more mindfull either of their owne private busines, and studious to maintaine a side and faction in the Commonweale, than to advance the State of their countrie. Howbeit, the Latins (who rebelled for anger that they lost their lands) they discomfited in the plain of Feneſta, drave them out of their camp, & forced them to leave the field. Where, whiles Publius (by whose governance and conduct that victorie was achieved) received surrender of the Latines, the floure of whose youth was there all slaine and killed up, Aemilius lead his armie against Pedum. As for the Pedanes they had maintenance from Tybur, Preneſte, and Velitern, who tooke their parts: there came also aid from Lanuvium and Antium. Where the Romane Consull, albeit he had the better hand in skirmish, yet for that there remained behind a new peece of service about the citie it selfe Pedum, and the campe of their confederates which was adjoined close to the towne: all of a suddaine he gave over the warre unfinished, because he heard that triumph was decreed unto his brother Consull. He also himselfe returned to Rome, and called earnestly for triumph before victorie. At which untimely and covetous desire of his, the Nobles being offended, denied flatly; that unlesse he either forced Pedum by assault, or won it by composition, he should not triumph. Herupon Aemilius being discontented and alienated from the Senat, bare his Consullship afterward like to the seditious Tribunes. For so long as he was Consull, he ceased not to charge and accuse the Nobles before the people; and his Colleague no whit gainſaid him, as being himselfe one of the Commoners. He tooke occasion of these accusations upon this, that the lands in the Latine and Falern countries, were divided in pinching and skant measure, among the Commons. And after that the Senat, desirous to abridge the time of the Consuls government, had decreed that a Dictatour should be declared against the Latine rebels, Aemilius (whose turne it was at that time to governe) nominated his owne companion in office to be Dictatour, by whom Junius Brutus was named Generall of the horse. This Dictatorship was popular and altogether framed to the humour of the common people: both by reason of ſclaunders and accusatorie Inveſtives made against the Nobles: and for that it enacted three statutes, most favourable and pleasing to the Commons, and as crosse and adverse to the Nobilitie: first, That the Actes devised and enacted by the Commons, should bind all the Quiritis or citizens of Rome: secondly, That all lawes which were propoſed, and to passe by the suffrages of the Centuries, before the Scrutinie began, & their voices gathered, the nobles should allow and approve: thirdly, That for as much as they were come thus farre already, that both the Censors might be of the Commons, now one censour at the least should be a Commoner of necessity. In so much as the Nobles thought verily that there was more lost at home this yeare by these Consuls and Dictatour, than gained to the Empire abroad, by their victories and warlike exploits.

In the yeare following when C. Furius Camillus and Q. Menius were Consuls, to the end that Aemilius the Consull of the former yeare, might be more notably reproched for the quitting and letting slip of a victorie that should have bene achieved in his yeare, the Senate began to mutter in their speeches, that Pedum by force of armes, by valour of men, and all possible means whatsoever, should be destroyed and rased to the ground. Whereupon, the new Consuls being forced to lay aside all other affaires, and to go in hand with that service, first tooke their journey thither. Now was Latium growne to those termes, as they could neither abide warre nor endure peace. To maintaine the wars they wanted meanes: and peace they could not away with nor abide to here of, never since the losse of their lands. So they thought best to hold a middle course; to stand upon their guard, and to keepe themselves within their townes: that the Romans being not provoked, should make no quarrell of warre: and if there were tidings brought of any town beleaguerd, there might be aid sent from all parts to the besieged. And yet for all this, were the Pedanes succoured but of verie few. The Tiburines and Preneſtines, whose countrie lay neereſt, came to Pedum. But for the Aricines, Lanuvines and Velitern, who joined their forces with the Antiates and Volsicians, were suddainly assailed and set upon, neer the river Astura by

A by Menius, and vanquished. Camillus fought before Pedum with the Tiburines, who came into the field with a right puissant armie, and put him to much trouble & hazard: howbeit he had as good successe in the end as Menius. The greatest tumult & trouble was caused especially by occasion of a suddaine fall of the townsmen in the verie time of the conflict. Against whom, after that Camillus had opposed part of his forces to make head, he not only drave them within the wals, but the same day also, when he had discomfited both them and their succors, he scaled the town & was master therof. Then it was thought good, with greater preparation of power & courageous resolution, then the winning of that one citie, to go about with the victorious armie from one to another, and so to subdue and tame for ever, the whole nation and name of Latium. Neither rested they, untill partly by maine force, and partly by taking one citie after another by way of surrender, they had brought all Latium under their subjection. After this, having disposed and placed garrisons in everie town which they had gotten, they departed to Rome for triumph: which was to them by a generall consent of all men granted. Besides their triumph, this honour was to them done, that two statues of horsemen (a rare thing in those daies) should be erected for them in the Grand place, called Forum.

But before that they gathered the suffrages of the people, in the assembly for Election of Coss. against the yeare following, Camillus in this wise made a speech to the Senat, touching the Latine nations. My LL. and Senators of Rome, That which by warre and force of armes was to be done in Latium, is now by God his goodnes and the valour of our soldiours brought to good passe. The armies of our enemies slain before Pedum and Astura: The Latine townes all, and Antium

The Order of Camillus to the Senate of Rome,

C a citie of the Volsicians either by force won, or rendred by composition, are now held and kept to your behoofe, by your owne garriſons. It remaineth now to consult (for as much as they trouble us oft by rebellion) and to devise some meanes how to keepe them quiet in continuall peace. In this consultation, the immortal gods have given you thus much power to resolve upon, that it lieth wholly in your hands, to chuse whether Latium shall continue still a nation or no: and therefore may ye for ever procure your selves repose and securitie from thence, either by rigour & punishment, or by clemencie and pardon, chuse you whether. Are ye minded to proceed by way of crueltie against those that have yeelded themselves, & are vanquished? Ye may, indeed, destroy all Latium, and make all wast and a desert wilderness, from whence oftentimes in sundrie and dangerous wars of yours, ye have had the helpe of an armie of Allics, and found them fast and glorious. But will ye (as your anceltors have done before you) enlarge the Roman Empire by receiving unto your citie those whom ye have conquered? Then have ye matter & means to grow up still and wax mightie, to your great honour and glorie. Certes, that government and domination is of all other most strong and sure, wherein the subjects take joy in their obedience. But whatsoever you meane to determine in this behalfe, ye have need to make speed and resolve betimes. So many nations yee hold in suspence of mind betweene feare and hope: and therefore behooveth it is, that you both rid and deliver your selves (as soon as you can) of the care they put you to; and also whiles their heads are busied and minds unresolved (standing as they doe amazed in doubtfull expectation) either by punishment or by benefite, to forestall and prevent them before they take heart againe. For, our part it was hitherto and devoite to effect & bring about, that yee might be able to dispose of all at your pleasure, and as you would your selves: now your dutie it is to determine what is best for your selves and the Commonweale. The lords and chiefe of the Senat praised this motion of the Coss. and deemed it good in generall. But for as much as the condition of the parties was divers, and their cause not all one, they said that they might resolve and determine best, according to the desert of each state, if they were specified by name, and the opinions asked in particular. So they fel to consultation of them severally as they were propounded: and set downe this order and decree, Imprimis, that the Lanuvines be enfranchised citizens of Rome, and enjoy againe their owne religion and sacred ceremonies, with this proviso, that the chappell and grove of Iuno Sospita should be common to the Burgeoises of Lanuvium and the people of Rome. Item, that the Aricines, Nomentanes, and Pedanes, shall bee made denizens of Rome, and endued with the liberties and priviledges of the Lanuvines. Item, that the Tusculanes retaineth still that freedome of their citie safe, which as then they enjoyed: and the crime & attaindre of rebellion, to be charged upon a few of the cheefe, to save the common state from danger. Item, that there should be grievous punishment inflicted upon the Veliterns, who being auncient Romane citizens, had notwithstanding so often taken arms & rebelled: that their

wals should be dismantled and rased: their Senatours from thence translated, and confined beyond Tyberis, there to dwell, upon paine, that whosoever were found on this side the water, it might be lawfull for any man to take him as his prisoner, and to ransom him at a * 1000 Alles.
Provided alwaies, that he should not enlarge him, nor release him of his yrons, untill the monie were fully satisfied and paid. Into the possessions and lands of those Senatours, were tenants and Coloners sent to inhabit: who being once enrolled, Velitres seemed againe as populous as be-foretime. At Antium was there a new Colonie planted, with this proviso, that the auncient inhabitants of the Antiates (should be permitted (if they themselves would) to be enrolled there, and remaine still. From thence were their long Gallies and war-ships had away, and the people of Antium, wholly forbidden the sea: but the freedome of Romane citizens to them was graun-ted. The Tyburts and Prenestines forfeited their lands, not for their late trespasses of rebellion, H common with other Latines, but because they repining and envying the good estate of the Ro-manes, had in times past joined armes with the Frenchmen, a savage and unsociable nation.
From the other Latine cities & States, they took away the priviledge of mariage, the commerce of traffick, and entercourse of mutuall intelligences, & holding counsels themselves, for ever after. To the Campaine gentlemen that served with horse aforelaid, for that they would not give consent to revolt with the Latines: to the Fundanes also and Formanes, through whose countie they had alwaies had free, safe, and quiet passage to and fro, this honour was done, as to be made citizens of Rome; but without the liberie of giving voices. Item, it was decreed, that the Cimanes and Sueffulanes, should be of the same condition and state that Capua was. The ships of the Antiates were part of them transported to the Arsenal at Rome, and the rest set on fire and I burned. With the stems, beakeheads, and brazen pikes whereof, it was thought good, that the pulpit of common pleas and Orations in the grand place of Rome, should be beautified and adorned: which publicke pulpit was therupon called Rostra.

Whiles C. Sulpitius Longus, and P. Aelius Patrus were Consuls, when as the Romanes held peaceable under their dominion all the countries, as well through the favour which they woon by bountifull dealing, as by might and strong hand, there arose war betweene the Sidicines and Auruncians. The Aurunci, who had yielded afore to T. Manlius Consull, and were taken into protection, afterwards rebelled not: whereby they had a more just cause to request and seeke for aid at the Romanes hands. But before that the Consuls had led forth their power out of the citie (for the Senate had commaunded, that the Aurunci should be defended) tidings came, that the Aurunci for feare had quirt their towne: and being fled with their wives and children, had fortified Sinuessa, which now at this day is called Aurunca: and that the auncient wals, with the towne it selfe, were by the Sidicines destroyed. Hereat, the Senate offended with the Consuls, by whose delay and lingering, their allies had been betrayed in time of their necessitie, ordained a Dictatour to be chosen. So there was elected C. Claudius Regillensis, who appointed for Generall of horsemen C. Claudius Horator. But hereupon rose a scruple of conscience about the creation of the Dictatour. And when the Augurs had pronounced, that they thought him not rightly created, both Dictatour and Generall of horsemen, gave over their roumes. The same yeare Mi- natia a Vestall Nun, was first suspected of incontinencie, for going in her apparell more trimme than was decent for one of her calling and profession: and after that, brought in question and accused by a bondservant, that informed against hir to the high Priests. First, by a decree of theirs she was awarded to abstaine from divine service, to keepe her house, and not to manuprise and set free any of her bondslaves, but to have them forthcomming, whersoever they were, called for: and after farther examination and judgement passed, was buried quicke under the ground, at the gate Collina, in the paved cauley on the right hand, within the plain or field called Scel- latus. Execrable or polluted. I suppose, that place took the name of such *incest or filthy whoredome. The same yeare Q. Publius Philo was elected Pretor, the first that ever was of the Commons, notwithstanding the mind of Sulpitius the Consull, who said, That hee would not take his name to propound it for Election, nor admit him among other competitors. But the Senate strived the lesse in impeaching this Pretorship, seeing they could not have their will in the highest roumes and dignities.

The yeare next ensuing, under the Consulship of L. Papyrius Crassus, and Casus Duellius, was notable and famous for the warre of the Ausonians, in regard rather of the noveltie, than the greatnesse and danger thereof. They were a people that inhabited a towne called Cales, and had joined

A joined their power with the Sidicines their next neighbours. The whole power of which two nations being discomfited in one battaile, and the same not so memorable, was for the neerer of their cities more readie to die, and in their flight more safe and secured. Yet the Nobles of Rome omitted not the care of that warre: for that the Sidicines so often, either had themselves moved warre, or aided those that began, or els were the cause of all troubles. Whereupon they endeavoured all that they could, to make Consull the fourth time, the noblest warrour in those daies, M. Valerius Corvinus, who had for his brother in government M. Attilius Regulus. And least haply some error by chaunce should be committed, suit was made to the Consuls, that extraordinarily, and without casting lot, that province might fall to Corvinus: who having received the armie (after the victorie at Cales) of the former Consuls, went forth. And when at the first B shout and onset hee had discomfited his enemies, who in remembrance of their former late overthrow were affrighted, hee assaied to assault their very wals: and so eager and hotely bent (I assure you) were the fouldiours, that even at the first they would have set ladders to, as making full account to scale up to the top, and enter the towne. But Corvinus, because that was an hard adventure, was desirous to accomplish that enterprize by the long toile of his fouldiours, rather than their present perill: hee raised therefore a countermure, and platformes, and rolling frames, mounted against the wals: but as good hap was, by an opportunite that fell out, they had no use of these munitions and fabrikes. For M. Fabius a Romane prisoner, taking vantage of the negligence of his keepers upon a feastivall holyday, and making meanes to breake his bonds, let himselfe downe by a long cord, fastened at one end to a pinnacle or battlement of the wall, and C slid by the armes, among the munitions and fabrikes of the Romanes: who so perswaded and prevailed with the Generall, that hee caused him to give an assault upon the enemies, now being fast asleepe, as having filled their bellies with wine and good meats. So that with as little ado were the Ausonians and their citie surprisid, as they were afore vanquished in fight. A great bootie of pillage was there gotten: and after a garrison placed at Cales, the legions were brought back to Rome. The Consull by decree of the Senate triumphed: and that Attilius should not bee without his glorie too, both Consuls were appointed to lead forth an armie against the Sidicines: but before they went, they appointed by a decree of the Senat, L. Aemilius Mamercus to be Dictator, to hold the election of Consuls. Who named Q. Publius Philo for his Generall of horsemen.

D In this Election, holden by this Dictator, there were created Consuls, T. Veturius, and Sp. Po- sthumius. Who, albeit there remained some part behind of the Sidicines warre, yet to the intent they might gratifie the Commons by some good turne, and prevent their longing before they spake themselves; proposed an Act concerning the bringing of a Colonie to Cales: and when as the Senate had ordained, that two thousand and five hundred men should bee enrolled and af-signed thither; they created Triumvirs for to bring them thither, and to divide the lands, namely Casus Duellius, T. Quinctius, and M. Fabius. After this, the new Consuls having received the armie of the old, entred into the enemies confines, wasting all before them, untill they came to the very wals of their citie. Now, for that the Sidicines had assembled a puissant armie, and seemed themselves fully resolute and bent upon utter despaire to put all unto the last adventure, and to E fight it out to the last man. Moreover, because it was noised, that all Samnium was risen up in armes: by authoritie from the Senate, the Consuls appointed P. Cornelius Rufinus Dictator, and M. Antonius was nominated Generall of the horse. But hereupon grew againe another scruple, that there was some error escaped in the creation: so they resigned up their places, and because there ensued also a plague hereupon (as if all their Auspices for the Elections of Magistrates had been touched and infected with that error and default) the managing of all affaires fell to an Interregne. Which being now entered upon by the first Interregent, M. Valerius Corvinus, then Consuls were created, L. Cornelius the second time, and Cn. Domitius.

When all things els were at quiet, the rumor of the Gauls war was so rise and hot, that it was taken for a very *Tumult. Whereupon it was thought good, that a Dictator should be created. And F M. Papyrius Crassus was nominated, who had P. Valerius Publicola for Generall of the horsemen.
When they had mustered the soldiors more streightly and with greater regard than would have been for wars neare hand, the espials who were sent out, brought word that all was well and quiet among the Gauls. But suspected it was that Samnium now the second yeare was readie to drop out of their allegiance and seeke a change. Whereupon the Romane armie was not withdrawnne out of the Sidicine countrie. Howbeit the warre of Alexander King of Epirus, drew the Samnites G into the Lucanes countrie, which two nations uniting their forces, gave the King a battaile, as he made rodes from Pegasus. In which conflict, Alexander having gotten the upper hand, entred into a league and amitie with the Romanes: although it was much doubted, with what faithfulness he would observe the same, if all his affaires prospered as well. The same yeare was a solemne Cense or Numbring of the people of Rome holden, and the newe cittizens were matriculated and enrolled. And therefore two Tribes were annexed, Misia and Capia: the Censors that ordained them, were Publ. Philo, and Sp. Posthumius. The Acerranes became Romane cittizens, by an act proposed by L. Papyrius the Pretor: by vertue whereof, they were enfranchised Denizens, but without the privilege of giving voices. These were the acts for this yere both at home and abroad.

The yeare next following (were it through the unkinde distemperature of the aire, or by some wicked practise of man) was infamous, when M. Claudius Marcellus and T. Valerius were Consuls. I finde the surname of this Consull to varie in divers Chronicles, in some Flaccus, in others Patius. But it matters not much whether be true. This rather I could willingly have wished (and yet all authors doe not record it) that it had been falsely recorded, That those persons by sorcery and poison were made away, whose death hath diffamed that yeare with the note of a pestilence. But yet as the thing is left in writing, I purpose to deliver it, lest that I should seeme to derogate ought from the credence of any writer. When as the chiefe personages of the cittie died upon like diseases, and after one and the same manner of symptomes, a certaine chamber-maid presented her selfe to Q. Fabius Maximus (being for the time an Aedile of State) and professed to bewray the cause of that publike and contagious maladie, if she might be assured by faithfull promise from him, that by the utterance thereof, she should not come to harme nor trouble. Forthwith Fabius delivered this matter to the Consuls: and the Consuls made relation thereof to the Senate: by the consent of which State, assurance was made accordingly unto the partie aforesaid, to reveale the matter. Then shee declared, that by the lewd and mischievous wickednes of women, the cittie was thus afflicted: and namely, That certain dames of Rome even their owne wives, boiled and tempered ranke poisons, (to kill their husbands) and if they would follow it presently, they might be taken in the maner. So they went straight waies with the wench, and found some women as they were seething and preparing venomous drugs, yea and some poisoned confections aheaide put up. Which were brought into the market place, and about 20 of those dames, with whom the poisons were found, were sent for by a serjeant. Two of them, Cornelia and Sergia, both noble women borne, stoutly standing upon these termes, and stiffly avouching, That they were soveraine medicines and holsome for the bodie of man, were by the chamber-maid aforesaid confuted, and enjoined to drinke therof, that they might disprove her, and make her a liar, and to have devised of her owne fingers ends this false slander. Who tooke a time to commune and conferre together, and the people were avoided aside to make them way. Now when as in sight of all the world, these two dames had propounded the matter to the rest there in place, they also refused not: and so having drunke the poisoned potion, they all perished by their owne mischievous practise. Then presently were their complices apprehended, who detected and discovered a great number of other wives: of which one hundreth and seven- L tic were condemned. Never afore that daie was there any inquisition nor processe at Rome, about poisoning and forerie. So as the thing was taken for a prodigious wonder, and imputed rather to their minds, besotted and bewitched, than to any felonious intent of theirs. Whereupon the Magistrates of the cittie, calling to mind and searching the old Chronicles, found, that in times past, at what time as the Commons in a mad fit withdrew themselves and departed the cittie, there was a spike or great naile driven and fixed by the Dictatour: and that the mindes of the people, which by discord had been bestraght and out of their right wits, were by that ceremoniall satisfaction, brought againe in good tune: and therefore it was thought good, that for the fastning or sticking up of such a naile, there should a Dictatour be created. So Cn. Quintilius was nominated, who named L. Valerius Generall of horsemen, who so soone as the naile was M fastned, gave over their places.

Consuls then were created, L. Papyrius Crassus the second time, and L. Plantius Venox. In the beginning of which yeare, there came from the countrie of the Volscians as Embassadors to Rome, the Fabraternes and Lucanes, making request that they would take them into their pro- tection;

A tection; promising that if by them they were defended from the forces of the Samnites, they would become loiall and obedient subjects to the people of Rome. Then were Embassadors sent from the Senat, to give commandement to the Samnites, to forbear doing any violence upon the borders of those nations. Which embassage sped well and tooke place; not so much for that the Samnites desired peace, as because they were not as yet readie prepared for war. The same yeare began the Privernates warre. The confederates whereof, were the Fundanes, and their Leader likewise a Fundane, one Vitruvius Vaccus, a man of great name and reputation, not onely in his owne countrie, but also at Rome. His dwelling house stood sometime in mount Palatine, even the very same, which after the building was pulled down, and the ground forfeit and confiscated, was called Vacci Prata. Against whom as he wasted and spoiled farre and neare the B Setine, Norbane and Corane countries, L. Papyrius went forth with a power, and rested not far from his very campe. But Vitruvius neither had the wit to keepe himselfe within his trench against a mightier enemy, nor yet the heart to encounter farre from his fort. But having put his souldiors in battaile array, before they were all well out of the gate of the campe, whiles the souldiors had more minde to flie backward than march forward and encounter the enemy; without either advice or confident courage he fought: and with as little adoe, and without any question of the matter he was vanquished: so by reason of the shortnesse of the way, and the easie retire into the campe so neare, he found no great trouble to save his souldiors from much slaughter. For in the verie conflict, few or none in a manner were slaine, and not many in the presse of the rout and taile of the flight, at what time as they rushed into their campe. And in the beginning C of the night, the armie thus discomfited, made hast to Privernum, there to defend themselves within a wall rather than a trench. Plantius the other Cos, having from Privernum, overrun and forraied the territorie, and driven booties away, conducted his armie into the Fundane countrie. The Senat of the Fundanes as he entred into their confines met him, saying: They were not come as Orators to entreat either for Vitruvius, or for those that tooke his part; but for the people of the Fundanes: who that they were innocent and not culpable for this war, Vitruvius him- selfe hath plainly proved and declared, in that he chose Privernum to be his place of retreat and refuge, and not the cittie Fundi the verie place of his nativitie. And therefore at Privernum the enemies of the people of Rome were to be sought for and pursued, who unmindfull of both their D Fundi, they were at peace with Rome, nay they were Romanes in heart, and carried a thankfull remembrance of a benefit received: they intreated therefore and besought the Consull to forbear hostility with a guiltlesse people: assuring him that their lands, their cittie, their owne bodies, their wives and children were and should be at the devotion of the people of Rome. The Consull after that he had commended the Fundanes, and sent letters to Rome that they remained firme and fast in their allegiance, turned his way to Privernum. But before hee dislodged (as Claudius writeth) the Consull executed those that were the heads of the conspiracie, and three hundred and sitie of those rebellious conspiratours were sent prisoners to Rome. But the Senat accepted it not, and were not content with that submission, as judging the Fundane people, desirous to be excused and discharged, with the punishment of the needie and base sort of people. E Now when as Privernum was besieged and invested with two Consular armies, the one of the Consuls was called home, to hold the Election of magistrates. That yeare were erected in the great race called Circus, the Barriers, from whence the horses and their chariots are let forth, when they run their prices. But before they were well past the care of the Privernates warre, there arrived a terrible and fearefull brute of the Gaules warre, which never was regarded slightly of the Nobles of Rome. Incontinently therefore the new Consuls, L. Aemilius Mamercus, and Cn. Plantius, on that verie day, namely on the *Calends of Iuly, wherein they entred their offices, were commanded to determine and agree between themselves upon their provinces: And Mamercus, who had the charge of the Gaules warre, levied and enrolled an armie without allowing any immunitie and exemption from warfare. Moreover and besides, even the poore handi-crafts F men and artificers, such as keep their shoppes, and live by sedentarie occupations, a sort far unmeet for martiall service, are said to have been called forth, and prest to the wars: and a mightie armie was assembled and met together at Veij, that from thence they might march to encounter the Gaules: For it was thought good that they should now go farther forward; for feare least the enemy taking another way, might deceive them and march directly to the cittie of Rome. But a few

a few daies after, when it was knowne for certaine that all the trouble and feare for that time was overblowne, they diverted their forces from the Gaules, and bent all against Privernum. But the vsitie hereof is reported two manner of waies, some write that the citie was forced by assault, and that Vitruvius came alive into their hands: others, that before the utmost extremities of assault was used, they of their owne accords, carying before them white wands in token of peace, yeelded themselves unto the Consull: and that Vitruvius by his owne countreimen was rendred and delivered unto him. The Senat being moved, & their opinion asked concerning Vitruvius and the Privernates, sent for the Consull Plautius to triumph, after that he had disinanted the walles of Privernum, and there placed a strong garison: and they gave order in the meane time that Vitruvius should be kept fast in prison untill the Consuls returne, then to be whipped and put to death. They appointed also that his habitation in Palatium should be pulled down, and his goods consecrated to their Idoll Semon Sangus. And look what mony [of brasse] was raised thereof, it served to make brasse round plates, which were offered and set up in the chappell of Sangus towards the temple of Quirinus. Touching the Senat of the Privernates, thus it was decreed, that everie one of Senators calling, who remained at Privernum after their revolting from the Romans, should in the same condition and state as the Veliternes, be confined beyond Tybris, and there dwell. These Actes being thus set downe, there was no more talke of the Privernates untill the triumph of Plautius. After the triumph, the Consull having executed Vitruvius and his complices, supposing now that he might safely propound the cause of the Privernates, to the LL. of the Senat, whiles they were newly satisfied with the execution of the guilty offenders. Since that (quoth he) my LL. of the Senat, the principall authors of this revolt and rebellion, have both at the hands of the immortal gods, and at yours, suffered now alreadie condigne punishment; what is your further pleasure, and what shall be done with the innocent and harmelesse multitude? For my part verily, although I be rather to demaund your opinions than to deliver mine owne: yet seeing the Privernates neere neighbours unto the Samnites, with whom we now at this time intertaine a most uncertaine and slipperie peace, I would have as litle grudge and rancor left as may be, between us & them. As the question in it selfe was doubtfull and ambiguous, whiles men gave advise some to proceed cruellly, others to deale gently, according to ech man his nature and inclination: so, there was one of the Privernate Embassadors that made it more doubtfull, and put all out of square; a man mindfull of that state wherein he was borne, more than of his present need and extremity. Who being demaunded of one (that had spoken to the point, and delivered some sharpe censure and heavey sentence against them) What punishment he judged the Privernates deserved? Mary (quoth he) that which they deserve, who deeme themselves worthy of libertie and freedome. At whose stout and arrogant answer, when the Consull saw those to be more eagerly and bitterly bent, who before impugned the cause of the Privernates: to the end that he himselfe by some mild and gentle demaund might draw from the partie more modest language: What (quoth hee) if we should remit & pardon your punishment; what kind of peace might we hope to have at your hands? If (quoth hee) yee offer us good peace, yee shall find it on our part loiall and perpetuall: but if yee tender hard conditions of peace, yee shall have it last but a small while. But then one gave out, that the Privernate began to threaten plainly: and said moreover, that such speeches were enough to stir up any peaceable and quiet people to war, that never thought to have fought. But the better part of the Senate drew these his answers to a better sense, and said that it was the speech of a man, and of a man free borne. For, was it credible (quoth they) that any state, nay any particular person, would longer abide (than needs he must) that condition which he misliketh and goeth against his stomacke? There onely is peace sure and like to hold, where men are contented and willing to keepe themselves in peace: and never let men look or hope to find faithfull loialtie, where they will impose thraldome & servitude. And to this purpose the Consull himselfe especially moved & inclined their hearts, reiterating these words to the Senators that were first to give their opinions, and that so lowd, as he might of many more be over-heard, That they above al other, and none but they indeed were worthy to be made Romane citizens, who minded and esteemed nothing in the world, but their freedome. Whereupon, both in the Senat they obtained their suit: and also by the authoritie of the LL. a Bill was exhibited to the people, That the Privernates might be enfranchised Romanes.

The same yeare were three hundred sent as a Colonie, to inhabite Anxur: and had two acres of ground a peece allowed them. The yeare following was memorable in no respect, either of home

A home affaires or forraigne, in the time of P. Plantius Proculus, and P. Cornelius Scapula Consuls. Onely this fell out that yeare, that in Fregellæ (which sometime was in the territorie of the Sidicines, and after, of the Volscians) there was a Colonie planted: and unto the people there was given a dole, or distribution of raw fleish amongst them, by Marcus Flavius, at the funerall of his mother. Some there were that thought, how under a colour of honouring his mother, he defraied and paid unto the people a deserved hire and reward, in that when he was by the Ædiles arrested and brought to his answer for adulterie committed with a dame or married wife in the citie, the people had by their voices acquit him. This dole given for a favour past at his triall, was the occasion also of a dignitie following: for in the next Election notwithstanding he were absent, he was preferred to the Tribuneship of the Commons, even before those competitors that were present in place.

B There stood sometime the citie Palæopolis, not farre from thence where as now Naples standeth. In those two cities, one and the same people inhabited, descended and deriving their beginning from Cumæ, & the Cumanes fetch their offspring from Chalcis in Eubœa. With that fleet wherein they sailed from their owne countrey, they were able to doe much at sea, and were mightie upon those coasts where they dwelt. And first landing in the llands Ænaria & Pitheculus, afterwards they adventured to seat themselves in the maine and continent. This citie relying and trusting in their owne power, as well as presuming upon the faithlesse and disloyall societie of the Samnites with the Romans, or bearing themselves bold upon the rumor that ran of a pestilence that reigned in the citie of Rome, wrought much mischief and hostilitie against such Romanes as inhabited the Campaine and Falerne countries. Whereupon, when as (in the time of Lucius Cornelius Lentulus, and Quintus Publius Philo Consuls, the second time) there were Ædiles sent to Palæopolis, for to demaund restitution againe, and a proud answer returned backe from the Greekes, a Nation more stout and valiant in tongue than in deed and execution; by the authoritie of the Senate, the people decreed, that there should be warre made upon the Palæopolitans. And when as the Consuls had divided their Provinces betwene themselves, it fell to Publius his turne to warre upon those Greekes. Cornelius with another armie was opposed against the Samnites, if they should happen to stirre any way. For the report went, that they looking and expecting assuredly the revolt of the Campanians, would encampe neerer and joinewith them. There, Cornelius thought it best to keepe a standing campe. The Senat was certified from both Consuls, That they had small hope of peace with the Samnites. Publius gave intelligence, that two thousand Nolane souldiours, and foure thousand Samnites, were rather by the compulsion and importunitie of the Nolanes, than with the good will of the Greekes, received at Palæopolis. At Rome it was for certaine knowne, that in Samnium there were new musters taken by the Magistrates direction, and that the whole countrey, and the people adjoining, were raised, & out in armes. Moreover, That the Privernates, Fundanes, and Formians were without all dissimulation solicited and moved to rebell. Upon which causes, it was advised by the Senat, first to send Embassadors to the Samnites, before they made warre: and from them they had an insolent answer. And they themselves made quarrell, and charged the Romanes with wrongs offered first: and nevertheless they justified themselves for any thing by them done, and answered all objections that were laid against them full stoutly. Namely, that the Greekes were not aided by any publicke counsell or order of theirs, nor yet were the Fundanes and Formians by them solicited, as who need not to be ashamed of their owne power, but thought themselves sufficient enough to warre if they listed. Thus much moreover, they could not dissimule, but speake it out in plaine tearmes, That the Nation and State of the Samnites take it in illpart, that the people of Rome had reedified & repaired Fregellæ, a town by them conquered, and woon from the Volscians, and by them laid ruinate: and not onely so, but they had placed a colonie also in the Samnites countrey, which the inhabitants called Fregellæ. Which contumelie and reprochfull injurie, unlesse they that were the authors thereof would do their best to abolish and cancell, they would with all their might and maine repell it from them. And when as the Romane Embassador made a motion, and would have had them to put the matter for to be decided unto the common confederates and friends of both parties; What double and indirect dealing is this (quoth the Samnites?) What frapling is here to no purpose? As for the quarrels and differences betwene us (o yee Romanes) neither the babling words of Embassadors, nor yet any daies-man or arbitrator, but the very Campaine field, wherein wee must encounter counter in earnest, even dint of sword, and the speares point, and the doubtfull chaunce of G battaile, shall determine. And therefore encampe we betwene Capua and Sueffula, in the sight one of another, and let us then trie the issue, whether Samnite or Romane shall be lord of Italie.

The Embassadors of Rome made answer, that they were not to go whether the enimie called them, but whether their Generall and Captaines led them. In this meane while Publius had alreadie gotten a convenient peece of ground betwene Palapolis and Naples, and thereby enpeached the enemies of the mutuall entercourse of succours from the one to the other, which they had used reciprocally, as either place had need, and was distressed. Therefore, when as the time of Election of Magistrates at Rome drew on apace, and expedient it was not for the Commonweale, that Publius (now approaching neer the enemies wals, and readie to assault) should be called away from the hope which daily hee had of winning the citie; the Tribunes were dealt H with. II, to propose an Act unto the people, That when the time of Pub. Philo his Consulship should be expired, he might in qualitie and name of Proconsull, remaine in government, untill the warre with the Greekes were fully ended. And unto L. Cornelius were letters sent, implying thus much, That whereas it was not thought good, that hee now being entered into Samnium, should be called away from the cheefe path of the warre, he should nominate a Dictator to bee President of the Election of Magistrates: Who named M. Claudius Marcellus, and by him was appointed for Generall of horse Sp. Posthumus. Yet for all this, was no assemblie for the said Election, holden by the Dictator. For it came in question, Whether hee were rightly created or no.
And the Augurs being hereabout consulted with, pronounced, that the Dictatour seemed not created aright. But the Tribunes discredited and made suspicious and infamous, by their accusation speeches, this their sentence and declaration, saying, That neither it was easie to know the fault and error in the creation, seeing that the Consull nominated the Dictator in the beginning of the still night, neither had the Consull written to any man publickely or privately thereof, nor yet was there any person could come forth and say, that he either saw or heard ought, that might marre and interrupt the Auspices, neyer could the Augurs sitting at Rome, ascered and divine, what error had happened to the Consull in the campe so farre off. And who saw not (say they) that the Augurs found fault herewith, because the Dictator Elect, was a Commoner? These and other such allegations were (to no purpose) by the Tribunes given out. For the matter grew to an Interreigne, and the foresaid Election being still put off and adjourned for one cause or other, at length the foureteenth Interregent, L. Aemilius, created Consuls, C. Petilius, and L. Papirius, surnamed Mazilianus or Cursus, as I find in other Chronicles.

In that yeare it was recorded, that the citie Alexandria in Ægypt was founded: and that Alexander the King of Epirus was murdered by a certaine Lucane, a banished person, to verifie the Oracle of inp. Dodoneus, which had foretold his death. For when he was sent for into Italie by the Tarentines, he had warning given him, To take heede of the Acherusian water, and the cittie Pandosia, for there it was his destinie to end his daies: and therefore, with more speede he passed over into Italie, to be as far off as might be, from the citie Pandosia in Epirus, and the river Acheron; which issuing out of Molossis into the lower Meeres and Lakes, dischargeth it selfe, and falleth into the Thesprotian gulfes. Howbeit (as commonly it is seene when men seeke most to flie and avoid their fatall death, they run headlong and plunge themselves into it) he, having oftentimes vanquished and overthrowne the legions of the Brutians and Lucanes; woon by force Heraclea a Colonie of the Tarentines, and Consentia in Lucania, and Sipontum, and also Acerina a Colonie of the Brutians, & other citties afterwards of the Messapians and Lucanes: sent into Epirus three hundred noble houses and families, whom he meant to keepe as hostages: he encamped not farre from Pandosia, a citie situate neer to the confines of the Lucanes and Brutians. And there he held three hills somewhat distant asunder, from whence hee might make excursions and rodes into every part of his enemies countrie: and he had in ordinat about him almost 200. banished men of the Lucanes, for his sure trustie guard: who notwithstanding (as the nature is of such for the most part) charged with every winde, and carried mutable minds according to the varietie of fortune. Now it tell out so, that the continuall raines which overflowed all the fields, had foreclosed and stopped the passages three waies betwene his armies, so as they could not help one another: wherby those two garrisons where the King was not in person, were surprized by the unexpected coming of the enemies: who having put them al to the sword, turned their whole forces to besiege the King.
From

A From whence, there were by the Lucane exiles, messengers sent to their own countymen: who in the name of the rest capitulated, that if they might be restored againe, they would deliver the K. either dead or alive into their hands. Howbeit he himselfe with an elect number of men, made a noble and hardie adventure, and brake through the midst of the enemies: and encounting the chiefe Commander of the Lucanes hand to hand, killed him outright: and having rallied his men neare together, who were scattered asunder in fight, he came at length to a river, which by the fresh ruines of a broken bridge, that the violence of the water had borne downe, shewed passage. Which as the armie passed over at an unknowne and blinde foord, one souldior wearied with feare and travaile, cursing and detesting the unluckie and abominable name of the river, fortuned to say, Thou hast not thy name * Acheros for nought: which word when it came once to the King his eare, he presently began to thinke and muse of his finall end; and there staid stil, in a deepe suspence whether he should passe over or no. Then Scipius, one of the Kings servitors and Henxmen, asked him why he lingered and made delay, being in so great a perill and jeopardie as he was? and shewed him withall, how the Lucanes intended to plaie false with him, and sought opportunitie to forelay and doe him a mischief. With that the King looked behinde him, and espied them a far off in a troupe comming against him: wherupon he drew his sword, put his horse to it, tooke the river, and rode through the midst thereof: and when he was now so far passed that he was readie to take the land, one of those banisht Lucanes launced a dart a loose at him and strake him quite through. Whereupon he fell downe dead with the dart sticking in his bodie, and the streame carried it downe as farre as to the corps de guard of the enemies. Where his breathlesse corps was shamefully misused and mangled. For they having cut it crosse the middle, sent the one halfe to * Consentia, and kept the other with themselves still, to practise a thousand villanies upon it. And as they shot and flung stones at it a far off, a certaine woman being amongst this outrageous multitude (faring beyond all measure of anger and malice that mans heart can devise or beleve) after she had besought them to forbear a while, with her cies gushing out tears said unto them, That her husband and children were prisoners, and in the hands of the enemies: but she hoped with the Kings bodie, howsoever it were abused & martured, to redeeme them againe. This staid them from farther mangling thereof: Thus all that was left of the Kings bodie, by the meanes of one onely woman, was burnt at Consentia: and his bones sent back afterwards to the enemies unto * Metapontum, and from thence conveyed to D Epeirus, unto Cleopatra his wife, and his sister Olympias, whereof the one was sister, the other mother to Alexander the Great. Thus much concerning the wofull and unhappy end of Alexander the K. of * Epeirus. Whose fortune albeit was such, that he came short, & was cut off before he intermeddled in the Romane war, yet because he warred in Italie, let it suffice that briefly by the way I have touched his storie.

The same yeare was there a Lectisterne at Rome, (which was the fift after the foundation and building of that citie) for the pacifying of the same gods as heretofore. Afterwards, the new Consuls by the ordinance and direction of the people, sent defiance and proclaimed war against the Samnites. And as they themselves made greater preparation every way than against the Greekes, so they had besides new aides, whereof (as then) they least thought of. The Lucanes and the E Apulians (nations which to that day had no dealing nor commerce at all with the Romanes) became their liege & loyal Allies, offering men & munition toward that war. Wherupon they were by forme of covenant and league interteined and received into their amitie. At the same time also the Romanes had good successe in the Samnits quarters: for three townes there, yielded unto them, and they became Masters thereof, to wit, Allife, Callife, Ruffrium: all the territorie besides at the first coming of the Consull, was pilld and spoiled far and neare. These exploits thus prosperously achieved, the other enterprise also of besieging the Greekes, was well followed and at the point of an end. For over and besides, that by certaine skonces and bloccuzes betweene the enemies fortes and forces, one part was cut from the other; they endured also within their own wals, much more miserie and calamitie, than the enimie menaced & threatened without: and as if they had been captives to their owne garrison souldiors, whom they had called to them for their defence, they suffered infinite villanies, and indignities, in the persons as well of their wives as of their children, and even the hardest extremities, that follow upon citties forced by the enimie. And therefore when it was noised abroad, that there were new succours comming from Tarentum and the Samnites: they supposed that for Samnites, these were alreadie

Lucanes, together with the Tarentines the hatchers thereof, held the Senators of Rome in care and perplexitie ynough: behold over and above all these, the Vestine people, as a surcrease to their troubles, joined and banded with the Samnites. Which new occurrence, as, for that yeare it rather maintained discourse amongst men in their ordinarie talke every where, than ministered cause of serious debating in publicke councell; so the Consuls of the yeare following, L. Furius Camillus the second time, and Jun. Brutus Scaeva, thought no one thing more important than it, and needfull to be treated of in the Senate, with the first. And albeit the thing were but new, and a breeding, yet so greatly were the L.L. hereabout troubled, that they feared no lesse to begin to take it in hand, than to neglect it altogether, & not to see it: doubting, least if they were let go unpunished, the neighbour nations would grow too lustie and proud: and again, if they seemed to chastice them by warre, the rest for feare of the like measure, might bee provoked to anger, take armes, & enter into a generall rebellion. And all, and every one of them, namely, the Marsi, the Pelignians and Marucines, were in feare of armes comparable and egall to the Samnites every way: which nations they might be sure to have their enemies, if they medled with the Vestines, and touched them once never so little. Howbeit, that part prevailed and took place, which for the present, seemed to carrie more courage and valour, than sage advice and wisdom: but the issue and event shewed, that Fortune favoureth Fortitude. So the people by authoritie and direction of the Nobles, decreed warre against the Vestines: the charge whereof light by lot upon Brutus, and Samnium fell to Camillus. To both places were the armies conducted: and by the care and industrie employed in the defence of the marches and frontiers, the enemies were empeached for joining their forces together. Howbeit the Consull Furius Camillus, who had the greater and weightier charge laid upon him, fortun'd to fall greivously sicke, and thereby could not follow the warres: who being commaunded to nominate a Dictatour, for to manage and conduct his affaires, declared the noblest warrior in those daies, L. Papyrius Cursor: by whome Q. Fabius Rutilianus was named Generall of horsemen, a couple certes, of great name and highly renowned for their worthie acts, atcheev'd in this their government; but yet more famous and voiced abroad, by reason of variance and discord which fell betweene them; whereby they grew weleare to the utmost tearmes of contesting one another in all extremitie. The other Consull warred with the Vestines many and sundrie waies, but evermore with like fortune and happie successe. For hee forraied and wasted their countrie: and by pilling, rising, and burning their houses & corn, forced them against their wils into the field: and in one battell so enfeebled and abated the forces of the Vestines (but not without bloudhead of his owne men) that his enemies not onely fled into their campe; but also as not trusting now to their rampiers and trenches, they were constrained to steale away into their townes, minding for to save themselves, as well by the naturall situation of the places, as the strength of their good wals. In the end, he made assault upon those walled cities, purposing by force to win them. And first he gained Cutina by the skalade, either through the exceeding courage of his soldiours, or their anger, being so chafed as they were at their hurts received: for that scarcely one escaped out of the medley and skirmish, clear and not wounded. Then he likewise took Cingilia: and gave the pillage of both cities among his soldiours. Neither gates nor wals could stand in their way and keepe them out. But into Samnium the journey was undertaken by the Dictatour with doubtful Auspices and uncertaine knowledge of the will of the gods. The default and terror whereof tooke not effect in the maine event and issue of the war, (for it was prosperous and fortunate) but turned to the rage and anger of the chiefe leaders, who fell out deadly one with another. For Papyrius the Dictatour, advised by the Pullarius that had the custodie & charge of the sacred Pullets went back to Rome to take the Auspicium, or the presage by the bird-flight again: and straightly charged his Generall of horse to keepe himselfe close within his hold, and in no wise to give the enemies battel during his absence. But Fabius after the Dictatours departure, advertised by the espials, that the enemies were even as carelesse, as loose and disordered, as if there had been no Romane in Samnium; whether it were, that being a stout and lustie young gentleman, he tooke foule skome and thought it an indignitie, that all should seeme to rest in the Dictatour onely: or that he was inducd with the good opportunitie of doing some brave exploit (I wot not:) but he went forth with an armie in order of battaile, to Irbrinium (that was the places name) and there fought a field with the Samnites. But such was the happie issue of this battaile, that if the Dictatour himselfe had been there in person, he could not have been better managed. For, neither captaine failed

A failed his soldiours, nor soldiours their captaine. The horsemen also under the leading of L. Camillus a Colonell by his place, (who sundrie times charged and recharged againe, and could not with force breake the enemies arraies) unbridled their horses, and so ran them all on the spur, that no strength was able to abide them: such an havocke, such a lane made they all about over armour and men. The footmen seconding this hot charge of the horse, advanced the ensignes against the enemies thus put in disaray: and twentie thousand men (by report) were that day slaine. In some authors I find, that twice in the Dictatours absence hee fought, and twice had the upper hand. But in the most ancient writers I read but of one battaile. In some Chronicles the whole matter is passed over and left out clean. The General of the horse having gained a mightie masse of spoile, as otherwise he could not chuse, upon so great a slaughter & massacre; gathered together into one heape all the enemies armour, made a fire under, & burned them; were it that he had made some such vow to one of the gods: or (as I list rather to beleeye) it was a motive of Fabius himselfe, that the Dictatour should not reape the fruit of his glorie, and entitle his name thereto; or in pompe carie those spoiles before him at his triumph. Moreover, the letters of this victorie by him sent to the Senat, and not a word thereof to the Dictatour, were some prooffe, that he was not willing to impart and communicate his praises with him. But certes, the Dictatour tooke the matter in so ill part, that when every man else was joyfull for this noble victorie achieved, he onely shewed anger and sadness in his verie countenance. Whereupon suddainly he dissolved the Senat, and departed in great hast out of the court, giving out and often repeating these words: Then hath the master of horsemen in deed as well everted and overthrown, both Dictatours Majestie and Militarie discipline, as defeated the Samnite legions; if he can so go cleere away and escape unpunished, with so manifest contempt of my expresse commaundement. Whereupon, full of threats and indignation, he hastened to the campe, and tooke long journeyes; yet could he not prevent the bruit of his coming. For, there were Vanturiers that posted from the citie before, to bring word that the Dictatour was coming, full of revenge, and set upon punishment, & at every second word almost, commending the late exemplarie justice of T. Ananias. Then Fabius immediately calling an audience, besought the soldiours, that with what valour and vertue they had defended the Commonwealth from most deadly and mortall enemies, with the same they would protect him from the outrageous crueltie of the Dictatour, himselfe (I say) by whose conduct and fortune they had gotten so glorious a victorie. For now, comming heis (qd. he) for envie out of his right wits, and beside himselfe: for anger at another mans manhood and felicitie, furious and horse-mad: and all is no more but this, that in his absence, as forsooth we have sped well; who wisheth rather in his hart, if he could change the course of fortune, that the Samnites had won the victorie than the Romans: & nothing is so rise in his mouth, as, That his commandement was contemned: as who would say, he forbad not battaile with the same mind, wherein hee now greiveth that we have fought. For as then his will was good, even as for verie envie to hinder and suppress the proesse of another, and went about to take weapons away from most forward soldiours, desirous of fight, that in his absence they might not lay hand to their sword: so now, see how he fretteth and fumeth in great choler at this, that without L. Papyrius the soldiours were not disarmed, dismembred as it were, and maimed: and for that Q. Fabius forgot not his place, but bare himselfe as Generall of the Cavallerie, and not as a Henxman and follower of the Dictatour, standing at receit, & waiting at an inch when some under-captaine ship would fall, that he might step into the place. What would this man (thinke ye) have done, how would he have frowned, if (as the fortune and doubtfull chance of warre oftentimes goeth) we had been put to the worse and lost the day; who now that the enemies be vanquished, the field so well fought, the State so well served, as by the most singular captaine in the world, better it might not be, thus menaceth execution to me the Generall of the horse, even in the honour of my conquest? Neither is he (my masters) cruelly bent and set upon mischief against the Generall of the horse more than against the Colonels, the Centiniers, & common soldiours: nay, he would (be ye sure) if he had been able, have rag'd and fared as bitterly, yea and executed his yre and furious rage upon all. But because he cannot, now he dischargeth his gall upon me alone. For even as envie, like a flaming fire, searcth & mounteth up to the highest, so runneth he upon the chiefe captaine, and aimed at the head of this worthie exploit. If he had once extinguished him, together with the glorie of this brave service, then like a conquerour and lord over a poore captive armie, whatsoever he might by law execute against a Generall of the Cavallerie, he would would attempt and extend, upon the simple soldiours. Make reckoning therefore, that in standing G tall to me and in defence of my cause, yee uphold the libertie of all. For in case he shall perceive once, the same agreement of the armie in the maintenance of the victorie, which was wel seen in the batell, and that yeall have a care & regard of the life and safetie of one, his stomack wil come down, his heart will relent & incline to clemencie, and a milder sentence. To conclude; I recommend my life, & whole estate to your vertue & faithfull protection. Then from all parts of the audience they cried unto him aloud, & bad him take a good hartfor so long as the Legions of the Romans were safe, there should no person do him harm or injurie. Soon after came the Dictator, and presently by sound of trumpet summoned a generall assemblie. And the publike crier after an oiez made, called by name for Q. Fabius Generall of the horse. Who so soone as hee was come from a lower place where he was, and approached heer the Tribunall, (then qd. the Dictator) I demand of thee Q. Fabius, since that the rule of the Dictator is soveraine & highest above al others, H whereunto the Consuls, endued with kingly puissance and government, do obey, yea and Praetors created with the same authoritie that Consuls are; whether thou esteeme it meet and right, that a Generall of horse should bee obedient to his commaundement or no? I demaund likewise, whether I my selfe, knowing that I tooke my journey and went from home, with doubtfull and uncertaine Auspices, ought to have put the maine state of the Commonweale in hazard against the order and religious observation in that behalfe; and not rather, to go againe to take new Auspices, that I might adventure & attempt nothing so long as I stood in doubt of the grace and favour of the gods? And withall, this I demaund, whether the Generall of the horsemen could be freed, exempt, and discharged of that scruple of conscience, which checked and staid the Dictatour from execution of his charge? But what mean I to make these demands? I seeing that if I had departed without saying one word, yet thou shouldest have framed thy opinion and applied thy mind according to the interpretation of my will and pleasure? Why saiest thou nothing? Answer me I say. Forbad I thee not expressly, to do any thing in my absence? Forbad I not thee to fight with the enemies? How durst thou in contempt of my commaundement, whiles our Auspices were uncertaine, whiles our consciences were unresolved and with scruples troubled, against all Militarie customes & statutes against the discipline of our ancestors, and against the will & direction of the gods: how durst thou, I say, be so hardie as to encounter with the ene-mie? To these interrogatories make answer directly. Answer I charge thee, to all these points, and nothing but these, and at the perill of thy life, not a word besides. Now come Sergeant and doe thine office the while. To which severall articles, when Fabius could not readily answer point by point, one while complaining that he had him for his accuser, who was the judge of his life and death: otherwhiles crying out aloud, that sooner might his life be taken from him, than the glorie and honour of his acts: and as he justified and excused his own selfe, so he began againe to challenge and accuse [the Dictatour.] Then Papyrius being in more heate of choler than before, commanded the Generall of the horsemen to be stripped out of his clothes and uncased, and the rods and axes to bee brought forth readie. With that, Fabius calling earnestly for the helpe of the souldiours, whiles the officers were a tearing and renting his clothes from his backe, made meanes to retire himselfe into the ranks of the Triarii, who began already to make a mu-tinie and upore in the assemblie. From whence there arose an outcrie over all the audience. L Some were heard to intreat, others to threat. They who fortun'd to stand next to the Tribunall, because that being within the view and eie of the Dictator, they might be knowne and noted, be-tought his Majestie to spare and pardon the Generall of the horse, & not with him to condemne the whole armie. They that were furthest off in the skirt of the assembly, & especially that plump and companie about Fabius, rated and cried out upon such a rigorous and mercilesse Dictator.

And a little thing more would have made them mutinie: nay, within the very compasse of the Tribunall he was not cleare & quiet. The Lieutenants or Coronels of whole legions, standing about his seat or chaire of estate, intreated him to put off the matter untill the morrow: to give his choler some time to coole, and allow space and respite to consider of it with advise and counsell: saying, That if Fabius had plaid a youthfull part, he had paid sufficiently for it already, and his M victorie had received disgrace and dishonour enough. Beseeching him not to proceed to these extremities of utmost execution, nor to set such a brand and note of ignominie & shame upon the young Gentleman himselfe, so rare and gallant a Knight; or on his father, a most honourable and excellent personage; ney upon the noble house and name of the Fabij. But when they

A they saw how little they prevailed by their prayers, and as little by any reasons they could allage; then, they admonished him to have a regard to the furious assemblie, of the souldiours: and that it was not for a man of his years and wisdom, thus to put more fire to the hoat stomacke of sol-diours enkindled already, nor to minister more matter of mutinie: and if such a thing should happen, no man would impute the blame to Q. Fabius, who fought and humbly craved pardon of punishment, but to the Dictator; if he overcome with choler, should blindly so far passe himselfe in wilfull peevishnesse, as to provoke the outrageous multitude against himselfe. Finally, that he should not thinke, how they laboured thus for any affection at favour they bare to Quintus Fabius; but were readie to take an oath, that they thought it not safe for the State and Common-weale, that he should proceed at such a time, to execute the rigour of Justice upon Q. Fabius. By these and such like remonstrances, when as the Lieutenants had stirred up the Dictator his blood against themselves, rather than pacified his moode against Fabius, they were commanded to go down from the Tribunall. And when as the Crier had assaid to make silence al in vaine, for that by reason of the noise and tumult, neither the Dictator his voice, nor any of his apparitors & halbards about him, could be heard, the night came upon them and ended the hurley and garboile, as if it had been a battaile in field. The Generall of the horse was commanded to appeare on the morrow. Now when as every man gave it out and avouched unto him, that Papyrius would proceed more vehemently, for that contesting of the Lieutenants, and that the more hee was dealt withall, the worse hee was: Fabius privily stole out of the campe and fled to Rome. And by the meanes of his father M. Fabius, a man who had been already thrice Consull and Dictatour, the Senate was called together immediately. And as he was in the midst of his grievous complaints before the Lords, touching the violence and wrong of the Dictatour, all of a sodaine, there was heard before the Councell house dore, a great noise & hurrying of the Dictours, whiles they made way and voided the preasse. And no mervail; for the Dictatour himselfe was come with a revenging mind. For so soone as he had heard how Fabius was departed out of the campe, he followed after with his light horsemen. Then began the broile to bee renued afresh, and Papyrius caused Fabius to be attached. Whereupon the chiefe of the Nobilitie, and the whole bodie of the Senat began to interpose themselves by way of mediation: but all their intreatie notwithstanding, he persisted still in his implacable anger. Then stept forth M. Fabius the father. For as much as (qd. he) neither the authoritie of the Senat, nor mine old age, whom you seeke to make childlesse, ne yet the valiancie & noble courage of the Generall of horse, by your own selfe chosen and nominated, can prevaile; nor any humble prayers, which are able to appease the furie of the enemy oftentimes, yea and to pacifie the wrath & indignation of the Gods: I implore the lawfull helpe of the Tribunes, and to the whole bodie of the people I appeale. And since that you challenge and except against the judgment of your own armie, and of the Senat, I offer and present unto you that judge, who onely is of more force and puissance, I am sure, than your Dictatourship. I will see, whether you will yeeld to this appeale, whereunto the Romane King Tull. Hostilius gave place. Then out of the Councell house they went straight to the Common place of audience: and when the Dictatour, attended with some few, was ascended up, and the Generall of the Cavallerie accompanied with all the whole troupe of the chiefe of the citie, Papyrius commanded that he should come downe or els be fetched, from the Ro-stra, unto the lower ground. The father followed after him. Well done (quoth he) in commanding us to be brought hither, from whence we may be allowed to speake our mindes, if we were no better than privat persons. At the first there passed no continued speeches so much, as wrangling and altercation. But afterwards, the voice and indignation of old Fabius, surmounted and drowned the other noise: who greatly blamed and cried out upon the pride and crueltie of Pa-pyrius. What man (quoth he) I have been also a Dictator of Rome my selfe, and yet was there never so much as a poore Commoner, no Centurion, nor souldiour hardly entreated or misfused by me. But Papyrius seeketh victorie and triumph over a Romane Grand-Captaine and Generall, as over the Leaders and Commanders of his enemies. See, see, what difference there is between the government of men in old time, and this new pride and crueltie of late daies. Quintius Cincinnatus a Dictatour for the time, proceeded no farther in punishment against Minutius, when he was faine to deliver him lying enclosed and besieged within his own campe, but to leave him as a Lieutenant in steed of Consull, in the armie whereof he had charge. M. Furius Camillus, not only for the present tempered his choler toward L. Furius, who in contempt of his old age and authoritie, had fought most untowardly and with dishonour in the ende; and wrote nothing to the people or the Senat but well, of his Colleague: but also being returned, made a speciall reckoning of him above all the Tribunes consular, whom also of all his colleagues, when as hee had the choise granted him by the Senate, he elected to be his coadjutor in the charge of his government. Neither the people verely, whose power is soveraigne over all, were ever more angrie against those, that through rashnes and want of skill lost whole armies, than to fine them at a summe of money. For the losse and miscarriage of any battaile, that a Generall should be brought into question and answer for his life, was never heard of to this daie. And now, rods and axes, whipping and beheading, are prepared for the Commaunders under the people of Rome, and those, who are conquerours and have deserved most justly triumphs; which by no law can be offered to those that have been vanquished. What els I pray you should my sonne have endured, if he had beafully suffered the field to be lost and his armie withall? If he had been discomfited, put to flight, and driven cleane out of the field, how far forth further would the Dictatour his yre and violence have proceeded, than to scourge and kill? And see how fit and seemly a thing it is that the citie for the victorie of Q. Fabius, should be in joy, in processions to the gods, and thanksgivings, with congratulation & feasting one another: and he himselfe by whose meanes the temples stand open, the altars smooke with incense and sacrifice, and are heaped up againe with vowes, oblations, and offerings, to be stripped naked, to be whipped and tewed in the sight of the people of Rome, looking up to the Capitoll and the Castle, lifting up his eyes to the gods, upon whom in two such noble battailes he called and invocated, not in vaine nor without good and happie successe? With what heart will the armie take this, which under his leading and conduct, and under his fortune, atchieved victorie? What lamentation will there bee in the Romane campe, and what rejoycing on the other side amongst the enemies? Thus fared the good olde father, thus pleaded hee by way of expostulation and complaint, calling upon God and man for helpe, and withall embraced his sonne in his armes, and shed many a teare. On the one side, there made with young Fabius, and tooke his part, the majestie and countenance of the Senat, the favour and love of the people, the assistance of the Tribunes, and the remembrance of the armie absent. On the other side were alledged against him by Papirius, the invincible government and Empire of the people of Rome, the discipline of warfare, the Dictators commandement (observed and revered at all times, no lesse than the Oracle and will of the gods) the severe edicts of Manlius, whose fatherly love and affection to his deare son was set behind the service and common good of the State. Also it was alledged, that the same exemplary justice, L. Brutus the first founder of the Romane libertie, executed in his two sons: and now, mild and kind fathers, indulgent and fond old men, in the case of contempt of other mens commandement, give libertie to youth, and pardon as a small matter, the overthrow of militarie discipline. Howbeit, he for his part would persist in his purpose still, nor remit one jot of condign punishment to him, who contrarie to his commaundement, and notwithstanding the trouble and confusion of religion, and the doubtfull Auspicia, had given battaile, saying, That as it was not in his power to abridge any jot the majestie of that State and Empire, for being everlasting: so, L. Papirius would diminish nought of the authoritie thereof, wishing, That neither the Tribunes puissance sacred and inviolable it selfe, should by their opposition and interposing of their negative voice, violate the Empire of Rome: nor that the people of Rome, should in him above all others abolish and extinguish both Dictatour and Dictatorship. Which if it did, the posteritie hereafter should lay the waite and blame (although in vaine) not in L. Papirius, but in the Tribunes, and the perverse judgement of the people: when as the Militarie discipline being once polluted and stained, neither soldiour would obey the Centurions commaundement, nor the Centurion the Colonels, nor Colonell the lieutenants, nor lieutenant the Consuls, nor yet Generall of horse, the Dictatour: whiles no man hath regard and reverence either of men, or of gods; no Edicts of Dictator, no sight of birds observed; but that without passport, the souldiours may wander and rogue, either in their own ground or the enemies land, and unbindfull of their sacred militarie oth, may casle and discharge themselves from souldierie, through a licentious libertie of their owne, whensoever they list; leaving their ensignes and colours not attended, not meeting at summons, not repairing to the Rendez-vous, according to proclamation: without all discretion, making no difference whether they skirmish by day or night, on even ground or uneven, with vantage or disadvantage, with direction of capitaine, or without observing

A ving no signals and watchword, no array. In summe, the whole course of militarie service henceforth, blind, rash, and inconsiderate, after the guise of robbing, to stand and goe currant for solemne and sacred warfare. With these crimes and absurd inconveniences (O yee Tribunes) charged you must be to the worlds end: lay down you must, & gage your own lives for the audacious disobedience of Q. Fabius, for whom ye are now answerable. The Trib. were astonished hereat, and for themselves now, rather carefull and perplexed, than for him who had recourse unto them for refuge & succor. But the generall consent of the people of Rome, turning to praier and intreatie, eased them of this heave load and burden: and with one voice humbly besought the Dictator, to remit the punishment of the Generall of horse, for their sake. The Tribunes also, seeing that was the way, and all enclining and growing to Petition, followed after, and did the semblable; earnestly beseeching the Dictatour to forgive this humane fragilitie, and youthfull folly of Q.
Fabius, saying, That he had suffered chastisement ynough. Then the young man himselfe, then his father M. Fabius, forgetting all strife, and laying aside debate, fell downe at the Dictator his feet, and besought him to appeale his wrathfull displeasure. Hereupon the Dictator after silence made, Yea marie (quoth he) O Quirites, this I like well, and thus it should be: now hath militarie discipline got the victorie, now hath the majestie of your Empire prevailed indeed, which lay both a bleeding, and were in hazard to have been abolished and overthrowne for ever, after this day. Q. Fabius is not acquit of his offence, in that he fought against his soveraigns commaun-dement: but being thereof convicted and cast, is forgiven, nay is given rather to the people of Rome and the Tribunes power, whose assistance and helpe is graunted for their instant praiers, C and not of dutie. Well Rise up Q. Fabius and live, a more happie man for this agreement of the citie in thy defence, than for that victorie, upon which erewhile thou barest thy selfe so bravely.
 Live (I say) thou that hast been so bold to commit that fact, which thine owne father here, if hee had been in L. Papirius his place, would never have pardoned. And as for mee, into my grace and favour thou maiest come againe, at thine owne will and pleasure: But to the people of Rome, to whom thou art beholden and obliged for thy life, thou shalt performe no greater du-tie and service, than that the example of this daies work may be a teaching & warning to thee for ever, to obey, as well in warre as in peace, all lawfull hefts of superiour Magistrates. After that hee had pronounced the pardon of the Generall of horse, and discharged him of the court, and was departed himselfe out of the common place of audience: the Senat joyfull and highly contented, and the people much more, came all about them, and on the one side bidding joy to the D Generall of the horse aforesaid, and on the other side giving thanks to the Dictatour, followed after, and accompanied them both: and it was generally thought, that militarie government was no lesse confirmed and established by this perill and daunger onely of young Q. Fabius, than by the late pittious execution of young Manlius.

By chance that yeare it so fell out, that as often as the Dictatour absented himselfe from the armie, so often the enemies rose and raised troubles in Samnium. Howbeit, the fresh example of Q. Fabius was ever in the eye of M. Valerius, Lieutenant Generall and governour of the campe, who feared as well the dread wrath of the Dictator, as any violent attempts of his enemies whatsoever. In so much, as when purveious for come being entrapped by an ambush were slaine, in a E place of disadvantage; commonly it was thought and beleevied, that they might have beene by the Lieutenant rescued and saved, but for feare of these rigorous and terrible edicts. For anger hereof, the Dictatour lost the hearts of the souldiours, who were already discontent, for that he was so inexorable in the cause of Q. Fabius, and had denied them that, at their instant intreatie, which afterwards hee yielded unto and pardoned, at the suit and request of the people of Rome. The Dictator, after that he had left for the government of the citie L. Papirius Crassus the Generall of horse, discharged Q. Fabius, and forbidden him to administer any thing by vertue of that office, returned into the campe. Whose coming was neither very welcome and joyfull to his owne countrymen the souldiours, nor yet stricke any terror in his enemies the Samnites.
 For, the next morning, were it, that they knew not that the Dictatour was come, or little cared and F weighed whether he were present or absent, they approached the campe in order of battaile. Howbeit, that one man, L. Papirius the Dictator, was of such valour and importance, that if the love of the souldiours had seconded the policie and sage conduct of their commander, the warre with Samnites had that day been quite dispatched and ended, past all peradventure; so skilfully set he the battaile in array, so warily chose he his ground of advantage, so strengthened hee the same

same with supplies out of the reregard, in all warlike skill and singular policie. But the souldiours G failed for their parts, and went coldly to their businesse, even of purpose, that the valiant & commendable parts of the captain might be discredited and depraved; and so the victorie was much hindered and impeached. Howbeit, many of the Samnites were slaine; and in exchange, as many of the Romanes hurt. But he like a wife and expert captaine, soon perceived, what was the cause that staid the victorie. He saw well ynough, that hee was to temper his own nature, and to allay that severitie of his, within mildnes & courtesie. And therefore, taking with him the Lieutenants, himselfe in person went about to visite the wounded souldiours, putting his head into their tents and cabbins, asking each one how they did; charged the Lieutenants, Colonels, Provost-Marschals, and other offices of the campe, to tend and looke unto the sicke souldiours, recommending their care unto them particularly by name. This being a thing in it selfe popular, hee handled and ordered with such dexteritie; that by curing their bodies, their minds also and hearts were much sooner gained and reconciled to their Generall. And nothing made more for the speedie recoverie of their health, than their thankfull acceptance of that care and diligence of his. VVhen he had thus refreshed and repaired his armie, hee encountred once againe the enemy with assured hope of himselfe and his souldiours, to obtaine a finall victorie; and so discomfited and put them to flight, that the Samnites after that day, durst never fight againe with the Dictator. Then the victorious armie marched, as any hope of bootie & pillage guided and directed them: and as they overran their enemies countrie, they found no force nor resistance, either in open shew, or covert ambush. This also encouraged them the more, and cheered their hearts, for that the Dictatour had by proclamation given away the whole spoile among the souldiours: I so that their privat gaine whet them on against their enemy, no lesse than the common anger and publicke quarrell. The Samnites tamed and subdued by these losses and overthrowes, sued to the Dictatour for peace: with whom they capitulated, and made offer to allow unto everie souldiour one liverye, and the full wages of one yeare. But being commaunded to goe to the Senate, they made answer, That they would accompanie the Dictatour, recommending and putting their cause and whole estate to his faithfull protection, to his vertue and goodnesse onely. Thus the armie was withdrawne from the Samnites, the Dictatour with triumph entred the citie: and when he would have resigned up the Dictatourship, the Senate ordained, That before hee gaue over, hee should create Consuls, So, C. Sulpitius Longus the second time, and Q. Aemilius Cretanus were elected.

The Samnites not having concluded peace, (for that they varied about the conditions, and were to treat farther thereupon) yet brought with them from the citie of Rome, truce for a year. VVhich they observed not faithfully: so loone were their stomackes up againe to make warre, after they had intelligence, that Papirius was out of government. VVhiles C. Sulpitius, and Q. Aemilius (or Aulus as some Chronicles have) were Consuls, besides the revolting of the Samnites, there arose a new warre also from the Apulians. Both waies was there a power sent. Sulpitius his lot was to go against the Samnites, and Aemilius against the Apulians. Some write, that upon the Apulians themselves no warre was made, but contrariwise, that the confederate States of that Nation were defended from the violence & wrongs of the Samnites. Howbeit, the low estate of the Samnites, at that time, hardly able to maintain and defend themselves, maketh it more likely and credible, that the Apulians, were not warred upon by them, but that the Romanes made war with both Nations at once. But no memorable act or exploit was there performed: onely the Apulian countrie, and Samnium was wasted: and the enemies no where at all to be found. But at Rome there happened a scare by night, which raised every man so suddainely out of their first sleepe, and so affrighted the citie, that presently at one instant the Capitoll and the Castle, the wals and gates were full of armed men. And when as from all places there was running, and crying al arme, the morrow morning at the breake of day, there appeared neither authour, nor cause of this feare.

The same yeare the Tuscules were judicially convented before the people of Rome by procelle, and that, by a law that Flavius preferred. This M. Flavius, Tribune of the Commons, exhibited a bill of enditement to the people that some punishment might be inflicted upon the Tuscules; For that through their assistance and counsell, the Veliternes and Privernates had taken armes against the people of Rome. The Tuscules with their wives & children resorted to Rome. VVhich multitude having changed their apparrell, & clad in poore array and habit, as prisoners

- A soners at the barre, went about from Tribe to Tribe, falling downe upon their knees to everie man. Whereupon, pitie prevailed more to obtaine pardon of punishment, than the goodnesse of their cause to the purging of their guilt. So all the Tribes except Pollia, disannulled and made void the enditement aforesaid. But the sentence of the Tribe Pollia was, That as many as were of age and undergrowne, to wit, fourteen yeare old & upward, should be skourged and put to death. Item, That their wives and children, by martiall law, should be sold in open port-sale. And for certaine it is reported, that the Tuscules tooke so deepe an anger against the authors of so hard a Censure and cruell doome, that they have caried it in mind even to our fathers daies. For in dispite thereof no candidate, or competitor for an office of the Tribe Pollia, was ever woont to get the voices of the Tribe Papyria. The yeare following, whiles Q. Fabius and L. Fabius were Consuls, A. Cornelius Arvina Dictatour, and M. Fabius Ambustus Generall of horse; B having taken a streighter levie of souldiours than ordinarie, for feare of a greater warre in Samnium (for it was reported that the whole manhood and floure of the youth were taken up and waged out of the countries adjoining) lead forth a goodly and puissant armie against the Samnites. But they pitched their camp so carelesly in the enemies ground, as if the enemy had been farre off: and the Samnite legions came on a suddaine so proudly, that they set forward the trench and rampier, and encamped close to the Corps de gard of the Romanes. Howbeit they night approached so fast, that they were hindred for assailing the campe: but they gaue it out plainly, they would do it the morrow after by day light. The Dictatour seeing that he must fight neerer than he expected or hoped, for feare lest the streightnes and disadvantage of the ground, C might prejudice and hinder the valliance of his souldiours, leaving fires thicke burning in the campe, for to disappoint the sight of the enemies, in the still night with silence leadeth forth his legions: but yet could he not for the neernes of their camp escape, but be espied of them. The horsemen forthwith followed upon them in the taile, and preased hard upon the armie in their march, yet in such sort, that before it was day, they would not fight, nay the verie footmen were not all yssued out of the campe before day light. At length when it was broad day, the horsemen adventured to charge upon the Romanes, and partly by playing upon the taile of the hindmost, and partly by skirmishing in places that were hard to be passed over, they hindered their march and kept them behind. In the meane while their Infanterie also overtook the Cavallerie, so as now the Samnites with all their forces came upon them. The Dictatour seeing he could not go farther without his great losse and disadvantage, commanded his men to fortifie even in D that very place where he stood: but for as much as the light horsemen of his enemies were overspread all about, they could not possibly go to provide stakes to make a parapet or rampier, nor begin to cast a trench. VVhen he perceived therefore that he neither could go forward, nor stay and fortifie, he removed all his baggage out of the ranges, and set his men in battaile array. The enemies doe the like, and were not behind either in courage or in forces. But this most of all heartened and encouraged them, for that they being ignorant that the occasion of the enemies retreat was the disadvantage and straightnes of the place, presumed that they did it upon feare; and therefore they in terrible manner followed after them, as if the Romanes had fled and beene affrighted. And even that for a good while held the fight in doubtfull balance, albeit the Samnites now a long time had not been used to abide so much as the first shout of the Roman armie when they give the charge. But verily that day, from the third houre unto the eight, E it is said that the battaile stood so equall and indifferent, that neither the shout and crie was redoubled, nor heard the second time, after it was once set up at the first buckeling: nor the ensignes were set forward, or withdrawne backward, but remained where they first were: ne yet of any part were they seene to retire or recule, but every man in his degree and place, bending forward and preasing with his shield, without breathing or looking backe, still fought a front: the same noise, one resolution to die or fight it out, and not to give over before utter wearines or darke night. Now began the strength of men to faile, now the speare point and edge of the sword, began to turne and loose their force, and now the captaines themselves were to seek for counsell and what to doe: By what time all at once the Samnites horsemen, hearing that the cariages of the Romanes with one onely Corner were gone a good way off from the armed souldiours, without any other guard and fortification; for greedinesse of spoile F set upon them. VVhich when a messenger in great hast and feare reported to the Dictatour, Let them alone (quoth hee) let them encomber themselves with the spoile, and spare not. Then came came others one after another, windlesse with running, crying out and saying, that all was gone: and that everie where the soldiours goods were rifled, ransacked and caried cleane away. Vherenpon he sent for the Generall of horsemen, See ye not (quoth hee) o M. Fabius, the battaile abandoned of our enemies Cavallerie? They stand still and are encombred and pestered with our cariages. Now therefore charge upon them, disbanded as they are, (which usually happeneth to any multitude, busie in pillage) find them you shall (no doubt) few on horsebacke, and as few with weapon in hand: and whiles they are loding their horses with spoile, kill them unarmed, and make it a bloodie bootie to them, and let them buie it full deely: as for me, let me alone with the charge of the legions and footmen; have you the honour of the horsemens service. Then the Cavallerie raunged into a Squadron, as exquisitely and skilfully as possibly might be, ran forcibly upon the enemies disarraied and clogged with carriage, beating them down, and making a miserable massacre of them in everie place. For being (as they were) among packs & fardels which they cast from them suddainly, & now lay against their feet to stumble on as they fled, and in the horses way, that were masked and affraid, they were not able well, either to flie or to fight, and so were slain. When as the enemies Cavallerie were thus defeated and well-neere all come to nought, then M. Fabius wheeling about his wings of horsemen, for to fetch a compasse, set upon the Infanterie at their backs: Vherupon arose a new fearfull crie, which caused the hearts of the Samnites to tremble and quake. The Dictator withall, seeing formost of the enemies fighting in the front, looking back ever & anone, their ensignes out of order, and all their battalions waving and floting to and fro, called hard upon his soldiours, & exhorted them to fight lustily: cried unto the Colonels, the sergeants of Bands and Caporals severally by name, to re-charge and renew the medley againe with him. Thus with a fresh and new shour, they advance the standerds, & set forward the ensignes: and the farther they march on, the more perceived they the enemies to be troubled, and in disaray. And now by this time, the horsemen also were within the sight of the formost in the vanguard: and Cornelius looking backe to the bands and companies of his footmen, making signe with hand and with voice as well as he could, shewed and made demonstration unto them, that they saw the guidons and targuets of their owne fellow horsemen. Which when they once heard, and saw withal, presently as if they had forgot the battaile which they endured almost a whole day, and felt no smart of their wounds, they bestirred themselves against the enemy as lustily, as if they had newly come out of their tents, fresh and in heart, and scene but now the signall, and heard the sound of trumpet, to a battaile. Now were the Samnites no longer able to sustain the terror of the horsemen behind, & the violence of the footmen before: but were either slaine in the mids between, or skattered abroad in flight. Such as staied and were environed about, the footmen slew: those who fled, were trodden under the horse feet and killed: among whom, the Generall himselfe left his bodie on the earth. This battaile above all other, so quelled and daunted the hearts of the Sabines and crushed their forces, that in all their Diets and Councils they muttered and gave out, That it was no mervaile that they sped so ill, in all their affaires of armes, the quarrell was so bad and ungodly, and the warre begun so contrarie to a covenant of truce, and having the verie gods, and that justly, more against them and greater enemies than men: and that such a warre must needs cost some great overthrow, and might not be expiate without some notable satisfaction. Here onely was the difficultie and difference, whether vengeance and punishment should be taken of the guiltie blood of some fewe, or the guiltlesse blood of all. And even then, some there were, that durst nominate the very authors of this war. And one especially, to wit Brutulus Papius, whose name was by the common voice and consent heard above all the rest. A noble and mightie man he was, and without question, the principall breaker of this last truce. The Pretors being enforced therefore, to determine as touching him what was to be done; at length decreed, That Brutulus Papius should be delivered to the Romanes, and that together with him, all the Roman pillage and their prisoners should be sent to Rome: and that of all the goods, unto which according to the covenant and composition, the Feccials laid claime, there should, according to right and equitie, restitution be made. Then were the Heraulds, by vertue of the decree, sent to Rome, together with the dead corps of Brutulus: for he to avoid shame and punishment, wilfully killed himselfe. It was thought good, that with his bodie all his goods also, should be delivered. Howbeit none of all these things but only the captives, and whatsoever could justly be owned out of the bootie, was received: all the rest were offered, but in vain, for nothing was accepted.

The

- A The Dictator by vertue of an act of the Senat, triumphed. Some write that this war was fought by the Consuls, and that they triumphed over the Samnites: and that Fabius also went forward into Apulia, and from thence brought away great and rich prizes. But without all controversie A. Cornelius was Dictator that yeare: this onely was the doubt, whether he were created for the conduct of this war, or at the Romane games Circenses, (because L. Cautius happened to bee grievously sick) to give the signall when the chariots & steeds should be let out of the Barriers to run the race for their prize: & that having done that function of a charge (yvis not worth the remembrance) he should leave his Dictators place. It is not an easie thing to prefer either one matter, or one author before another. I suppose rather for my part, that the record and memoriall of these matters hath been depraved and corrupted, by these funerall Orations of praises, and by these counterfeit and false titles of images: whiles every house and familie draweth to it, the honour and renowne of noble exploits, martiall feats, and dignities, by any untruth and lie, so it be colourable. And hereupon, certes it is, that both the deeds of particular persons, and the public records and monuments of Actes, are confounded: neither is there extant any one writer, who lived in those daies, upon whom, as a true and certaine author, we might ground, and rest our selves.

- Two Veturius and Sp. Posthumius Consuls, having engaged their armie so far, within the Gullet or stright of Caudium, into a place of great disadvantage, that they had no means nor hope to get forth againe, fell to capitulation with the Samnites, and compounded with them: and after they had delivered unto them 600 Roman horsemen for hostages, they went away with the rest of the armie, but so, as they were forced all of them to passe shamefully under the gallows. The same Consuls (even by the motion of one of them, Sp. Posthumius, who persuaded the Senate, that by rendering of those into the enemies hands, through whose default so shamefull and ignominious covenant was concluded, the citie might be delivered and discharged of the promise given in the name thereof) with two Tribunes of the Commons, and as many besides as had subscribed to the foresaid accord and agreement, were sent, and yielded to the Samnites: but they might not be received. Not long after, Papirius sonne named Censor, defeated the Samnites, & put them likewise under the gallows: and recovered againe those 600 Roman horsemen as was said, that were left for hostages. By which means, the shame and disgrace of the former basefly Act was cancelled and abolished. Two Tribes were added to the rest, Vesentina and Falerina. New inhabitants were sent to people Stessa and Pontia. Ap. Claudius being Censor, brought a channell of water to the citie, called of his name Claudia: and paved the high way named after him likewise, Appia. He admitted also into the charge of Senators the sons of Libertines. But for as much as this state and degree of Citizens seemed as it were polluted with these unworthie persons among them, the Consuls of the yeare following, in the review of the Senators, and chusing new, held themselves to the order that other Consuls next before had observed. This booke containeth moreover the prosperous wars against the Apulians, Tuscanes, Umbrians, Masians, Pelignians, Aequians, and Samnites: with whom was renewed the ancient League and amitie. Flavius the Tribune or notarie, sonne of a Libertine or enfranchised Roman, was made Edile Curiule, by the faction of the base common people. Which faction, because it troubled and disquieted all the assemblies for Elections, and whole court in Mars field, wherein they have a great shoke and vuled all by means of might and strong hand, were by Q. Fabius the Censor, reduced into foure Tribes by themselves: which was the thing that purchased Fabius the surname of Maximus. [i. right. Great.]

The Oration of
C. Pontius to the Samnites.

After this yeare, immediately followed the peace made at Caudium, so memorable for the Romanes foile and misfortune, which happened in the Consulship of T. Peturinus Calvinus, and Sp. Posthumus. During which, the Samnites had for their Generall Conducker C. Pontius, the sonne of Herennius, a most prudent and politicke father, and was himselfe a worthy warrior, and a most excellent captain. This Pontius, after the Embassadours aforesaid (who had been sent to yeeld and deliver the goods) were returned home without peace concluded, spake thus in a frequent assemblie of the Samnites, and said: Maisters and friends, thinke never, but good there hath ben done in this voiage, and our Embassage hath taken some effect. For look what wrath the gods in heaven conceived against us, by our breach of covenant & truce, is thereby wholly satisfied, and fully done away. This I know assuredly, that the gods above (whose pleasure it was, that we should be driven to this neere point and hard exigent, as to render the goods claimed of us, by vertue of an accord and covenant) were nothing contented and pleased, that this our satisfaction and recompence for the breach thereof, was so proudly and disdainfully despised and rejected of the Romanes. For what could possible have ben done more, either to pacifie the gods, or to appease men, than that which we offered and performed? Whatsoever we won by way of hostilitie and spoile, from our enemies, and which by right of warre seemed to bee ours, wee sent backe againe: the counsellors and persuaders of taking armes, because wee could not find alive, wee delivered dead as they were: and their very goods also (because nothing might remaine with us, to bring us within the compasse of their guiltinesse) we brought to Rome. What owe I more to thee o Romane? what am I bound to performe besides, in regard either of covenant, or of the gods, the judges of the covenant? Whome shall I chuse and take for an indifferent arbitratour betweene thine anger and my punishment? No State and bodie of people in generall, no privat person in particular doe I refuse: and if no equitie and reason for the poore & needie, be reserved amongst men against the greater & more mightie, yet he will I, & have recourse to the gods, the revengers of such intollerable pride: and I will pray them to turn their anger upon those, whom neither restitution of their owne goods, nor the tendering of other mens withall to boot, will serve and content: whose fell crueltie, neither the death of the guiltie persons, nor the deliverie of dead bodies, neither the owners themselves yeelded, nor all they had in the world rendered with them, can satisfie: breefely, who may not possible bee appeased, without wee should part with our hart blood unto them, for to drink, and give our bowels & entrails to be torn in peeces. The war (o Samnites) is just and right on their behalfe, who have no way and meanes to avoid it: and ever lawfully take they armes, who have no other hope, but in force of armes. Since then, in all the affaires of this world, nothing is of more importance than this, That men weigh and consider, whether the gods be gracious or adverse unto their enterprises: be sure of this, that as wee made our former warre not so much against men as the gods; so, wee shall fight that which is now in hand, in the name of the gods, and under their conduct and guidance. Having spoken by way of prophesie these wordes, (which as they were right pleasant and plausible in the hearing, so they proved as true and were verified in the successe ensuing) he lead forth an armie into the field, and about Caudium he encamped himselfe, as covertly as he could. From thence, he sendeth to * Calatia (where he heard that the Romanes Consuls and their forces lay in camp) ten souldiours disguised in the habit of Heardmen, and commanded them to keep their cattell grazing apart, some in one place and some in another, but never farre from the Romanes fortes and guards: with this instruction, That when they hapned upon any of the Romanes foragers and vancouriers, they should agree all in one tale, and say, That the Samnite legions were in Apulia, besieging Luceria with all their forces, and were at the point of winning it by assault. This rumour also was for the nonce by others before, set abroad and spread of purpose, yea and came to the Romanes eares: but these captives made it sound more credible and like to be true, for this especially, that all their words agreed one with another. No man doubted but that the Romanes would aide the Lucerines, their good and faithfull Allies, and the rather for feare least all Apulia would upon this present trouble and fearfull example revolt, and band with the Samnites: and the onely thing they stood upon was this, Which way to go unto them. For twaine there were leading to Luceria; the one, broad & open, along the coast of the Adriatick sea: but as

* Calatia.

A it was the safer, so it was the farther about. Another shorter cut there was through the streights or gullet of * Caudium called Furcula Caudine. But the naturall situation of the place is thus: There are two deepe, narrow, and wooddie pases, or dales, one in the taile of the other, with continuall crestes and ridges of hils round about them: betweene them lieth enclosed in the middt, a good large plaine or meadowe, greene of grasse and full of waters, through the middt whereof, there lieth a direct passage. But before yee come to that greene; yee must enter into that first streight aforesaid, and returne againe either the same way that ye went in, or if yee proceed to go forward, ye must passe through another such passe or streight, but narrower and more comberfome than the other. Into that plaine aforesaid the Romanes marched downe with their armie another way, through an hollow rocke, but when they went on forth to the other B streight valley, they found it stopped and made up with the fall of trees, one crosse over another, and likewise with an huge heape of mightie stones, laied full against them in the way. And they had not so soone discovered this guilefull practise of their enemies, but they might deserie withall, a power of them also on the top of the hill. Then with all speed they secke to go back againe the same way they came; but it they found also dammed up in like fort, and beset with armed men. Whereupon they made a stand, without any mans commaundement: and as their minds were all amazed and astonied, so their bodies also were possessed as it were with a strange and extraordinarie nummednesse in their limmes: and whiles they looked one upon another, each man thinking his fellow to bee more wittie, and have better understanding than himselfe; for a good while they stood still, and said not a worde. But afterwards, when as they sawe the two Consuls pavillions a setting up, and some making readie things necessarie to fortification; although they saw well enough, that in this desperate case, past all hope of recoverie, for all the defences they could devise, they should but loose their time and travaile and proove foolles in the end: yet nevertheless, because they would not seeme to encrease their distressed fortune, and double it with their owne default and negligence, everie man what hee could, to his power, without the direction of any leader, settled himselfe to worke, and to fortifie along the water side their campe, with a trench and rampier. And besides the insolent and proud scoffing and derision of their enemies, everie man with pittifull confession scorned and checked his owne worke and travaile, as vaine, and to no purpose. As the Consuls then were pensive and discomforted, & called none about them to counsell, (for that in deed they supposed they were past all advice and helpe) the Lieutenants and Colonels came unto them of their selves unfeint for, and the soldiours turning to the Prætorium or Consuls Quarter, cried to their captaines for helpe and succour, which hardly the verie immortal gods could afford and give them. But they, rather made their mones and complaints one to another of their misfortune, than sat in sage counsell to give or take advice, until the night came upon them: whiles ech man according to his naturall humour and fancie, muttered diversly. One said, let vs breake though the stoppages opposed against us in the way: another, let us passe over the mountaines and woods before us, what way soever we may be able to carie armour; for so we get to the enemy once, whom we have almost for these thirtie yeares vanquished and chased before us; all will be plaine, even and easie unto us Romanes fighting against these faithlesse, perjured, & disloyall Samnites. Tush, saith another, whether should we go, or which way? What? Are we about to remove mountaines out of their places? So long as these tops of hils are over our heads, how will you possibly come to the enemy? Armed or unarmed, courageous or cowards, all is one, entrapped we are and undone everie one. Our enemy will not so much as offer us the sword, wheron we may die like men with honour: he will sit still and end this ware. Thus passed words too and fro, and thus passed the night away: unmindful were they of taking repast, never thought they of taking repose and sleep. The Samnites on the other side, in this so fortunate and happie opportunitie presented unto them, were as much to secke what to doe, and what course to chuse and follow. Whereupon, they all in generall were to dispatch letters to Herennius Pontius, the father of their Generall, and to know his opinion. Now this man beforetime, by reason of his great age, had given over not only Militarie affaires, but also all civile businesses: howbeit in that old crasie and spent bodie of his, he bare the fresh vigour of the mind and a pregnant wit to give counsell. When hee understood that the Romanes armie was shut up fast within the two forrests, at the Caudine Gullers, and that his advice was asked by his sonnes messenger: hee gave presently this counsell, That with all speed they should bee let goe from thence every one, with-

he mangled despiteously and cut in peeces; that every man forgetting his own estate, wherein he stood, turned away his eyes, as it were from an abominable spectacle, and could not indure to behold that disgracing & disfiguring of so great state and maiestie. The first that were put under the gallows, were the Coss. welneere halfe naked: and according to their degree and place, so was every one in order put to the shame: and afterward, the legions one after another. The enemies in their armor stood all the while about them, scorning, mocking, & making a game of them: many had swords and daggers set against their hearts, in menacing wise, some were hurt and stabbed to death, namely, such as with stern countenance and grim looks above the rest, for the indignitie of these things, offended the conqueror. Thus were they sent with shame inough under the gallows, and (that which was more grievous than the thing) even in the sight & view of their enemies, they were not so soon gotten out of the Forrest, but although they seemed but then as plucked out of dark hell to see the day, yet the very light it selfe was worse than all kind of deaths, when they beheld so ill favored an armie & unseemly. And therefore, albeit they might have reached to Capua before night, yet being doubtfull of the faithfulness and protection of their allies, or els disinclined for very shame, they cast their poore and filie bodies upon the ground, about the high waies not far from Capua. Whereof, when news came to Capua, the just & due pittie which they took of their allies, overcame the inbred arrogancie and pride of that people by kind. Immediately they sent unto the Coss. the ensignes & ornaments belonging to their place of authoritie, the liectors & serjeants with their rods, they sent armor and horses, apparell & victuall also for the soldiours bountifully: and as they came neer to Capua, the whole Senat and people went out to meet them, and performed all duties of kindnes & hospitalitie, both privat and publick, that could be devised, and as meet was and requisite. And yet neither the courteous usage, the pleasant countenances and lightsome speeches of their allies, could draw from them any words, no, nor so much as make them to hold up their heads and eyes, and to looke again upon their friends, when they yielded them all these comforts they could. So as, besides their greefe and sorrow of heart, a certaine bashfulness and shame forced them to shun all communication and conversing with men. The morrow after, when as certaine young gentlemen of the Nobilitie were returned, who had been sent in convoy from Capua, to accompanie them and bring them on their way, as farre as their liberties and confines; they were sent for into the Senate house, and being demaunded by the auncients and elders, what news they reported, that they seemed unto them much more heavie & cast downe than before, so silent and in manner dumbe, they marched along: that noble mind and courage of the Romanes was now mute and mum, their hearts cleane done and gone, together with their armour, not able to greet againe, no nor to give a word to those that saluted them, nor one of them for feare able to open his mouth, as if still they bare that yoke and gallows upon their neckes, under which they went. That the Samnites had indeed not onely a brave victorie, but also a perpetuall over them, and the hand of them for ever; and had now woon not Rome, as the Gauls aforetime, but also (which was a more hardie and warlike exploit) had conquered the Romanes courage, stoutnesse, and valour. As these newes were reported, and audience given thereto, with such assent, that every man lamented now the Romane name, as desperate; and concluded generally it was in the counsell of these their faithfull confederats, that they were past recovery; one Cassius Calavicus, the son of Ovius, a man right noblie borne, renowned for his valiant Acts, and besides, very grave and reverend for his age, spake by report in this manner and said, That he took the matter far otherwise than they all did: for that stubborn & resolute silence, (qd. he) those eyes fastened so wistly on the earth, those deafe ears to admit all solace & comfort, that shame of theirs to look up and behold the light, were expresse and certain tokens of them that tossed and rolled from the very root & bottome of their heart, a huge heap and masse of anger & despite. Either (qd. he) I know not the nature of the Romanes, or els that filenes & silence will shortly cost the Samnites, wofull cries & dolefull grones: and the remembrance of this Caudium accord, will be more heavie and dolourous a good deale to the Samnites than to the Romanes: for, as for them, they wil every man find their hearts and courages again, whersoever they shall hap to encounter; but the Samnites shall not meet every where with the Caudium streights for their purpose.

And now by this time was this shamefull overthrow and disgrace knowne at Rome. Intelligence they had before, how they were beset and enclosed about: but afterwards arrived a messenger with news more heavie and sorrowfull for that ignominious peace, than for any perill and danger otherwise. At the first noise and bruit that they were besieged, they began to misgust; but

after they heard, that they had so shamefully yeelded themselves, all that preparation of aid and succour was discharged and sent away: and presently without any order from publicke authoritie, they gave themselves every one to all manner of mourning and lamentation. The shops all about the market place were shut up. A generall vacation began of it selfe, and pleading in all courts ceased, before proclamation made: the purple and skarlet robes were left off, the golden rings laid away, and the whole cittie in a manner more sorrowfull and heavie, than the very armie. Neither were they angrie and offended with the captaines onely, with the authours of the peace, with the cautions and sureties for the same; but hated also the guiltlesse souldiours, denying flatly, that they were worthie to be received into cittie or house. Which heat of stomacke and wrathfull indignation, the first arrivall of the armie, utterly allaid, which even to angrie persons was pittifull and lamentable. For they returned not as men that escaped safe, alive, and unlooked for into their countrie, but like captives in habit and countenance; they entred late into the towne, and hid their heads, every man within his owne house: so as the morrow after, and for certaine daies following, none of them would come into the market place, nor put his head out at dores to looke into the streets. The Consuls likewise for their part, kept in as private men, and would exercise no function pertaining to their charge, but onely that which they were forced unto by an act of the Senate, namely, to nominate a Dictatour for to be President at the Election of Consuls. So, they elected Q. Fabius Ambustus for Dictatour, and P. Aelius Paetus, General of horse. Who being wrong created, and without the approbation of the Auspices, there were chosen in their roume, M. Aemilius Pappus for Dictatour, and L. Valerius Flaccus General of the horsemen, and yet by them was not the assemblie holden for the Election above said.

And for as much as the people were even wearie againe of all that yeares Magistrates, as unluckie and unfortunate, it grew at length to an Interregne. So Interregents there were, Q. Fabius Maximus, and M. Valerius Corvinus, who created Consuls, Q. Publius Philo, and L. Papyrius Cursor for the second time; with the whole consent, no doubt, of the cittie, for that in those daies there were not two more noble and renowned captaines to be found.

The same daie they were created, they entred their Magistracie (for so the LL. of the Council had decreed) and after certaine solemne and ordinarie actes of the Senat passed, they went in hand to consult about the treatie of the Caudine peace. And Publius, whose course it was then to have the sovereignty of rule, Spake (qd. he) Sp. Posthumius, to the matter propounded, and let us heare your opinion, and what you can say. Who after hee was risen and stood up, with the very same countenance and cheer that he went under the gallows; I am (not quoth he) o yee Consuls, ignorant, that I am first called forth, not for honour, but to my disgrace; and commanded to speake, not as a Senatour and Counciller, but as a man culpable and accused, both for an unfortunate warre administred, and a shamefull peace concluded. Howbeit, seeing that ye have not propounded and touched ought, concerning either our trespasse or our punishment, (setting apart all kind of excuse and defence, which would be no very hard matter to maintain, before men that are not ignorant of humane fortune, and of necessities, whereto men may be driven) I will in brieve deliver my mind concerning that, which you have moved and propounded. Which sentence of mine may sufficiently witness and testifie, whether I meant to spare mine owne life, or save your legions, when as I became bound to that dishonest or necessarie stipulation and promise, call it whether ye will. And yet, seeing it was made without the peoples privitie and grant, the State of Rome is not obliged thereto, and thereby nothing due to the Samnites but onely our bare bodies. Let us therefore be rendered by the hands of the Feciales and Heralds, in our shirts, and fast bound: let us deliver and rid the people of all scruple and trouble of conscience, if we have entangled them with any; that there be no let in lawe of God or man, but that both justly and lawfully ye may begin the war anew. In the meanwhile my mind and advise is, that the Consuls levie, enroll, arme, & lead forth an armie: but not to enter within the enemies marches, before all things duely belonging to the deliverie of us into their hands, be fully accomplished. Now, I pray and beseech yee, o immortall gods, that seeing it was not your good will and pleasure, that Sp. Posthumius and T. Veturius Consuls, should with fortunate conduct fight against the Samnites, yet yee would be satisfied herewith, That ye beheld us put under the gallows: that ye saw us obliged in an infamous and shamefull bond of covenant: that ye now view us naked and delivered bound into the enemies hands, readie to receive upon our heads even with the losse of our lives, all their anger, malice, & despight: and that it would please you,

The Oration of Sp. Posthumius late Consul in the Senat.

you, that the new Consuls and Legions of the Romanes, may in that fort war with the Samnits, G as evermore the wars before us Consuls have been conducted, managed, & performed. When he had spoken these words, all men both so wondered at this man and pitied him too, that one while they would not believe he was the same Sp. Posthumus, who had moved and persuaded so soule and dishonest a treatie of peace: otherwhiles they lamented that so brave and noble a personage, should suffer any especiall torment above other, at the enemies hands, for anger and despite of reversing and breach of that accord. When as now they all after singular praises of the man, condescended to his opinion; the Tribunes of the Com. L. Livius and Q. Melius, attempted for a while to oppose themselves against this proceeding: saying, That neither the people could be acquit and assailed in conscience, by their deliverie, unlessse every thing were againe restored to the Samnits, in the same estate wherein they stood at Caudium: nor they themselves (in that they subscribed and became bound for the accord of peace, to save the host of the people of Rome) had deserved any punishment: ne yet, last of all, ought they being sacred Magistrates and Inviolable, to be yeilded to the enemies, and expoed to any outrage and violence. Then (quoth Posthumus) in the meane while deliver us up that are but lay and profane men, whom with safe conscience and without offence ye may. And as for these, so sacro-saint as they now be, ye shall hereafter render them likewise, so soone as they are out of their charge. But if ye will be ruled by me, let them before they be thus yeilded, here in this common hall bee whipped and scourged, for the usury and interest of their punishment, which they would seeme to deferre and put off so long. For whereas they all eage and say, That by the deliverie and yeelding of us, the peoples consciences cannot be cleared and assailed; who is so ignorant in the Fecciales and Herauld's law, that knoweth not that these men spake this, for this end rather, that they themselves might not be rendered, than for that the truth requireth so. Neither doe I denie my Lords, that bare promises and stipulations are unviolable, and to be kept as well as covenants & obligations with those men, among whom both religion to godward, and faithfulnessse to men is in regarde and estimation: but I denie againe, that without the peoples assent & grant, any thing can be established good and effectually, to bind the people thereunto. What! if the Samnites, in the same pride and insolencie, wherein they obtruded and forced upon us this stipulation, yea and wrung it from us, would also have urged us to utter and speake, the solemne forme of words, which they use to doe that surrender up cities; would ye (my Masters that are Tribunes) infer and say, that by vertue thereof the people of Rome is surrendered into their hands? and that this citie, with the temples, chappels, limits, and waters, by strength thereof, are the Samnites possession? Well, I let passe to speake of dedition, because the matter in question is touching onely a stipulation.
on. What, I pray you, if we had promised and undertooke, that the people of Rome should forsake and abandon this citie? or set fire on it? or not have Magistrates, Senat, or lawes any longer? or to be governed againe by Kings? God forbid and forfend that, say you. Well, it is not the indignitie of things, that easeth the bond of Stipulation. If there be any one case, wherein the people may be obliged, then in truth may they be in all as well: neither skilleth it any whit, (whereat happily some will make a stay, and thinke it is materiall) whether Consull, Dictator, or Pretour, enter into bond and become suretie. And even this it was, that the Samnites themselves judged so to be, and stood upon: thinking it not sufficient, that the Consuls became bound, but they put the Lieutenants, the Treasurers, and the Colonels there, to the same. And now, let no man demand of me, why I entred so into stipulation, being a thing not incident to the Consull his charge and right, neither was I to undertake unto them peace, which was not in my power to effect: nor in your name to promise it, from whom I had no commission and warrant. Certes my Lords and Senators, there was nothing at Caudium done at all by mans pollicie and counsel. The immortall gods bereft both your Generals and the enemies too, of all their sense and understanding: for neither we, in the conduct and ordering of our service, stood warily enough upon our good guard: and they againe, as they gat the victorie full badly, so they lost it as lewdly: whiles they hardly trusted the strength of those places, by meanes of which they had gained the vantage and better hand of us: and while they made such hast, upon what agreement they cared not, to disarme men that are bom martial, & naturally made for wars. For, if they had been in their right wits, what an hard matter was it for them, in the time that they sent for olde aged men from their home, to come to Councell, for to have dispatched their Embassadors to Rome? and so to have dealt and treated with the Senat and people, about a perfect peace and finall

The Dedition of Sp. Posthumus.

A nall league in deed? It had been but three daies journey for men not encombred, but lightly appointed. All that meane while, there might have been truce, until the Embassadors from Rome, G had brought them either certaine victorie or assured peace. For that had been a covenant and stipulation good in law, the which we should have agreed unto, by warrant of the peoples wil and approbation. But ye would never have granted & allowed it: no more should we have entred into any such stipulation. Neither was it Gods will and providence, that there should be any other issue and end of things, than this: that both they, should vainly be deluded, and feed themselves as it were, with the fancie of a more joyfull dreame; than their mindes could well conceive and apprehend: and also that the same fortune, which had entangled, snared and brought into danger our armie, should losen the same, and rid it againe out of perill: that as their victo-B rie was frivolous and vaine, so a vainer and more frivolous peace, should make it frustrate and worth nothing: and that such a stipulation & promise should be interposed and come between, which might oblige and binde no person, but the very makers themselves. For what dealing hath there been with you my Lords of the Senat? or with the people of Rome? Who can challenge you? Who can call you into question? Who can come forth and complaine that he is by you deceived? enemy? or citizen? To enemy ye have passed no promise: citizen to undertake for you and in your name, ye commaunded none. Therefore yee have, nothing to doe to meddle with us, to whom ye gave nought in charge: and with the Samnites as little, with whom ye had no treatie at all. To the Samnites, wee are sufficient pledges enough, and answerable to performe that which is our own: for that, I say, which we are able to make good and yeeld; even our bodies and lives: C upon these let them exercise their rage, upon these let them whet their swords and their spightfull malice. And as for the Tribunes of Commons, consult ye together, whether they may be rendred presently, or ought to be reserved and put off to an other daie: let us in the meane time (o Peturius, and yee that are the rest) offer these wretched heads and lives of ours, like caitives to discharge our bonde, and by our punishment and execution, deliver and set free the Romane armie.

Both the cause it selfe, and the advocate also, moved the Lords of the Senat: and wrought so much not only with the rest, but also with the Tribunes themselves [of Commons] that they promised to be at the Consuls ording and appointment. Whereupon immediately they gave up their offices, and were delivered into the Feccials hands with the other, to be led all, to Caudium.
D There was not so soon an act of the Senat passed hereof, but it seemed that the very light and raies of the sun shone upon the citie againe. Posthumus was in every man his mouth, him they praised and extolled to the heavens: comparing him with the voluntarie offering of P. Decius the Consull, for the safetie of the armie, and other worthie and noble actes of others: Saying, that by his ouverture, by his meanes and travaile, the citie was delivered from a servile, dishonourable and unhonced peace: He (say they) hath offered himselfe to all the torments, anger, and vengeance of the enemies, & made full satisfaction therby for the people of Rome. Nothing now but war, war: Al' arme, now cried every man: and, oh, that ever they might see the day, to encounter once again with the Samnits, in their armour and with weapon in hand. So, whiles the citie was thus inflamed and boiled with hatefull yre and indignation, there was an armie levied, well neare all of vo-E luntaries. New legions were mustred and enrolled againe out of the same souldiors, and a puissant armie set forth to Caudium. The Feccials marched before, and when they were come to the gate of the citie, commanded the Suerties, such as had subscribed and signed the accord aforesaid, to be depoyled and stript out of their clothes, & their hands to be pinnioned behind them.
And when the Licour or serjeant, for very reverence of Majestie in Posthumus his person, bound him at large and at ease, Why doest not thou (qd. he) draw and pull the cord straighter, that the rending and delivery of us may be according to lawe and as it ought to be, and no fault to be found withall? Afterwards, when they were come into the assembly of the Samnits, & before the Tribunall judgment seat of Pontius; A. Cornelius Arvina one of the Fecciales or Heraulds thus spake: For as much as these persons, without commandement and commission from the Quiri-F tes and people of Rome, have undertaken by stipulation, That there shall a league and peace be made with you; and in so doing have offended and trespassed against the State, therefore, to the end, that the people of Rome might be freed and assailed from a detestable and heinous offence, Here I deliver and yeelde unto you, the selfe same men. No sooner had he uttered these words, but Posthumus with his knee smote the Fecciall his thigh, with all the might he could: & with a loud

voic. said, That he being now a Samnite citizen, and the other an Embassadour and an Herald of the people of Rome; had against the law of nations injured him and offered him the abuse; whereby the Romanes might more justly make warre. Then quoth Pontius. This deliverie neither will I accept of and admit, neither shall the Samnites hold it good and lawfull. But why doest not thou Sp. Posthumus, if thou beleeve there be any gods, either undo and cancelle all, or stand to thy bargain and covenant? For by right either are they all due unto the Samnites, whom they once had in their power; or els peace, in lieu of them. But why speake I thus, and chalenge thee, who doest yeeld thy selfe againe prisoner to the conqueror as faithfully and loially as thou canst? The people of Rome I challenge, who, if they repent of the promise and bargain made at the streights of Caudium, let them bring againe the Legions into that gullet, wherein they were environned, enclosed, and compassed. Let no man deceive and delude other. Let all be undone againe, and every thing as it was: let them take againe their armour, which by covenant they yeelded up: let them returne into their owne campe, and have whatsoever they had the day before the Parle. Then let them please themselves with war, with valiant and magnanimous deeds: refuse they then, and spare not all covenant: reject they then all treatie of peace. Let us have the same fortune, the same oportunitie and vantage of the places, which we had before the mention of peace: and so make warre, and trie the issue. So shall neither the people of Rome, blame the Consuls stipulation, nor wee find any lacke and default in the faithfulness of the people of Rome. And will yee never have done, but alwaies find shifts and excuses, and not stand to your covenants, when yee are overcome, and have the worfe of your enemies? Yee gave sometimes hostages to King Porſenna; and when yee had done, afterwards stole them away. For a summe of gold you bought againe your citie of the Gauls; and as they were receiving the same gold, murdered they were by you & hewen in peeces. Peace ye have covenanted with us, upon condition that we should restore againe your legions unto you; that peace you cancell and make void, & evermore ye set some colour of right upon your cautelous and fraudulent dealing: Well, aloweth not the people of Rome of the saving of their Legions, by a dishonorable and shamefull peace? Say it is so. Let peace goe whether it will: but give you againe to the Victor, your Legions captivate. Is this your faithfull dealing? are these your covenants, & ceremonies of Fecials and heralds? that thou, according to the agreement and accord, shouldst have that desire of thine, even so many citizens lives saved? and I not have the peace (which by letting mine hold go unto thee an enemy) I bargained for? What Iustice is this, that thou o Cornelius, and yee that are heralds, prescribe to Nations abroad? Nay verily, I neither will accept of those persons whom ye make a shew to deliver, neither can I beleeve, that they are yeelded in veritie and good earnest. Nay, I passe not at all, whether they returne againe into that citie, which is obliged by a covenant made, attended upon with the wrath and displeasure of all the gods, whose heavenly power and deitie is thus deluded. Now go and make warre, seeing that Sp. Posthumus erewhile jostled and pushed an Embassadour herald with his knee; and so the gods will beleeve no doubt, that Posthumus is a Samnite citizen, and no Romanes; and that by a Samnite, a Roman Embassadour hath ben abused: and thereupon you may take a just occasion and good quarrell to make warre upon us. Are you not ashamed, and bauld you not to broach and set abroad, in the view and face of the world, such mockeries of religion? What? old and aunient grave personages, and such as have ben Consuls, to seeke such subtle devises (not fit for verie children and babes to play with) and all to shift off and falsifie their promise made by covenant. Go Licor, loose the Romanes of their bands: and no man so hardie as to stay them, but that they may depart when they will at their owne pleasure. So they, having thus perhaps discharged the publicke fidelitie, or at leastwise quit themselves undoubtedly of their owne, returned from Caudium, unhurt, to the Roman campe.

The Samnites seeing that in lieu of a proud and unreasonable peace, there was a most cruell warre new sprung up againe, not onely forecast and apprehended in their minds, but well neere saw evidently with their eyes, all that ever ensued after. Then, all too late and in vaine, God wot, they praised the two-fold counsell of old Pontius: and how they taking the middle way betwene, were deceived, and had exchanged the certain possession of victory, for an uncertaine and doubtful peace: and having lost the oportunitie both of grausifying the Romanes, or doing them harme any more, were now to fight and wage warre with them, whom they might either have disabled for being hurtfull enemies, or made their fast and assured friends for ever. And

A so without any weakning of their power and forces of either side by battaile: their hearts after this Caudine peace were so changed, that Posthumus by his voluntarie yeelding was more honored among the Romanes, than Pontius his bloodless victorie among the Samnites: and the Romanes made this reckoning, that the possibilitie of making warre was to them as much as undoubted victorie: and the Samnites beleeved verily, that the Romanes had at once made warre againe and gotten the upper hand.

B Whiles these things thus passed, the Saticanes revolted to the Samnites: and the Colonie at Fregellæ, by the suddaine and unlooked for arrivall of the Samnites (with whom it is certaine the Saticanes were banded) in the night was surprisid and taken. But the mutuall feare one of the other, kept them in on both sides that they stirred not out untill the morning. Then began the fight, which for a certain time was equall and indifferent: yet, for that the Fregellones within fought for their Church and chimney (as they say) and by reason that the multitude, unmeet for armes, stood them in good steed in annoying their enemies from off their houses; they held out and found them play a long time. But afterwards, a wilie and deceitfull policie turned all backwards & was their undoing: for they suffered the voice of the crier to be heard through the town, who proclaimed, That whosoever laid down weapon, should depart alive & safe with bag & baggage. The hope whereof, caused them to slack somewhat of their fight, and therewith they began to cast away their armour in everie place. But the resolute fort armed still, brake away through a posterne gate, whose venturousnesse proved to them more safe, than the inconsiderate feare of the other which made them credulous & too light of beliefe. For the Samnites compassed them about with fire, and for all they called upon the gods for their helpe, and to theist enemies for performance of their promise, yet they burned them most piteously.

C The Consuls parted betwene themselves, their provinces. Papirius tooke his way to Luceria in Apulia, where the Roman horfmen given for hostages at Caudium were kept in ward: but Publius staid in Samnium to make head against the Caudine legions. Which thing much troubled and distracted the minds of the Samnites: for neither their hearts would serve them to go to Luceria, least the enemy should come on their backs; nor yet to stay behind, for feare least in the while, Luceria should be lost. They thought it best therefore, to put all in hazard of a battaile, and to trie it out with Publius. Whereupon they bring forth their power into the field: with whom when Publius was minded to joine in fight, he thought it not amisse, first to make some speech unto his men, and so commanded them to assemble unto an audience. But, as they came running to the Prætorium, with exceeding great cheerfulness, so by reason of their noise that called hard for battaile, no exhortation of the Generall could be heard: each man his owne heart mindfull of the former disgrace, served well enough to encourage and animate them. So they march out to battaile, putting forward the standerd-bearers and port-ensignes. And because they would loose no time, they first charge with launcing their javelins and shooting darts, and after that, in drawing their swords, they threw away their javelins, as if they had had a signall given them so to doe, and with naked drawne sword, they ran upon their enemies. No cunning was there to bee shewed of warlike captaine, no skill to be shewed either in setting in array the files and ranks, or placing of the rereward for supplies: the soldiors furious anger, with raging violence, marshalled & managed all. So, the enemies were not onely discomfited and put to the rout, but also because they durst not hinder their flight by retiring to their owne campe, they made all the hast they could, disbanded as they were, toward Apulia. Howbeit they were rallied together in one companie, and so came to Luceria. The Romanes, in the same boiling heat of blood that they pierced through the mids of the enemies battaile, entred also into their campe: where was more bloudshed and execution than in the battell: and the greater part of the pillage was in their choller marred and cleane lost.

F The other armie commanded by Papirius the Cos. marched along the sea coast to Arpi: and all the countrie they passed thorow, shewed them friendship & courtesie, more for the outrages and losses sustained by the Samnites, & the hatred they bare them, than for any love to the people of Rome, or good received at their hands. And now the Samnites at that time dwelling upon the hils in villages, being mountaineers & wild people, and as it is commonly seen, of like disposition to the places which they do inhabit, wasted the plaine Champaine & sea coasts, despising indeed their more civile life & conversation. Which countrie, if it had ben true to the Samnites, either the Roman armie had not ben able to come to Arpi, or els the penurie and scarcitie of all things things between Rome & Arpi, would have consumed them, being cut off from all provision of victuals. For even then, being gone from them, & lying encamped before Luceria, as well they with- out in the leaguer and those that were within the citie besieged, were nipped and bitten with hun- ger. The Romanes were served all from Arpi, but so slenderly & skantly, that whiles the footmen were occupied in their guards warding, watching, and working uncessantly; the horsemen, were faine to bring corne from Arpi, in little leather bagges: and otherwhiles, if they met the enemie, were forced to cast the corne from off their horse backs, to fight more nimble. They that were within besieged, before the other Consull came with his victorious armie, had both from the mountaines of the Samnites, victuals brought vnto them, and succours also of men let in to them. But the coming of Publius made all provisions more streight: for, leaving the charge of the siege to his brother Consull, he rood lightly appointed without cari- age, all over the countrie, and so beat all the quarters, that they were too hoar for the enemies to forage and purveigh victuals. Then the Samnites, seeing that they within the citie besieged, were past all hope to abide the famine any longer, encamped about Luceria, and were forced to gather all their forces together from all parts, and to give Papyrius battaile. At which very instant, when they were on both sides preparing to fight, the Tarentine Embassadors came betweene, dischar- ging and forbidding, both Samnites and Romanes to fight: professing withall, that whosoever they were that refused to give over war, against them they would fight in defence and favor of the others. Papyrius having heard that embassage, making semblance, as if he had greatly regarded their speeches, answered that he would conferre with his brother Consull; and having sent for him, and bestowed all the meane time in preparation to fight, when hee had talked with him as touching the execution of matters already resolved, he presently gave the signall, and set out the bloudie banner of battell. Now as the Consuls were busie in sacrificing and performing du- ties belonging to God and man (as their manner is when they purpose to go to a battaile) the Tarentine embassadors aforesaid, encountred them and expected an answer. To whom Papyrius, The Chick-matter (qd. he) o ye Tarentines, sendeth mee word, that the birds feed right, and all is well; and besides that, the gods in our sacrifice seeme passing well pleased. And in the name of the gods, & under their conduct (as ye see) we are going to battell. Then commanded he to set forward the standers, and led forth his power, mocking the foolish nation for their great vanitie, who, not able to manage their owne affaires by reason of home seditions and civill discords, thought it meet to be moderators betweene others, and to prescribe them warre or peace. The Sam- nites on the other side, having slaked all their care and desire of war, for that they desired peace in good earnest, or els thought it expedient for them to make a semblance thereof, for to winne unto them the Tarentines; seeing the Romanes all of a suddaine arranged in battaile array and ready to fight, cried forth aloud, that they rested stil in the authoritie of the Tarentines, and were at their direction: neither would they come forth into the field, nor put themselves in armes out of their fort: choosing rather being thus disappointed, to abide the chance of fortune what- soever, than to seeme to have despised the Tarentines, who had interposed themselves as medi- ators for peace. Marry (quoth the Cons.) we take that for a good osse and preface of luckie suc- cesse: & we would wish no more at Gods hands, but to put into their enemies heads that resolution, not to defend their trench & rampire. So the Cons. when they had parted between them their forces, approached the very campe of their enemies, and set upon them with an hot assault on every side. Thus while some filled and dammed up the trenches, others plucked up the stakes of the rampier, and threw the banke and all downe the diches under their feete: whiles not onely their owne inbred valour by nature, but also anger and choler provoked and pricked to the quick, their hearts already fretted and cankered at the very roote, for the last disgrace received; they entred the campe. Every man for his part gave out and said, Here are not the straight gullees of Caudium, here are not the impassable nor inaccessible passes, & forrests, where as proud fraud had gone beyond their feely error and want of foresight: but Roman vertue and prouesse, which no rampier never so strong, no trench how deepe soever, is able to put by and withstand. So they killed all afore them indifferently, as well them that made resistance and stood to it, as M those that recoiled and gave way: armed and disarmed, bond and free borne, old and young, as well under age as undergrowne man and beast, one with another: neither had there escaped any living creature drawing breath, but that the Consuls founded the retreat, and with minatorie wordes commanded the souldiors, to greedie of murder and bloudthirstie, to go forth of the campe.

A campe. Whereupon when they were highly discontented and in great indignation, for that they were staied and interrupted in this sweetnesse of wreaking their anger, and satiating their re- venge to the full; it was time to deliver this speech unto them, wherein the souldiors were given to understand, how the Consuls neither were behinde any of them in malice and hatred to their enemies, nor would bee hereafter: but as they were their chiefe conductours to the war, so they would be their leaders and shew them the way, to unsatiabie appetite of revenge and execution; had not the care and regard of those 600 horsemen, which were kept as hostages in Luceria, coo- led their thirst and staied their stomackes; lest happily the enemies in despair to finde pardon and mercie, should run upon them in a blind fit of furie and rage, and put them all to the sword; chusing rather to torment and kill them first, before they died themselves. The souldiors greatly B commended this course, and rejoyced that thus their choller was allaid, and their furie bridled, confessing, That they were indeede to abide all whatsoever, rather than the life of so many of the forwardest and principall yong gentlemen of Rome, should be betrayed, or in danger. This audi- ence being dismissed, they drew together to a counsell, whether with all their forces they should assaile and presse hard upon Luceria, or with one of the armies and cheefe leaders, give the at- tempt to found the Apulians, a close and secret kind of people therabout, who ever to that day had stood in doubtfull reames with them.

Publius the Consull, who had taken this journey to overrun all Apulia, in that one voiage and expedition, either by force subdued and brought under his obeisance certaine States, or upon conditions entred league & societie with them. Papyrius also, who staied at the siege of Luceria, C within a short time sped according to his expectation: For having forelaied and beset all the waies, by which victuall was conveyed thither out of Samnium, the Samnites who lay in garison at Luceria, pinched and tamed with famine, sent Embassadors to the Romane Consull, making offer to releafe and deliver up into his hands those horsemen; (the onely cause of the present warre) in case he would raise and levie the siege. To whom Papyrius made this answer, that they should have gone first to Pontius, the sonne of Herennius, by whose counsell they had put the Romanes under the yoke and the gallows, to learne and know of him, what in his opinion they were to abide, who were vanquished and overcome. Howbeit, for as much as they had leifer, and chose rather to bee censured indifferently, and to receive equall conditions of their enemies, than of their owne selves, he willed the Embassadors to give them to understand in Luceria; that D they should leave their armour, their bag and baggage, their beasts of carriage, and impotent multitude not fit for the warres, within the wals. And as for the fighting souldiors, he would put them to passe under the gallows in their single shirts, for to revenge the shame first offered them, and not to inflict any new ignominie upon them. Nothing was denied and refused: seven thou- sand men of warre were put under the gallows, a rich and huge pillage raised within Luceria, all their owne ensignes and armour regained, which they had lost at Caudium: and that which sur- mounted all other joies, they recovered again those gentlemen of armes, whom lying for pledges and securitie of the peace aforesaid, the Samnites had sent to Luceria to be kept in safe custodie. There is not lightly to be found a victorie more noble, and of greater consequence to the peo- ple of Rome than this, in regard of the suddain change of fortune, in case (as some records beare E witnesse) Pontius also himselfe the sonne of Herennius, and Generall of the Samnites, to make sa- tisfaction and quittance for the Consuls disgrace and shame, was put under the yoke, as well as all the rest. But I lesse marvel, that it is not cleare, but left uncertaine, that the enemies Generall was rendred, and went under the gallows: this rather I wonder at, that doubted it is, whether Lucius Cornelius Dictator, with L. Papyrius Curfor, Generall of the horsemen, managed these acts first at Caudium, and then afterwards at Luceria: and being the only revenger of that disgrace of the Romans, triumphed most worthily (I dare be bold to say) of any man before that time, next to Furius Camillus; or whether the cheefe honour hereof pergain by right to Papyrius as Consull. Vpon this error followeth another in the necke of it, whether Papyrius, surnamed Curfor, for his good service at Luceria, in the next Election, continued in Magistracie, and were made third F time Consull with Q. Aemilius Caracianus, the second time: or whether it were L. Papyrius Mu- gillanus, and the error grew upon the surname. But it is agreed upon by all writers, that from this time forward all the reliques of the warres, were performed and finished by Consuls. Aemilius in one prosperous battel made a final conquest of the Ferentanes, & upon composition had the citie delivered up unto him, whither they had retired their forces for succour, after their defea-

ture in the field, and hostages were imposed upon them. With like good success fought the other Consull with the Saticranes, who being Romane citizens, had revolted to the Samnites, after the losse at Caudium, and had received into their citie a garrison of theirs. For when as the Romane armie approached under the wals of Saticum, and that the citizens within (after Embassadours sent to treat by way of humble petition for peace) had received this hard and heauie answer from the Consull, That unless they would kill the garrison of the Samnites, or deliver them into his hands, they should come no more againe to him: the Coloners and inhabitants were more frighted & terrified with that speech, than at all the forcible attempts of their armie. Whereupon the Embassadours followed their suit hard, and continued still, demanding excuses of the Consull how hee could beleeeve, that they being but few, feeble, and disarmed, should be able to force a garrison so strong & well appointed, against their wils? being willed to aske counsell of them, by whose means they had received the said garrison into the towne, they departed their waies: and having hardly obtained leave & licence at his hands, to consult with their Senat, & to bring answer, they return home again. Their Senat was divided into two factions, which distracted & held them in suspence, that they could not soone resolve. The one, consisting of the cheefe personages & head men, who had solicited them to revolt from the people of Rome; the other of true hearted and loyall citizens. Howbeit, both sides strove in the end, and endeavored to labour the Consull for reconciliation of peace. The one part thought it sufficient (because the Samnites garrison having not provision enough aforehand to hold out the siege, was to depart the night following) to give notice to the Consull, what howe of the night, through what gate the enemies would go forth, & which way they would take: the other, namely against whose will they were revolted to the Samnites, the verie same night, opened another gate besides the Consull, and privily let their enemies armed into the citie. So by a twofold complor of treason, they were surprisid unawares and all their throats cut, not onely the garrison of the Samnites (by reason that the woods all about the high way were laied for them and beset) but also at one instant there was a shout and alarme raised by the enemies, within the citie, which was full of them: and thus in the space of one hower both the Samnites were slaine, the Saticranes taken, and all they had in the world seized into the hands of the Consull: who after diligent inquisition by torture, Who were the principall authors of this revolt? whomsoever he found guiltie, those he skourged and beheaded: and setting there a strong garrison, he tooke from the Saticranes all their armour. From thence Papyrius Cursor departed to Rome for to triumph (as they write, that say, by his leading Luceria was recovered, and the Samnites put under the yoke). And without question, a man he was worthe of all commendations of a warrior, surpassing not onely in fortitude and courage of spirit, but also in force and naturall strength of bodie, and namely for his good footman-shipp: whereupon he got his surname Cursor*. For in running (they say) he had not his peere, but went away with pricke and prise before all other in those daies: and were it by reason of his bodily vigour and strong constitution, or his much exercise, a stout and mightie eater he was, he dranke as liberally to his meat, & could carie it as well. Never had foot or horse under any captain more rough & harder service, for that himselfe was of so tough mettall & Steele to the verie backe (as they say) that he could abide any paines and travaile whatsoever. His horsemen upon a time were so bold, as to request him in lieu of their good service in some exploit, to ease them a little of their ordinarie toyle and labour: yes marie will I (quoth he) and that yee shall not complaine that ye have no easment at all, I will ease you of this paines, That when ye alight from your horses, ye shall not need any more to stroke their shoulders, backe and buttocks. He was a man besides for severitie strenght, and of right great command, as well over his allies and confederates as his owne citizens. The Pretor of Preneste, for verie feare chanced once to be somewhat behind, and slacke in bringing forward the rereward, into the vanguard and front of the battell: as he walked before his pavilion he commanded him to be called unto him: when he was come, he willed the sergeant to bring forth his axe immediatly: at which word when the Prenestin stood amazed and well neere dead, Dispatch Lictor (quoth hee) stocke me up and grub this root that hindereth them that walke this way: and when he saw him astonished and his heart in his heeles for feare of death, he set a good round fine upon his head, and so let him go. Doubtlesse in all that age (than which there was never any more fertile and fruitfull for vertue and valor) there was no one man, upon whom the state of Rome rested & relied more: In so much as men had destined, & in their minds appointed him to have matched and made head with Alexander the great,

- A if after the conquest of Asia, he should have bent his power hitherward, and warred in Europe. Albeit it may well appeare that I have nothing lesse fought, ever since I began this worke, than to digresse and decline more than was needfull, from the order and course of mine historie, and by extravagant garnishing and mingling my writings with varietie of matters, both to seeke for the readers pleasant starts and diverticles to repose themselves, and for my selfe some ease and recreation of my spirits: yet the mention of so mightie a king and renowned captain, maketh me to thinke upon, and to utter abroad the secret conceits and discourses, which often I have cast & tossed in my mind: & which induce me now to serch & examine willingly, what event would have happened and befallen to the Romanes, in case they had waged warre with Alexander. First and foremost, the things that seeme to beare sway and prevaile in warre, be these (to wit) number of soldiours, valour, and courage withall, wit, sufficiencie and dexteritie of their cheefe leaders, and lastly, fortune, which as in all other humane and worldly affairs beareth a great stroke, so in war most of all. Which points, if a man consider either severally by themselves, or jointly altogether, do prove that the Roman Empire & government had stood as well against him, as other princes & nations invincible. And first, to begin with comparing of the captains themselves; I doe not denie, but that Alexander was a noble and singular warrior: and this maketh more for his fame and renowne, that he was a sole commander of himselfe, that he was a yong man, and died in the grough of his prosperous affaires, before he had felt and tasted of adverse fortune. For to let passe other glorious Princes and brave captaines, (the great mirrours and examples of humane changes and varieties of this world) what was it that exposed Cyrus, whom the Greeks commend and magnifie above all other, as also of late time, Pompeie the great, to disfavor & the turning wheele of fortune, but onely this, that they lived long? Let me but rehearse and reckon up the Romane captaines, and those not all, nor in everie age, wherein they flourished; but even them only, with whom being either Consuls or Dictators, Alexander should have warred, if he had come: namely, M. Valerius Corvinus, C. Martius Rutilius, C. Sulpitius, T. Manlius Torquatus, Q. Publius Philo, L. Papyrius Cursor, Q. Fabius Maximus: the two Decij, L. Volumnius, M. Curius. Besides other brave men and valiant personages that followed after, in case he had fought the Carthaginian were first (for if he had lived he ment to have warried there) and then passed over into Italie, when he had been well steeped in years. In everie one of these, there were the same good parts, the like towardnesse of nature, as much forwardnesse of courage and spirit, as in Alexander, yea and as good Militarie discipline, which even from the foundation of the citie, passing from hand to hand, grew at length to the forme and perfection of an Art, framed & compiled of continual rules and precepts, and confirmed by experiments. For so, after one course the Kings conducted their warres: even so, next unto them the banishers of the Kings, (to wit the Junij and Valerij) so, consequently the Fabij, the Quintij, and Cornelij: so did Furius Camillus, whom those two Romanes in their youth (Manlius Torquatus and Valerius Corvinus) with whom Alexander should have encountered, saw an aged man in the latter end of his daies. And whereas Alexander ventured his own proper person in battaile, & performed all Militarie duties with other soldiours, (which was not the least part of his praise and glory) would Manlius Torquatus have given him one ynoch of ground, thinke ye, if he had met with him in the medlie equally matched? or Valerius Corvinus either, both of them brave & doutie soldiours before they were leaders and captaines? Or would the Decij have given him place, who with devoted bodies to death, came among the thickest of their enemies into present danger? Would Papyrius Cursor have given him way, a man of that incomparable strength of bodie, & invincible courage of hart? And (not to name every one particularly) would that Senat & Counsell have been overwrought with the stratagemes & pollicies of that one yong man? which, who soever he was that said, it consisted and was composed altogether of kings, was the only man that conceived & comprehended the true image and Idea of the Romane Senat. Mary heere was all the doubt (forsooth) least that he knew not how to chuse out a convenient plot of ground, to pitch a camp in, more wisely and cunningly than any one of those before named, to make provision for victual, to foresee and beware of ambushes, to picke out and take a meet time for to fight a battail, to set his battaillons in array, & to strengthen the same with sufficient succors & supplies from the reregard. Certes, he would have said himselfe, that he had not now to deale with Darius, which Monarch carrying with time a traine of daintie women, and tender Eunuches, weakened and made effeminate with wearing purple and gold, with all his rich furniture, for shew and ostentation of his wealthie and superfluous fortune, Alexander without any bloodshed, with doing nought else, but knowing well how to contemne such toys and vanities conquered as a prey and bootie rather than an enemy and warrior. He would have thought verily that the situation and nature of Italy farre differed from that of India, through which hee marched at his ease with his drunken armie, feasting and banketting all the way; but specially, when he should have beheld the woody forests and vnpassable streights of Apulia, the high hills and mountaines of Lucania, and the fresh marks and tokens of the losse that happened in his owne name and house, namely, where not long before his vnkle Alexander late King of Epirus miserably perished. Our talke all this while is of Alexander, not drowned yet with the overflow of prosperitie; wherein no man had ever lesse rule of himselfe than he. Whome if we consider, as he was attainted in the habite and attire of his new fortune, and (if I may so say) of a new nature, whereinto after his conquests and victories he was transfigured; surely he would have come into Italy more like a Darius than an Alexander, and brought a battard armie with him, nothing at all resembling but quite forgetting their native countie of Macedonie, degenerated already, and growing out of kind, into the manners and fashions of the Persians. It grieueth me, and I am ashamed, in so great a Monarch as he was, to report the proud changing and varietie every while of his apparell, his excessive vainglory and desire of being courted & crouched unto (as he was) in flattering manner, by men lying upon the earth groveling and prostrate at his feete. Such abiect basenes should have bene hardly endured of Macedonians conquered and subdued; much lesse then, being conquerours as they were. Abashed I am to recount the foule & horrible torments and executions, the murders of his well deserving friends, even in the midst of his cups and deintie viands: last of all, his vanitie, his overweening, & forging to himselfe a diuine race & pedigree from the gods. But what if his drunkenness & unmeasurable love of wine, were every day more than other? what if his fell anger & exceeding heat of choler increased daily? (for I report nothing, but that which all writers agree upon) reckon we not these infirmities for great blemishes, & wonderous hinderances, to the vertues and perfections of a warrior & generall commander? But here is all the danger & feare (which some are wont to give out & alledge, even the vainest persons of all other Greekes, who fauour & magnifie the glory of the very Parthians in comparison of the Romane name) that the people of Rome had never bene able to abide the very majestic and name of Alexander the great. (And I thinke verily, that even themselves that talke so much of him, never heard the truth, so much as by the bruite & fame) and that against whom in Athens, a Citie mightily decayed by warre with the Macedonians, & even then, when as they might see before their face the ruines of Thebes in manner smoking full in their eyes, the Oratours durst freely make publike inuectiues (which appeareth by the very records of their Orations now extant) against him: I say, not one of so many States & noble personages of Rome durst have opened his mouth, and given one word againe frankly & boldly. How much sooner the grandeur & greatnesse of this man may be conceived & imagined in the mind, all that, shall be but one onely man, rising, growing, & come to his height with the felicity of little more than ten yeares. Which happinesse of his, they that extoll in this respect, that the people of Rome, although in no war they were subdued, yet in many battailes had the foyle and lost the day; whereas Alexander neuer fought feild but he woon the victory; little understand, that they compare the exploits of one person, and him a yong man, with the deedes and acts of a State, which had now warred eight hundred yeares. And can we meruaile, if when on the one part there may be reckned more ages, than yeers on the other, that in so long a time, fortune should varie more, than in the space of thirteene yeares? But why compare you not man with man, Captaine with Captaine? and lay their fortunes together? How many Romaine Chieftaines and Generals, in this case am I able to name, who never lost field? Yee may turne every leafe & page of the yerely annales of Magistrates, of day-bookes & journals of those Consuls & Dictators, whose valour & felicitie, the people of Rome had never cause to repent of and be discontented for, so much as one day. And that which maketh them more wonderful, and to be admired above Alexander or any other king in the world, some of them bare the Dictatorship but ten or twentie dayes; and none the Consulship longer than a yeare. Their leues and musters now & then were letted and impeached by the Tribunes of the Com. The due and best time for warre otherwhiles overlapped them, and yet they went forth. Before their terme expired, they were often called home, for to be presidents of the Magistrates Election. In the very midst and busiest time of their affaires, the yeare cfsuones turned about. The inconsiderate

A rashnesse one while, & the peevishe crookednesse another while of a Colleague and companion in government, was hindrance & harme both. They succeeded sundry times after the losse & overthrow of their predecessors, & received an armie either of raw untrained souldiers, or such as were in ill discipline nuzelled up: whereas Kings & Monarks contrarywise, not only freed & exempt from all such obstacles & inconveniences, but also Lords & Masters, & of absolute command, over their enterprises, over times and seasons fit for execution, give direction to others, draw all after them to their aduise and counsell, and are themselves directed and overruled by none. Say now, that Alexander were invincible, and delt with these Captaines as invincible as himselfe, he should likewise have hazarded as great pawns & fauours of fortune as any of them; nay rather he should have adventured & incurred more jeopardie, in that the Macedonians had but Alexander alone, a man not only subject but also exposing himselfe, to many perilous chances: but many Romanes there had bene egall to Alexander, either for glorie or greatnes of their worthie deedes: who every one should have lived and died according to the fatall course of his owne severall destinie, without the hazard of the whole and maine chance. It remaineth now that forces be compared with forces, and armies to armies, either in number, or in qualitie of souldiours, or multitude of Allies, from whom they had their aides. There were esteemed by computation in the Taxing yeares, & Surveies taken by the Censors of that age, two hundred & fiftie thousand polls Citizens of Rome. And therefore in all the revolts and rebellions of their allies the Latins, they were able to levie and enroll ten legions complete, of Romane citizens well neere and none else. And for many yeares often times, there were foure and five armies employed at once, which maintained warres in Tuscane, in Heturia, in Vmbria, take also the Gaules with you their enemies, likewise Lucania in Samnium. Besides all these, Alexander should have found all Latium with the Sabines, Volsciens, and Aequians; all Campania, part of Vmbria and Heturia, with the Picentes, the Marsians, Pelignians, Vestines and Apulians, and all the coast adjoining thereto of the Greekes, along the nether Tyrrhen sea, from the Thurians to Naples and Cumes, and from thence, the Samnites, as farre as Antium and Hostia. All these he should have met with, either mightie and puissant allies and friends to the Romanes, or if they were enemies, vanquished and subdued by their armes. He should have passed the seas himselfe, having of old Macedonian bands, not above thirtie thousand foote, & four thousand horse, and those, most of them Thessalians; for this was all his power. And in case he had joynd thereto, the Persians, Indians, and other such nations, he should have drawne along after him, more let and encombrance, than help and succour by them. Take this over and besides; The Romanes had fresh supplies alwaies readie and neere at hand, at home in the Citie: whereas Alexander his armie (as afterwards it happened to Annibal warring in a strange countie) would have waxed old and decayed. They had for their armor and weapons, a shield or buckler, and a speare in manner of a pike. The Romanes had a target of larger capacitie to cover the whole bodie, and a javelin, being a weapon much better and more forcible than the pike, either to strike and push withall neere hand, or to be launced a far off. The souldiers, I confesse, both of the one side and the other, stood their ground surely, kept their place and array still, within their severall ranks. The Macedonian massive Phalanx moved not, was stedfast, and alwaies after one sort: but the Romanes battaillon more distinct, and consisting of many parts, easie both to divide and display, or to joyne and reunite upon any occasion. To speake now of painefull worke and travaile, what souldier is comparable to the Romane? who better able to endure all sorts of labour? Alexander by the losse but of one battaile, had bene cleane done, and his warre at an end for ever. But the Romanes, whose hearts, neither the shameful disgrace at Caudium, nor the wofull defeature at Cannæ, could mate and daunt; what power would have discouraged? what battaile in the world would have broken their backs? Certes, Alexander, although he had great prosperitie and good successe in his first beginnings and enterprises, would oftentimes heere, have missed his Persians and Indians, and desired with all his heart to have had dealing with them againe, and other cowardly and dastardly nations of Asia: nay, he would have sayd, that he had warred before but with women, as that one warre, and against one of those two States. And peradventure, when both Carthaginians and Romanes had beene combined, either according to the auncient leagues, or for equall feare of a common enemy, & those two cities most puissant both for men and munition, had taken armes at once against him, he would have beene overwhelmed with the Punicke and Roman warre together. Moreover, the Romanes have made good prooffe of the Macedonians as enemies, if not when they had Alexander to be their Captaine, nor whiles the Empire of Macedonia was at the best, and stood upright unfoiled: yet tried them they have, & made head against them under the conduct of Antiochus, Philip, & Perfes: & it never cost them the losse and overthrow of their owne part, no, nor so much as any appareance of danger at all. I would nor bee thought to speake a proud word, but be it said without arrogancie, and setting all our civile wars aside; never were wee distressed, either by horse or foot, never in open field and battaile ranged, never on even and plaine ground, never in unequall places of disadvantage, were wee endangered. The soldior in heave & complete harneis, I confesse, may feare the Cavallerie in the plaines: may feare shot of arrowes, comberfome Forrests and woods, streight gullets, & unpassable wilds, without waies forward or backward: but let there bee a thousand armies greater and stronger than the Macedonians or Alexanders, so long as we hold together, and continue still in this love of peace and care of civile concord, wherein we live at this present, wee are able, and ever shall bee, to discomfite and put them all to flight.

After this, were M. Follus Flaccina, and L. Plautius Venox Consuls. The same yeare there came from sundrie Nations of the Samnites Embassadors, to treat for the renewing of the league, and moved the Senat, most humbly kneeling prostrate upon the ground: but being put off & referred to the people, their prayers availed not to such effect: for as touching a league, they had a flat nay. And after they had for certain daies together, importuned them one by one apart, with cap and curse: at length after much suit, they obtained truce for two yeares. And out of Apulia the Theanenses and Canusines wearied with rodes and spoile made in their territories, after they had put in hostages to Lucius Plautius the Consull, yielded themselves to his protection. The same yeare first began Provosts to bee created at Capua, to governe under certaine lawes given unto them by L. Furius the Pretor: after that themselves had made suit for the one and the other, as a remedie for their state, greatly decayed through civile discord. And at Rome were two more Tribes added to the rest, Vientina, and Falerina. When Apulia began once to shrink & go backward, the Theatines, being also Apulians, presented themselves unto the new Consuls, C. Iunius Bubulcus, and Q. Aemilius Barbula, and sued to enter into a league with the Romanes. And since they were the men that led the way first, and by their example and persuasion induced all Apulia to be in peace with the Romanes, and had confidently undertaken, as sureties and pledges to bring it to passe, they obtained their request. Yet was not the league indifferent and formall, with equall conditions, but so, as they should be in subiection to the people of Rome. After that Apulia was conquered (for Iunius had woon also Tarentum, a strong town and a rich) they marched forward against the Lucanes. Then upon the suddain comming of Aemilius the other Consull, Nerulum was by force taken. And after that it was noised abroad amongst the allies of the people of Rome, that the state and weale publicke of Capua were established by Romane discipline and government; the Antiates also, who made mone and plained, that they lived without positive set lawes and magistrates, obtained of the Senate certaine advocates or Commissioners, to ordaine statutes likewise for that Colonie. So, that not onely the Romane armes, but also their law and jurisdiction extended farre and neare, and was of great request. C. Iun. Bubulcus, and Q. Aemilius Barbula Consuls, in the end of the yeare, delivered their legions not to the Coss. by them created, Sp. Nautius, and M. Popilius, but consigned them to L. Aemilius the Dictatour. Who with his Generall of horse, L. Fulvius, began to lay siege to Satricula, whereby he gave the Samnites occasion to rebell. Which brought upon the Romanes a double feare two waies. For of the one side the Samnites having assembled a mightie armie, to deliver their allies from the siege, pitched their campe not farre from the Romanes leaguer: on the other side, the Satricianes set open their gates suddainely, and with a great tumult brake into the wards and corps de guard of their enemies. And so both parts, relying rather upon hope of succour and helpe elsewhere, than trusting upon their owne strength, within a while began to charge the Romanes in full battell, with banner displayed, and distressed them. And although the Dictatour was assailed both waies, yet was hee sure and safe on either side, because hee

A had gotten a plot of ground, not easie to bee compassed, and made head both against the one and the other, advancing his ensignes accordingly. Howbeit, hee charged more hotely upon them that sallied forth, and without much adoe beat them againe within the wals. Then turned he the whole battaile upon the Samnites. Where there was hard hold, and more to doe. The victorie, though long first, was neither doubtfull nor variable. The Samnites being chased and driven into their campe, having in the night put out all their fires, dislodged and departed privily away: and being past all hope of defending Satricula, they besieged Plistia, a town confederate to the Romanes, to requite their enemy with the like displeasure. The revolution of the yeare being gone about, the warre continued under the conduct of Q. Fabius Dictatour: and the new Consuls, like as the former, remained still at Rome. And Fabius came before Satricula to receive the armie of Aemilius, bringing with him a new supplie to make up the broken bands: for the Samnites made no stay at Plistia, but having levied and sent for fresh souldiours from home, presuming upon their great numbers, encamped in the very place where they lay afore: where by braving the Romanes, and challenging them with many skirmishes, they would have forced them to raise the siege. But the Dictatour so much more earnestly bent his forces against the wals of the enemies, thinking it the best peece of service to assaile the towne, as being of such importance to the rest of the warre, which depended thereon: and was more carelesse therefore of the Samnites, and onely opposed against them certaine guards both day and night, along the trench and rampire, to keepe them from making any assault upon the campe. But the Samnites on the other side, so much the more fiercely skirmished on horsebacke about the fortifications, and never gave them rest. In so much, as when the enemy now was at the point to enter the gates of the campe, the Generall of the horse, Q. Aemilius Cereanus, without advise and direction of the Dictatour, riding forth in a great noise with all his cornets of Horse, repelled the enemy. But even in that light manner of skirmish, and no set battell of any long continuance, Fortune so plaied her part, and shewed what shee could doe, that on either side there befell a notable losse, with the glorious death of both the captaines. For the Generall of the Samnites first taking it to the heart, to see Aemilius so fiercely ride and give the charge, and himselfe to bee disarraied and driven out of his place, with much intreating and exhorting his horsemen, renewed the fight. Against whom, as he advanced himselfe, bravely to be seene amongst his men, and fought most valiantly, the Romane Generall of the horse, with speare in rest, so galloped his horse, that with one push he unhorsed him and left him for dead: and yet for all this was not the whole troupe besides (as commonly it is seene) at the fall of their captaine so much amazed, as provoked rather to fight. For they that were about him, charged Aemilius hard, as hee rashly rode without heed, and engaged himselfe too farre within the thickest of the squadrons of his enemies, and launced their javelins at him: but they gave the especiall honour to the brother of the Samnites captaine, to bee revenged for his death. Hee, full of anger and sorrow, plucked Aemilius from his horse, and slew him in the place, even in the midst of his victorie: and for that hee fell among the troupes of his enemies, hee had like to have left his dead corps among the Samnites. But presently the Romanes alighted on foot, and the Samnites were forced to doe the same: and thus being raunged suddainely in great hast into battaillons, there began a cruell fight on foot about the bodies of the captaines. Wherein the Romanes went cleare away with the better, and having recovered the corps of Aemilius, in great joy, entermingled with sorrow, they returne winners into their campe. The Samnites thus having lost their captaine, and tried their strength what they could doe in fight on horsebacke, left Satricula, which they supposed could not possible be defended, and so returned againe to the siege of Plistia. After fewe daies, Satricula was rendered by composition to the Romanes, and the Samnites by assault wan Plistia. Then changed they the seat towne of the warre. For out of Samnium and Apulia, the Legions were removed to Sora. This Sora was revolted to the Samnites, and had slaine all the inhabitants therein that were Romanes. Against which place, when the Romanes were come first by great journeyes to revenge the losse of their countrymen, and to recover the Colonie, their espials and vaunt-courious whome they had sent out dispersed along the high waies, brought word, that the Legions of the Samnites followed, yea and one after another gave advertisement, that they were not farre off. Hereupon they went forth to meet with the enemy, and neere to a place called Lautula, there was fought a doubtfull and dangerous battaile: for no slaughter it was, nor flight of either part, but the verie night that parted them, and they knew not whether they had the better or the worse. In some Chronicles I find, that the Romanes lost the day, and that there died in this battaile Q. Aemilius Generall of the horse. C. Fabius chosen into the rounge of Aemilius, came with a new and fresh armie from Rome, and having dispatched messengers before to the Dictator to know his advice, where he should stay and rest, at what time, and on which side he should set upon the enemy: after he was well enformed and instructed in all points what to doe, he put himselfe close in ambush, The Dictator himselfe, who had for certaine daies after the last skirmish, kept his soldiours within trench, more like one beseegeed, than beseegeing; all on a suddain, put forth the signal and token of battaile: and thinking nothing more effectual to animate & kindle the courages of hardie men, than to know of no other helpe or hope, nor to trust upon any man but in themselves, he concealed from his soldiours the coming of the Generall of horse and his fresh forces; and as if there had been no other way but one, even to breake forth and fallie with violence: We being (quoth hee) my soldiours, pent here and taken tardie in these streights have no other yssue but that which by victorie we shall make open. Our hold wherein we lie is fortified sure enough, but the same for scarcitie of all things noisome, ykesome, and hurtfull to us: for all parts heere about are revolted, from whence we should have convoie of victuals: and were it that the people were disposed to help us, yet the adventures & passages are hard, and the place of our abode, incommo- dious. Therefore will not I deceive and abuse you any longer, by leaving heere your tents into which ye may after (ye have missed the entiere victorie) betake your selves for safetie, as ye did the other daie: for our fortifications and holds, ought to be defended by force of armes: and not our armes by fenced forts. Let them have their campe well fortified, to yssue forth and to retire thither againe at their pleasure, who have a purpose to make a long warre of it. But let vs cut off all regard of other matters, but onely of a present and finall victorie. Advance then your ensignes directly against the enemy: and so soone as our armie is once without the trench and rampiers, let them set the tents a fire, that have the charge so to doe: you shall make up your losses againe, my soldiours, with the spoile of all the nations hereabouts, that have re- volted. At this speech of the Dictator, which shewed no other semblance but of extreme ne- cessitie, the soldiours tooke heart and were hote set to march straight to the enemy. And there- fore sight of their tents burning behind them (albeit those onely which stood next were set on fire, for so the Dictator had given commandement) was no small provocation and pricke unto them. And therefore they gave a charge like mad men, and at the first push and brunt they brake the ar- ray of the enemies: and withall, in good time, the General of the horse, when he saw a farre off the tents on fire (for that was the signall agreed between them) came hastily upon the backe of the enemies and assailed them. So the Samnites being environed round about, made everie man what shift he could to get forth and escape, and so fled. But the maine multitude that were thrummed together all on a round heap, for feare, being an hinderance one to another in the prease, was flaine in the mids and cut in peeces, the enemies camp woen, & ransacked: with the pillage whereof the soldiours were laden, and the Dictator brought them back unto their own camp: who were not so joious for the victorie, as for that they found (besides a litle part thereof disfigured by fire) all the rest safe and sound, beyond their expectation.

From thence they returned to Sora, where the new Consuls M. Petilius and Caius Sulpi- tius, tooke the armie at the handes of Fabius the Dictator: who discharged many of the old soldiours, and brought certaine new cohortes for supply in their stead. But when by reason of the difficult and unaccessible site of the towne, they knew not well which way and by what meanes to make assault, and seeing that the winning of it would either aske long time, or be exposed to manifold and present dangers: a certaine runaway traitour of Sora who was closely stolen out of the towne, gat to the Romane Sentinels, and required forthwith to be brought to the Consuls: who being presented before them, promised to betray the towne: and being questioned withall, how and by what meanes he would performe that which he undertooke, seemed unto them to alleage some reasons to good purpose, and prevailed so farre with them, that he caused the Romane campe, which lay in a manner close under the wals, to be removed sixe miles off the towne, saying, that thereby, the wards by day, and the watch by night, would be neglected, & lesse carefull and diligent to keepe the citie. Himselfe the night fol- lowing after he had willed certain cohortes of footmen, to lye in ambush within the woods neere the towne, tooke with him ten elect and chosen souldiers; and through steepe places, and such as

A were not well passable, conducted them into the Castle, having brought therewith more shot and darts to throw, than to serve so small a number of men: besides, there was good store of stones at hand, which lay there, either scattering by chaunce (as commonly in such craggie and rockie ground) or els heaped together by the townesmen of purpose, for the better defence of the place. Where, after he had bestowed the Romanes, and shewed them a narrow and steepe path- way out of the towne into the Castle, From getting up heere (quoth he) there needes no more but three men onely well armed, to keepe backe the greatest multitude that is: yee are in num- ber ten, and more than that, Romanes; & of Romanes the most hardie & valiant: the place will steed you, I know, the darkenesse of the night will be for your purpose, the night, I say, which by reason of uncertainties, maketh all things seeme much more than they are, to men affrighted and amazed already. I will for my part set all presently in a hurrie, looke you in the meane time that yee duly keepe the fortresse. This sayd, he runs downe with as great a noyse and shewing as he could, crying Al'arme, help help citizens, the Castle is taken by the enemy, come away to defense. These words he resounded ever, as he rapped at the gates of the principall citi- zens and noblemen: these words he redoubled alowd, to all that he met, and to as many as ran forth affrighted into the streetes. This fearefull alarme received from one man, was set abroad by many more all over the citie. The Magistrates quaking for feare, sent certaine to the Castle in spiall to discover the truth: and advertised by them that the Castle was surprized indeede by armed men, and full of armour (for they made the number & every thing els more than it was) were cleane put out of all hope to recover their fortresse. So every where they fell to running away: the gates were broken open by them that were not well awake, and those most part unar- med. At one of the gates, those companies of the Romanes aforesaid, who lay in ambush, and were raised with the noyse and clamor, brake in, and killed all that in this affright ran head- long in their way. Thus was Sora woen, against the Consuls should come in the morning be- times by breake of day: and looke whole fortune it was to scape out of the massacre made in the night, and to flye away, those they tooke to mercie upon their submission: whereof 225. even those who by the generall voyce of all were pointed at, and reputed above the rest the principall actors in that horrible massacre above sayd, of the Romane Coloners, inhabitants, and the authors of the revolt, they had away with them to Rome, bound hand and foote. The other mul- titude they left at Sora safe and unhurt, and planted there a garrison. All they that were brought to Rome, were in the market place scourged with rods, and beheaded, with the exceeding joy & contentment of all the commons, whom it concerned most, that the multitude which should be sent into sundrie Colonies, might in every place live in safetie, and securitie of their lives.

The Consuls being departed from Sora, marched forward to make warre upon the lands and territories of the Ausonians; for by the coming of the Samnites after the battaile of Lau- tula, they were all out, full of insurrections and commotions, and many conspiracies there were in all places about Campania: neither was Capua it selfe without blame and faultlesse. Nay, this matter passed as farre as to Rome, where information was made against some of the Nobles, and warning given to enquire into them. But the whole nation of the Ausonians, by reason that the Cities were betrayed like as Sora, was reduced under obedience to the people of Rome. Auso- nia, Minturne, and Vestina were the Cities, out of which, twelve of the chiefe young Gentlemen having conspired and sworn together to betray their owne Cities, presented themselves unto the Consuls; giving them to understand, that their countrymen wished long ago for the com- ming of the Samnites, and so soone as they heard of the battaile before Lautula, made account that the Romanes were utterly vanquished, & helped the Samnites both with men & munition. But now, say they, that the Samnites were chased from thence, they lived: unresolute in doubt- full termes of peace, and shut not their gates in dread upon the Romanes; for feare of bringing warre upon themselves, yet obstinately bent to shut them, if their army approached toward them. In this wavering and doubtfull floating of their minds, they might at unawares be sodainly sur- prised. By this perswasion of theirs, they encamped neerer, and at one and the selfesame time were souldiers sent about those three townes before named, some in armour closely to lye in ambush in convenient places neere the walles: others in side gownes with swords under them, who alittle before day, so soone as the gates were set open, should enter into those Cities. By whome the matter was so handled, that at one instant they began to kill the warders at the gates, and gave a signall to those armed souldiers who lay in ambush, for to rise all at once and come to succour.

succour. Thus were the gates seized and possessed, and three townes in one houre by the same stratageme surprized. But because this exploit was performed in the absence of the Captaines, there was no stay in execution and carnage, but beyond all measure, and without all mercy, no sexe nor age was spared: and so the whole nation of the Aufones, before they were detected for certaine of reuolt, was destroyed and extinguished, as if they had warred mortally, and bene at deadly feawd.

The same yeare Luceria came into the hands of the Samnites, by reason that the citie had betrayed and delivered the Romaine garison to them; but the traitors went not long unpunished for it. The Romaine armie chaunced to be not farre from thence, and at the first assault, the citie standing as it did on a plaine, was woon. The Lucernes and Samnites both were put to the sword every one: and so farre forth proceeded their furious rage, that when the Senat sat in counsel at Rome, about sending men to inhabit Luceria, many were of mind, that the citie itselfe should be rased to the ground and destroyed: for besides the cursed and execrable hatred they bare against them being twise conquered, and as often revolted; the distance also of the place so remote, caused them to mislike greatly, and abhorre the confining as it were of their citizens, so far from home, to live amongst such a kind of people so cruell and dangerous. Howbeit, their opinion tooke place and prevailed; who gave aduise, that Coloners and inhabitants should thither be sent, and to the number of 2500. were there planted.

The same yeare when as the Romaines found all unloyall unto them, and nothing but falsehood on all sides; at Capua also certaine secret conspiracies of the Nobles and best of the Citie were detected and revealed. Touching which, the Senates aduise was asked, and the matter not neglected by them, but commissions were appointed: and thought good it was that a Dictator should be nominate, for to sit upon the same commissions and inquisitions. And C. Manius was created, who named M. Fellius Generall of Horse. Great was the terror of that Magistrat, and thereupon, either for feare, or guiltesse of conscience, the two Calpurnij, Ovinus and Nervius, who were the chiefe of that complot, before information was given against them by name to the Dictator, died: and questionlesse by their own hands thorned their daies, & so avoided the trial of justice and punishment accordingly. After that, when the inquisition wanted subject matter once about the Capuans, the Inquisitors (by interpretation of the words in the commission) proceeded to Rome, saying, that the Senate had good warrant to make enquire and streight search, not by name and precisely, who at Capua onely; but generally, who in any place whatsoever, had used conventicles, and conspired against the Common-wealth; and all secret meetings, say they, & packings together, for to get dignities & Offices, were directly against the State & Common-wealth: so that the Commission extended larger both for person and reall action. Yea and the Dictator himselfe nothing gaine said, but that the vertue of his Commission was directed without limitation. Hereupon were certaine Gentlemen of the Nobility brought into question: and notwithstanding they called unto the Tribunes for to assit them, with interposing their negative, yet there was not one of them would succour and releeve them, but presentment was taken against them, and they indited. Then the Nobility, I meane not them alone who were in trouble, but generally the whole Gentrie of the City, at once, pleaded, That they were not the naturall & true Noblemen in deede, who were to be touched and charged with this crime: who if it were not for sinister and indirect courtes, had easie and open access unto all honourable places and promotions; but certaine new upstarts and Gentlemen of the first head: saying, That it was the very case of the Dictator himselfe, and his Generall of horse, who were rather parties guiltie, and offenders themselves, than sufficient inquisitors, and competent judges: and that should they well know and understand, when they were once out of their place and office. This made Manius to bestirre himselfe, who mindfull rather of his good name and reputation, than respectue of his high place and absolute government, went up into the common place of audience before all the people, and spake to this effect. My maisters and friends all, Citizens of Rome, well assured I am, that privie ye are to the whole carriage and course of my former life; and besides 22 that, even this very honor and dignitie which you have bestowed upon me, is able to testifie and 23 approve mine innocencie. For, to sit upon these inquisitions, there was not to be chosen now 24 for Dictator (as oftentimes heretofore, according to the dangerous occasions and necessitie of the time) a man reputed the best and noblest warrior of all other; but such a one, 25 as throughout his whole life hath most of all misliked and condemned ambitious conventicles.

Howbeit,

Manius the Dictator.

A Howbeit, for as much as certaine persons of noble lineage, (for what cause, it is more meet for you to deeme and judge, than for me being a Magistrat, to speake without booke, as they say, and upon no sure ground) first have endeavoured with all their might and maine to overthrow the procelle of the inquisition it self; and afterwards, seeing they were not able themselves to bring that about (notwithstanding they were Patritij) have fled to the holds of their very adversaries, even the protection of the Tribunes and their negative, rather than to iustifie themselves and stand to the trial of their cause: and at last having there also a repulse (thinking all means safer than to approve their innocencie) have fallen upon us, and bashed not (privat men as they are) to accuse and touch the person of him that is Dictator: to the end therefore, that both God and man, and all the world may know, that as they have assaied to compass that which they are not able to bring to passe, namely, to avoid the rendering an account of their life and demeanour; so, I am readie (to set forward their accusations) to offer my selfe unto mine adversaries; and giving them means to call mee to mine answer, here I resigne up my Dictatorship. And I beseech you, O Consuls, if so bee this charge bee laid on you by the Senate, to proceed in examination against mee first, and this gentleman the Generall of horse M. Fellius: that it may appeare, how we, through our owne innocencie alone, and not by the countenance and privileged of our dignitie and high calling, are protected and safe from these slanders and intended crimes. Herewith hee gave over his place of Dictator: and after him incontinently, M. Fellius yeelded up his rounne likewise of Generall over the horse. These persons were the first, who being charged and put to their trial judicially before the Consuls, (for to them by order from the Senate, was the commission directed) notwithstanding all the depositions and testimonies of the Patritij, were in every point found unguiltie, and acquit. P. Philo also, albeit hee had so many times attained to the supreme dignities of State, after he had atcheeved to many worthie deeds, as well in peace as warre, yet a man malliced or envied rather of the Nobilitie, was put to plead for himselfe, and finally absolved. But this inquirie into such men of name and qualitie, lasted no longer in force, (as it is usually seene) than whiles it was fresh, and in the first heat thereof. From them it began to fall to persons of lesse reckoning and baser account, untill such time, as by the same conventicles and factions, against which it was devised, it fell to the ground, and was troden underfoot.

The brunt of these things, and more than that, the hope of the Campaines revolt, whereto certaine had conspired and sworn (as ye have heard) recalled the Samnites backe againe to Caudio, who were turned & bent wholly into Apulia: that from thence, being so neer at hand unto Capua, they might (if haply any insurrection and trouble presented the ouverture and opportunity) seize upon it and take it perforce from the Romanes. Thither came the Consuls with a strong and mightie armie: and at the first they staied and lingered about the passes and streights, having on the one side & the other an ill way of passage unto the enemies. Afterwards the Samnites fetching a short compass about, came downe with their armie through the open places into the plains, I mean, the champaine countrie and fields about Capua. And that was the first time that the enemies had a sight one of the others campe. Whereupon by light skirmishes, on horsebacke oftener than on foot, they tried maisteries on either side: neither were the Romanes one jot discontented with the issue & event thereof, nor repented of the delay wherby they drew the warre alength. Contrariwise, the Samnite captaines perceived their forces to weare daily by small losses, and their courage to coole and decay evidently by that lingering war. Whereupon, they came abroad into the field, and devided their Cavallerie into wings: with a speciall charge, to have a more carefull eye backward toward their campe (for fear of any impression and assault that way) than to the maine battaile: which would be guarded safe enough by the infanterie. The Consuls marshalled themselves in this manner, Sulpitius led the right point of the battell, and Petilius the left: the right side (wheras the Samnites also were arraunged in thinner ranks and files, of purpose to compass and environ the enemies, or not to bee compassed and enclosed themselves) shewed itselfe more broad & open. They on the left hand, besides that they stood thicker and more close, were by occasion of a suddain policie of Petilius the Consul further strengthened. For those cohorts & bands which were reserved apart in the rereward, for help at any need, & kept fresh against all occurrents and hazards of long fight, he advanced presently to the forefront in the vaward, & with all his forces at once charged the enemy at the first encounter, & forced him to recule. When the footmen of the Samnites were thereby troubled and disarraied, the horsemen followed close and entered into the medley. But as they rode crosse and overthwart between the

the two hostes, the Romane horsemen pricked and gallopped their horses to flanke them; and disordred and hudled the ensignes, guidons, squadrons and troupes of foot and horse, pell-mell together, until he had caused the whole battaile of that side, to turne their backs. In this left point not Petilius alone, but Sulpitius also joined with him, and was present in person to exhort and encourage the souldiours: for he had transported and distracted himselfe from his owne men, who as yet were not come to joine battell at the crye and shout that arose first from the left side: and seeing on that part undoubted victorie, he went towards his owne charge, accompanied with a 1200 men: Where he found a change of fortune, namely, the Romans to have reculed and lost ground, and the enemy as victour, advancing forward his ensignes upon them fore dismaied and daunted. Howbeit, the Consull his coming made a present alteration: for both at the sight of their captaine were the souldiours hearts refreshed and comforted; and for to aid them, there came a greater supplie indeed, than in shew of number, of tall and lustie men. So when they heard first, and saw soone after, the victorie gotten of the other part, they renewed the fight, after this on all sides the Romanes had the better hand, and the Samnites giving over fight, were either slaine or taken prisoners: saving only those, who fled to Maleventum a town now named Beneventum. It is left in record, that there were upon 30000 Samnites, either left killed in the place, or brought away captive.

The Consuls having obtained this notable victorie, forthwith from thence lead their Legions, to lay siege unto Bovianum: and there wintered before the towne, untill such time as C. Petilius (chosen Dictatour together with M. Feltius his Generall of the horse, by the new Consuls L. Papyrius Cursus the fifth time, & C. Iun. Bubulcus the second time) received the armie at their hands. Who hearing, that the castle of Fregellæ was by the Samnites taken, left Bovianum, and went forward to Fregellæ, which he recovered again without drawing his sword; for that the enemies had quit the place, and were fled by night: and when hee had placed a strong garrison there, he returned from thence into Campania, of speciall purpose to regaine Nola by force of armes. Thither were retired within the walls, a little before the Dictatour his coming, both all the whole multitude of the Samnites, and the rusticall peasants about Nola. The Dictatour having viewed the situation of the towne, to the end hee might have the more open access to the wals, set all the houses on fire that were in the suburbs along the counter-carpe (and there they stood thicke and were well inhabited.) And not long after, whether it were by Petilius Dictatour (I know not) or C. Iunius Consull (for it is reported as well of the one as the other) Nola was forced & won. They that would draw unto the Consull the honour of winning Nola, ad moreover & say, That hee won also Arina and Calatia: and that Petilius upon a pestilence that began, was made Dictatour for the setting or fastening of a spike or great nail. Two Colonies that yeare were conducted to Sueffia and Pontia. Sueffia belonged to the Aurunci. The Volscians inhabited the lland Pontia, situate over against their owne shore within a kenning. And a decree passed from the Senate, that to Cassinum also, a third Colonie, there should be sent inhabitants. M. Valerius and P. Decius, the Consuls that next succeeded, ordained three Triumvirs, for that purpose, and sent foure thousand to people those places.

The warre with the Samnites was in a manner now dispatched and brought to an end: but before that the Nobles and Senators of Rome had left the care thereof, a brute was blowne of the Tufcanes warre. And there was not in those daies, another nation (setting the Gaules tumults aside) whose forces and hostilitie they more feared; for that their countrie was so neere a neighbour and so populous withall. Therefore, whiles one of the Consuls was occupied in dispatching the reliques of the warre in Samnium, P. Decius who staid at Rome grievously sicke, by authoritie of the Senate, named Dictatour C. Iunius Bubulcus. He according as the important affaires required, caused all the younger sort to take the militarie oath: and prest them for souldiours. Armour and whatsoever requisite besides, with great diligence he prepared. And albeit hee were thus furnished and well appointed, yet was hee nothing bold and forward to begin war, willing (no doubt) to be quiet and stand upon his guard, unless the Tufcanes shewed themselves first in armes. The same purpose had the Tufcanes also, both in preparing for war, and in making stay to begin war. So, of neither side they departed out of their owne limits.

In that yeare was there a famous Censurship of App. Claudius and C. Plautius. But the name of Appius became more memorable of the twaine, and of happier renowne unto posteritie, for that hee paved with stone the caufey or * Port-way (bearing his name) and conveyed a channell

A of *water into the cittie of Rome. Which worke hee finished alone, for that his Colleague for shame of an infamous and odious choise of certaine Senators which he made, gave over the office. But Appius having the stout stomack, engraffed in his name and house from the beginning, bare the Censurship alone. By the motion and meanes of the same Appius, the Pontif, to whose familie properly belonged the priestly service, at the alter of Hercules called Maximus, had taught certaine publicke servants (for that the function might be committed over to them as delegates) the solemne rites and ceremonies of that sacred ministration. Hereupon is reported a wonder to be spoken, and that which might strike a scruple of conscience, and make men afraid ever after, to alter any thing in religion from the former state and first institution. For whereas at the same time, there were twelve houses of the Pontif, and in them upon a thirtie that were above 14 years of age; within one year it (is said that) they died all, with their whole issue and off-spring. Moreover, that not onely the name of the Pontif became thus extinct, but that Appius also the Censor, within certaine yeares (such was the ire of the gods, mindfull of revenge) fell stark blind. Therefore the Consuls that followed in the next yeare, C. Iunius Bubulcus the third time, and Q. Amylius Barbulus the second time, in the very entrance of their office framed a complaint unto the people: That by the leawd and corrupt Election of some new Senators, that honourable state and order was deformed, & namely, how some were over-hipt, who were of more worth than those that were taken in: And saying plainly, That they would not observe & have in any regard, such a choice, which without respect of good and bad, was made for favor and affection to some, & at the pleasure of the Censors: and immediatly they cited the Senat by name in that order and forme, as had been used before the Censors, App. Claudius and C. Plautius.

C And in that yeare were two places of charge and command, first given by the people, both pertaining to warfare: the one, that sixteen Colonels for foure * Legions, should from that time forward by the people be created, which before were in a manner the gifts and favours, conferred by the Dictatours and Consuls; and few or none of the people had any hand or voice therein. This Act and Ordinance was propounded by L. Petilius and C. Martius, Tribunes of the Commons. The other was, That the same people should have the appointment and ordaining of two Duumvirs at sea, for the rigging, repairing, and trimming of the navie. The maker of this Act was M. Decius, another Tribune of the Commons.

I would let passe one thing that happened this yeare, as of small weight and importance, and not worth the speaking, but that it seemed a matter pertinent to religion. The minitrels that played upon the fluit and haut-bois, for that they were prohibited and debarred by the last Censors, to have their good cheare any more in the temple of Iupiter, according to an old custome and tradition; tooke snuffe thereat, and in a pelling chaufe all in one companie, went their waies to Tybur: so, as there was not one of them in the cittie left to sing and pipe before the pompe of sacrifices, and on their feastivall daies. The Senate made some conscience hercof, and were troubled in their mind. Whereupon they dispatched certaine messengers to Tybur, to travell with the townesmen, and endeavour all they could, that these good fellowes might bee restored and sent home againe to the Romanes. The Tyburines undertooke the matter, and promised right courteously to doe their best: and first they sent for these musicians into their towne hall, and persuaded with them to returne againe to Rome: but when they could not bee brought to that, for any thing they could do, then they wrought another pollicie and feat with them, that sorte and fitted well the humour of such kind of people, and of their coat. Upon a feastivall hollyday, under a colour of making merrie with minstrelsie and musicke about them, some invited one, and some another, to give them a fit of mirth accordingly. But they plyed them so with wine (which all the sort of this profession love but too well) that they dranke untill they wincked, and wincked so long, till they fell fast asleepe. And being found asleepe, the Tyburines brought them gently to their beds in certaine waggons, and thus bestowed, conveyed them to Rome. Neither perceived they ought, senselesse druncken nols they, before that their waggons were left in the market place of Rome. Nay, before they had slept out and concocted their wine that steemed up into their heads, and clouded there, the day light came upon them, & then they awoke.

F The people came running together from all parts to them, and after they had either gotten at their hands, or charged them to stay, and make no more such braides, it was graunted unto them that three daies every year, being disguised & dressed in a mask for the purpose, they might range and walke about the cittie, with singing, and founding their instruments, after this licentious manner.

* Out of the river Arno, and not called Aqua Claudia.

* A Legion consisted now of 4000 footmen: 300 horsemen: 100000 as other times, of 5000, 5000, 3000, and 6000, and the Colonies fewer or more in a Legion, according to the quantity thereof. There belonged besides to every Legion ordinarily 3000 footmen, whom the Tribunes or Colonels afore said had nothing to do, being cap-tives of 1000 foot a peece.

ner and iollitie, which now a daies is yearly used, and their priviledge of eating in the temple was restored to them again, namely to such as sung and plaied in time of their divine service and sacrifices: and all was well. This ridiculous pageant hapned amid the care and preparation of two great and dangerous warres.

The Consuls parted their provinces betweene them: To Iunius fell by lot the Samnites, to Aemilius the new warre in Hetruria. In Samnium, Cluvia, a fortreffe and hold of the Romanes being impregnable by any assault, was a long time besieged; and forced by extreame famine, was delivered up to the Samnites. After they were once masters of the fort, they tooke the garrison soldiers, and not withstanding they yeilded themselves, yet they whipped and tare their flesh most beastly, and in the end, without all mercy killed them. Iunius exceeding wroth at this crueltie, thinking nothing more needfull to be done first, than the winning againe of Cluvia, laid all other matters aside, and the same day that he assailed the wals, tooke it by force, and slue all he could finde above fourteene yeare of age. In this traine of victorie the armie was brought against Bovianum. This was the chiefe place of the Pentrians in Samnium, the welthiest citie, the best provided, and most furnished of all other with men and munition. The soldiours verie eager and sharpe set for hope of a rich pillage, wan the towne. But for that they were nothing so angrie & hote of revenge as before, they dealt not so cruelly with the enemies: but they got together and caried away more spoile and sackage from thence, than they ever had well nere, out of all Samnium; and as liberally was it bestowed everie whit upon the soldiours. And for as much as no pitched battaile in plaine field, no campe so well fortified, no cities and fortes howsoever fenced, were able to withstand the puissant Romanes in force of open armies: all the Princes in Samnium studied and applied their wits, to find meanes of sleight and subtilie pollicie; if haply, as they wasted and forced the territories after a loose and licentious manner, the armie disbanded once, might be entrapped and enclosed within some ambush. It fell out so, that certaine fugitive pezants of the countrie, and captives, some by chance and other of purpose, comming in their way, made relation of tidings to the Consuls, well agreeing all in one tale, and the same founding of a truth indeed; namely that a great sort of sheepe, and other cattell were driven together into a by-forest out of the way: and so induced them to lead thither the legions lightly armed, and to fit their hands with a fat bootie. Now the Samnites had privily forelaid all the high waies with a mightie armie, and after that they saw the Romanes to have entred and engaged themselves within the chafe or Forrest aforesaid, all of a suddaine they rose up and with a great crie and shout ran upon them to charge them when they least thought of any such thing. At the first this so strange and unexpected occurrence, made them afraid, while they tooke them to their weapons, and laid their fardels and baggage together on a heape in the mids. But after that every man was eased of his lode, and had put on his armor, they rallied on all sides to their ensignes; and without the commaundement or direction of any man, they of themselves put the battaile in array, ech one knowing his raunge and place according to the accustomed order of the ancient Militarie discipline. The Consull perceiving that hee was brought to a most doubtfull and dangerous battaile, alight from his horse; and protested before Jupiter and Mars, & the other gods whom he called all to witnesse: That he came not into that place to get glorie to himselfe by any enterprise, but onely a bootie for his soldiours: and that no fault else could be imputed unto him, but an overmuch desire and affection of his, to enrich his soldiours by the spoile of the enemy. From which blame and shame both, nothing could free and acquitte him else, but the manhood and proesse of his soldiours: exhorting them with one accord, but to staie themselves and endeavour all together to set upon their enemy, defeated and vanquished in battaile, driven out of campe and field, bereaved of his townes and strong holds, and come now to attempt his last and utmost hope, of privie & cheevish traines of forlayning, trusting vpon the vantage of the ground, and not pure force of armes. But what place is there now unaccessibile or unpregnable to the valiant Romanes? Heerewithall he named the castle of Fregelle and Sora, and what place of disadvantage and hard access soever, they had woon by force. With these words the soldiours encouraged and enflamed, forgetting all difficulties and dangers, marched apace & advanced forward up to the armie of the enemies that now approached them, and were over their heads. Where the Romanes found some difficultie, all the while they climed up the cliffe or ridge of the hill against them. But after that the foremost ensignes were mounted up and had gained the plaine in the top, and perceived they were embattailed upon an even and the first of the warre.

A equall ground, presently the terror turned upon those that lay in waite for them, and being disbanded, scattered, and driven to fling away their weapons, they fled and trudge as fast as they could, to recover againe those starting and lurking holes, wherein before they had hidden themselves. But even those difficult places which they had sought of purpose for their enemy, and their owne deceit and guile, encumbered themselves. For verie few of them could find the way out, and escape by flight. In somuch as to the number of 20000 were slaine. And then the Romanes after this victorie, ran up and downe at their pleasure, to that bootie of sheepe and cattell, which was first presented unto them by the enemy, as a baite to catch them with.

Whiles these things thus went in Samnium, all the people of Hetruria by this time, but only the Aretines, were up in armes, and entred into a right great warre; beginning first with the siege and assault of Sutrium: which citie being allied to the Romanes, was (as a man would say) the verie Barriers of all Hetruria. Thither came the other Consull Aemilius with an armie, to rescue & deliver their allies, and to raise the siege. Against the Romanes comming, the Sutrines courteously brought victuals for the campe, lying before the citie. The Tuscans spent the first daie, in consulting whether they should make a short warre of it, by hot assaults, or temporise and protract the time by lingering siege. The morrow after, when as the captaines liked rather of expedition and hastie courses, than of more sage and safe proceedings, at the sunne rising they set out a flag of defiance and the signall of battel, & armed they go forth of their camp into the open field to fight. Which after it was told the Consull, presently he commaunded a watchword to be given, that the soldiours should take their breakfast: and after they had refreshed and strengthened their bodies with food, go freight to arme themselves: which was obeyed accordingly. The Consull seeing them well appointed in rediness, commaunded the ensignes to advance forward out of the rampier, and not farre from the enemy marshalled his battailes. For a good while they stood on both sides, wistly looking, & waiting that the shout and charge should begin from the adverse part. But it was past noone before there was one dart flung or javelin lanced, either from the one side or the other. But then, because they should not go away without doing somewhat, the Tuscans began to set up a crie, the trumpets found the charge, and the standers came forward. Neither were the Romanes any jot behind to begin battaile. Thus they ran to it, and encountred with exceeding animositie and furie; the enemies more in number, the Romanes better in hardines & vertue. The fight was doubtful, & dangerous, and cost the life of many a man on both sides, and namely, those that were most forward and valiant: neither began they to shrink on any part, before that the second battalion of the Romanes, fresh and lustie, advanced to the forefront of the vanguard, into the place of their wearied fellows. The Tuscans, for that their vaward was not supplied and reenforced by any new succours, both before and all about their ensignes were beaten downe and slaine everie man. Never in any one battaile had there been lesse running away, or more bloudshed, if the night had not protected the Tuscans: so resolute were they all to die in the place: in so much as the winners gave over play before the loofers. After the sunne set, the retreat was sounded: and by night both parts returned into the campe. After this, no exploit was performed before Sutrium that yeare, worth remembrance: both for that, the foreward of the enemies armie, was wholly in that one battaile defeated & destroyed; and they had none left but the Subsidiarie soldiours of the rereward, & those hardly able and sufficient to gard and defend the campe: and also, the Romanes were so hurt and sore wounded that there were more of them died after the battaile of their hurts, than were slaine in the verie medley outright. Q. Fabius Consull for the yeare following, succeeded and entered upon this warre at Sutrium. And for his colleague he had C. Martius Rutilius: and like as Fabius brought a new supply from Rome to furnish out the broken bands, so there came fresh forces also unto the Tuscans, levied at home.

For many years there had been no jarres and debates, between the magistrats of the Nobilitie and the Tribunes of the Commons: but now there began a variance and contention, out of that familie and house, which even then was fatall (as it were) and born to do mischief to the Tribunes & Commons both. Appius Claudius the Cenfor, after eighteen moneths expired (which by the law Aemilia, was the full terme of bearing that Magistracie) notwithstanding that C. Plautius his colleague, had given up his office; could by no meanes possible be forced himselfe to go out and give over the place. Then rose up one P. Sempronius, a Tribune of the Commons, who tooke in hand this matter, as touching the demission of the Censureship, within the time prefixed by the law: an action doubtlesse, not more popular than just and rightfull, nor lesse acceptable to the better sort, than pleasing to the verie Commons and base people. He having estoones rehearsed and reiterated the law Æmylia, extolled with prayles up to the skye, the author and maker thereof, Mamercus Æmylius a Dictator; who had reduced the Censorship, an office a foretime of five yeares continuance (a puissance and authoritie, which by the length thereof favored of Lordship) within the compasse of a yeare and fixe moneths. Come on, quoth he Ap. Claudius, answere and say, what you would have done in case you had bene Censor, when C. Furius and M. Giganus were Censors? Appius answered and said, that this demaund and question of the Tribune, did not greatly touch or concerne his cause. For put the case, that the law Æmylia had obliged those Censors, during whose magistracie the Act was made, (for that after those Censors created, the people had graunted that law, and looke what they last allowed and ordeined, the same was good, lawfull, and ratified) yet neither he nor any of them, who after that law enacted were created Censors, could be bound by vertue of that law. Whiles Appius thus cavilled, and no man there present footed him up, or gave applause and assent unto him: Behold Quirites, quoth Sempronius, againe, the progenie and race of that Appius, who being created Decenvir for one yeare, elected himselfe the second yeare: and in the third, being chosen neither by himselfe nor by any other, in qualitie of a private person, held the soveraigne dignitie and government, with all the regall marks and ensignes thereof: and thus continuing still in rule and dominion, would never give over, before that those usurped governments of his, ill gotten, badly borne, and naughtily kept and retained, were his finall fall and utter overthrow. This is the same family and house, (my maisters and friends, citizens of Rome) by whose violence, by whose wrongs and oppression, ye were driven like poore banished persons to forgo your owne deere native cuntry, and to seise and hold the Mount Sacer; the very same, against which ye procured and purchased to your selves, the support and helpe of Tribunes; the same, for which with two armies ye were faine to possesse your selves of the Aventine hill; the same, that alwayes withstood the Statutes devised against Vsurie; the same, that ever impugned the lawes for division of wast lands among the people; the same brake for the time, and interrupted the mariages betweene the Nobles and commons; the same kept out the commons so long from bearing any Dignities of the Chaire, and of Seate: finally, this name is much more spightfully and mortally bent against your freedome, than that of the Tarquines. And is it so indeede, Ap. Claudius? would you have vs beleieve, that being now an hundred yeares since Mamercus Æmylius was Dictator, there have bene so many Censors most noble and valiant personages, that none of them all ever read the twelve Tables? and none of them knew that to be law which the people last granted and allowed? Yes ywis, they all wist that well enough: and thereupon yeelded they, and obeyed rather the law Æmylia, than the old and auncient Statute, (whereby at first Censors were created in the common wealth) even because the people approved it last: and by reason, that where there are two ordinances repugnant and contrarie one to the other, there the new, alwayes repealeth and abrogateth the old. And is this your saying, Ap. Claudius? That the people are not bound to the law Æmylia? or rather that they are tyed unto it, but your good selfe alone, is free and exempt therefro? Vvas the law Æmylia able to bridle and curb those violent Censors C. Furius, and M. Giganus, who shewed sufficiently what harme and mischief this magistracie could do in a common-wealth, when for anger and despite that their terme was abridged and cut short, they disfranchised, and deprived of the right of voyce and Suffrage, yea and brought within the raunge of Tributaries, M. Æmylius the worthiest and most excellent personage of his time, both at home in peace, and abroad in warre? This law tooke hold of all the Censors, one after another in order, for the space of an hundred yeares after; and bindeth now C. Plautius your Colleague, created with the same Auspices, and in equall authoritie with you. Tell me (I pray you) did not the people elect and make him with as good right and authoritie, as any Cenfor might be? Are you the only and speciaall man among (all others, to have this prerogative, this privilege and singular preeminence by your selfe? Suppose a man should create the King Sacrificer, should he, having once gotten the name and title of a King, give out and avouch, that he was a King indeede, of as great a prerogative as any King of Rome? Who, thinke you, will be content with a Dictatorship of fixe moneths, or with an interreigne for five dayes and no more? Whom may a man boldly and confidently create Dictator, either to fasten a spike or great naile? or for the stately playes and games, or horserunning, and such

Claudius Appianus

A such like? How foolish, thinke ye my maisters, how base-minded and simple were they in this? man his conceipt, who within twentie dayes, after notable exploits done & achieved, gave over their Dictatorship? or they that being created, with some error and default, went out of their place? But what neede I to rehearse examples of old date? Of late, even within these ten yeares, C. Menius Dictator, for enforcing a commission more severely, than stood with the safetie of some great & welthie persons, was charged by them with the guiltinesse of the same crime, whereupon he fate & made inquisition; who, to the end, that being a private person, he might answere the accusation of his adversaries, and justifie himselfe, resigned up his Dictatorship. But I would not, that you in any hand, were so modest: no, no, degenerate not a jot from that most imperious stock and proud race: go not you forth of your office, howsoever you do, a day, no nor an houre sooner, than you needs must: but see then withall, that you exceede not the ordinary time limited and set downe. At lest wise, it might content you to draw out your Censureship a day longer, or to stretch it farther by a moneth. A moneth? what tell you me of a moneth? I will exercise my Censorship (quoth he) three yeares and fixe moneths, more than may be by the law Æmylia: yea, and by my selfe alone will I exercise it. Yea mary fir, this is somewhat like indeede, and spoken like a King. What? will you substitute unto you a Colleague in the roume of the other? will you so? to whome lawfull it is not to be subrogated and chosen, no not in the dead his place? for you thinke it not enough, belike, that you (religious holy Cenfour that you be) have translated and transmitted, that most auncient solemnitie, and onely instituted by that good [Hercules] in whose honor it is celebrated, from the function of most noble Sacrificers and Chaplaines, of that divine and sacred service, unto the ministerie of base servants, and abject slaves: and that a kindred and lineage of greater antiquitie, than the very first foundation of this citie, so sanctified by interteinment and lodging of the immortall gods, by your meanes, and by occasion of your Censorship, within one yeare is rooted out and perished every mothers sonne: unlesse also by the same meanes, you hazard the whole common-wealth, and bring all into the same enormitie, & guilt of wickednesse, which even to offe & bode, my heart doth tremble and quake againe. In that Lustrum [or 5 yeares space] was the citie of Rome taken by the Gaules, wherein L. Papyrius Cursor, because he might not go out of his Censorship, tooke a colleague unto him, M. Cornel. Maluginensis, in the place of C. Julius the Cenfor late deceased. And yet see, how much more sober and moderate was his ambitious humor in that behalfe, than this of yours, Ap. Claudius. For L. Papyrius neither alone, nor yet beyond the just set time by law, administrated his Censorship: yet found he never any one person after him, that would imitate and follow his example. All Censors from that time forward afterwards, upon the death of their fellow Cenfor, gave up the office. But as for you, notwithstanding that the date of your Censorship be fully out, and your companion in government departed out of the place; neither law nor shame, is able to rule and restraîne. You suppose that vertue consisteth in pride, in audacious boldnesse, in contempt both of God and man. For mine owne part truly, Ap. Claudius, for the reverence and majestie of this honorable place, which you have borne, I would not willingly enter into any such hard courtes, as to touch your person by violence of hand; no nor so much as to offend your name with any soule or unkind language. But as, these words that have already passed, your own peevish & perverse frowardnesse, your opinative contumacie, and insolent pride, have wrung & forced from me: so unlesse you will obey the law Æmylia, by your leave, I will be so bould as commaund you to ward and prison. And since our forefathers and auncestors have so provided and ordeined, that in the Election of Censors, if either of the twaine come short of sufficient voices requisite for to choose him, the other can not be admitted and declared Cenfor; and so they must proceede againe to a new election, and the former Scrutinies are of no effect: shall I suffer you to exercise the Censorship alone, who may not lawfully be created alone? These and such like remonstrances after he had alledged, he commaunded the Cenfor to be attached and committed. In these proceedings of his, fixe of his fellow Tribunes adhered unto him, and three onely assisted Appius; who called instantly upon them for their protection and lawfull succour: and so with exceeding ill will, and highest discontentment of all states and degrees, he went cleere away, and bare the Censorship alone.

These matters thus passed at Rome, & Sutrium was besieged still by the Tuskans: and as the Conf. Fabius was leading about at the foot of the hills, certain forces to succour his allies, & to as-

saile the fortifications of the enemies what way he could, they with an armie in battaile array met G with him. Whole great multitude when hee might discover upon the plaines underneath, because he would helpe out the small number of his men by some advantage of the ground, he wheeled a little about, up toward the hill tops (which were rough and craggie places spread all over with stones) and from thence he turned his banners full upon the face of the enemies. The Tuscans forgetting all things else, and thinking upon nothing but their multitude, whereof onely they presumed; gave battaile so hastily and in such greedinesse, that casting away their shot and darts from them, to the end they might the sooner come to hand strokes, they drew their swords, as they marched against the enemy. The Romanes on the contrarie side, laid load with shot, and plicd them one while with darts, another while with the stones which the place plentifully afforded them. Which, as they thumped and clattered, and stucke upon their H shields and morions, although they hurt them not much, yet masked them not a little: neither could the enemies easely come within them to fight neere and close, nor any darts or javelins had they to sling and lance as farre off, and thereby to annoy their enemy. And whiles they stood still exposed as butts, to receive all that came, and had nothing now to cover & protect them sufficiently; whiles some of them also gave ground & reculed, and the whole battell was wavering and unsteadie, the Roman Hastati & Principes, came forward with a new shout, & charged them a fresh. This violent assault could not the Tuscans beare, but turning their ensignes, fled a maine in disaray toward their camp. But when as the Roman horsemen who were ridden over through the plaines and had gotten before, met them afront in the rout, they left their way unto the campe, and turned toward the mountains: from whence with their whole companie in a manner disarmed & sore wounded, they recovered the Forrest Ciminia. The Romanes having slaine I many thousands of the Tuscans, gained thirtie eight ensignes of the field, and wan also their tents with rich pillage; began to consult about pursuing the enemy. The wood Ciminia was at that time more unpassable and to be feared, than were of late daies the German Forrests: for never to that day had it bene travailed and frequented so much as by merchants. And scarcely any one but the captaine himselfe durst venture to enter into it: for, all the rest had not forgotten as yet the unhappy lucke they had at Caudium. Then the Consul his brother, one that was there, (M. Fabius, as some say, as others, Cato, and as other some C. Claudius, his brother only by the mother side) promised that he would go as a skout in spiall, to descric the wood, and within a while bring certaine newes. He had in his tender yeares been brought up at Cere, among the K ancient friends of his house & familie, where afterwards he was taught the Tuscan learning and knowledge, and thereby was perfect in their tongue and language. And I find some authors of credit that write, how in those daies the Romanes yong children went to schoole for to learne to parle Tuscan, as now they do to speake Greeke. But it standeth more like a truth, that there was some speciall matter in this man, who with so bold semblance and dissimulation, durst intrude and insinuate himselfe amongst the enemies. It is said, that one onely servitour accompanied him, one who had bene brought up and noursed together with him, and thereupon not ignorant of the same language. And all the way as they went they did nothing else, but superficially and after a generall sort, learne the nature and site of the quarters which they were to enter into, and the names withall, of the chiefe rulers & principall personages of that countrie and nation: to the end that in their speech and talke, they might not falter and trip, & be taken tardie in any apparent thing, which might bewray and discover them. They went clad in pastorall weeds like herdsmen, armed like countrie Kernes or peasants, each of them with a faulchion and two javelins. But neither the familiar use and commerce of the tongue, nor the fashion of apparel which they wore, or weapons that they caried, saved them so much as this one thing, That no man would ever believe, that any foreiner and stranger durst enter upon those thicke Ciminian Forrests. Well, forward they went (by report) as farre as to the Camertines in Vmbria. There, the Romanes ventured to bewray who they were: and when he was brought into their Senat, he treated with them in the Consuls name, about a league and amitie. Whereupon, after he had bene courteously entertained and friendly intreated, he had his dispatch, and was willed to relate M to the Romans, That there should be readie for their armie, sufficient victuals for one whole month, if they would come into those parts: Also, that the youth of the Camertines in Vmbria should be at their command, prest in armes at all times. These tidings being reported to the Consul, after that he had sent before his cariages at the first watch of the night, and commanded the legions

- A legions to goe after, himselfe staid still with the horsemen: and the morrow morning by daylight he began to skirmish with the corps de guard of his enemies, which were quartered without the Forrest, and when he had long ynough kept them play, & amused them at his pleasure, hee retired into his camp; from whence he went forth at another gate, and before night overtaketh the main armie. The morrow after, at the point of day break, he was gotten up to the crell of the hill Ciminus: from whence, after he had beheld & viewed the goodly prospect of the rich grounds and fields of Hetruria, hee sendeth out his souldiours abroad to forage and fetch in prizes, and by that time they had gotten, and were driving away a fat bootie, certaine tumultuarie bands of the rusticall peasants of Hetruria, gathered together in great haile, and of a suddain, by the States of that countrie, met with the Romanes; but so out of order were they, that being come to rescue B a prey, they had like to have ben a prey themselves. A number of them were slain or put to flight, and the Romanes, having wasted and made spoile all over the countrie, enriched with store of all things, returned victorious into their camp. Thither were arrived (as it selfe out) five messengers or purlevants with the Trib. of the Com. to warn & command Fabius in the name of the Senat, not to passe through the Forrest Ciminus. But these messengers being glad that they came too late for to hinder and interrupt their enterprises, returned home again to Rome with news of the victorie.
- By this expedition and journe made by the Cos. the war rather encreased and spread farther, than was dispatched and brought to an end. For all that tract lying along the bottome & foot of the mountain Ciminus, felt the smart of this rode: and provoked to anger & desire of revenge, nor only the States of Hetruria, but also the borders and marches of Vmbria. Whereupon there came to Sutrium, a greater power than ever afore: for not only they removed their camp forward C out of the woods, but also for eager desire of fight with all speed, they come abroad into the plain field. Afterwards, they stood first embattelled in a plot, by them fitly chosen, leaving over against them a space of ground for the enemies to set themselves in order of battell: but perceiving the enemies to fall off, and no point fight, they approached the very trench and rampiers; but finding there, that the sentinels & guards were retired within their hold, al at once they began to crie with one voice to their captaines, for to give order, That the rest of their allowance of victuals for that day, should be brought them thither out of the camp; for they would stay in their armor and liarnies, as they were, & either in the night, or els in the morning betimes by daylight, give the assault upon their enemies campe. The Roman armie was no more quiet than they, yet at their Generals D commandement kept in. Now it was welnear the * tenth houre of the day. When as the Consul * Future a clocke after noone. willed his souldiours to take their refection, and warned them to be readie in armes at what hour soever by day or by night, hee should give them the signall of battaile. And in the meane time maketh a short speech unto them, praising highly, and setting out the Samnites wares, debasing the Tuscans, saying, that there was no comparison betwene either enemy to enemy, or number for number: over and besides, he said that he had another feat and secret devise in store for them, which they should know when time served; in the meane while they must keepe silence of necessitie, and hold their peace. By these darke speeches and hidden mysteries, hee made semblance, as though hee had some privie intelligence, that one part of the enemies would betray the rest when time came: this did he, to the end, that the hearts of his souldiours (which haply E were dismayed and discouraged at their great multitudes) might be comforted and refreshed: and for that the enemies lay abroad in field without any hold and fort, it was more likely & probable, which he pretended. The souldiours having taken their repast, they laid their bodies to repose and sleepe, and somewhat before the releefe of the * fourth watch, they were raised without noise, and armed themselves. The souldiours boies & lackies, and such as followed the campe, had mattocks and spades divided amongst them, to cast downe the rampire, and to fill up the ditches with the banke, whiles that within the compasse and circuit of the campe, they were marshalled in battaile array. The chosen * cohorts or bands were placed at the gates and passages forth. Then at the sound of trumpet, a little before day (which in summer nights, is the time of the deepest and soundest sleepe) the whole armie, when the rampire was laid along and levell, issued forth at F once, and charged the enemies on all sides, lying here and there scattered on the ground. Some before they were stirring, others halfe asleepe and halfe awake in their couches; but the greatest part, making haile in that suddaine fright to take armes, were slaine & cut in peeces. Few had time to put themselves in armour, and they having no ensignes, no colours to follow, and no captains to direct them, were by the Romans soone discomfited, put to flight, and pursued in chace. Some made made halt to the campe, other to the woods, sundrie waies one from another. But the woods were the safest place of refuge. For their campe pitched in a plaine, was the same day taken and woon. All the gold and silver there found, was by expresse commandement brought unto the Consull his pavilion; the rest of the pillage, was the souldiours share. Slaine and taken prisoners that day, there were of the enemies to the number of 60000. This so noble battaile (some writers say) was fought on the other side of the wood Ciminia, before Perusia: who also report, that the citie of Rome was in great feare, least that the armie being enclosed within so dangerous a wood, should have been surprised and defeated by the Tuscans and Vmbrians, who were risen up in armes together from all parts. But whersoever it was fought, the Romanes had the day. Whereupon there came Embassadors from Perusia, * Cortona, & * Arretium, which were in manner the chiefe and principall citties at that time of all Tuscan, treating and suing to the Romanes for peace, and a league: but they obtained truce onely for thirtie yeares.

During these affaires in Hetruria, the other Consull, C. Marius Rutilius, wan from the Samnites the towne * Allifas. Many other villages and castles were either utterly demolished & destroyed by way of extreame hostilitie, or yelded safe and whole unto their subjection. At the same time the Romanie navie also, under the conduct of P. Cornelius, whom the Senate ordained Admirall of the seacoast, set saile for Campanie; & being arrived at * Pompeij, the mariners and sea-servitors went a land to wast & harrie the territorie about * Nuceria: and after they had made spoile, and pilled by snatches the parts lying neere unto the sea, from whence they might safely againe returne to their ships; they adventured farther for sweetnesse of gaine and bootie (as usually it falleth out) and so gave the al' arme to the enemies for to rise. As they stragled all over the fields, no man made head against them, at what time, as they might have bene soone slaine every one: but as they were returning with a disordered march, and stood not upon their guards, a troupe of the peasants of the countrie overtook them, not farre from their ships, and cased them of their spoile and pillage, and slew some of them: the rest of the multitude, as many as escaped the sword, were chased to their fleet.

The journey of Q. Fabius beyond the Forrest Ciminia, as it caused great feare in Rome, so it gave occasion of as joyfull newes in Samnium. For the rumour ran, that the Romanie armie was shut up and besieged. And hereupon they called to remembrance, and alleadged the like example of a losse and shamefull disgrace at Caudium; reporting and giving forth, that these Romans being a nation greedie alwaies of encroching farther, and winning more ground, were through the same rashnesse now runne headlong into the blinde Forrests impassable, and environned not so much with the power and force of enemies, as the dangerous difficulties of those passages. In such sort as amid this joy of theirs, they envied also that fortune had turned the glorious honour of the conquest over the Romanes, from the Samnites to the Tuscans. And therefore being well appointed with men and armour, they ran out from all parts, to tread down and confound C. Marius the Consull for ever: minding from thence, in case Marius would not abide a battell, to goe into Hetruria through the Marsi and Sabines. But the Consull met with them by the way; where was fought a sharpe and cruell battell with doubtfull event, and much effusion of blood on both sides. And, as uncertaine as it was, whether part lost more blood, yet the rumour went, that the Romans had the worse, by reason of the losse of certain knights and gentlemen of Rome, and Colonels, and one Lieutenant; and that which made most, for that the Consull himselfe was hurt. Hereupon the brute (as commonly is scene) got more feathers still as it flew, and made every thing greater: so as the LL. of the Senat in Rome, were in great feare and perplexitie, and agreed to create a Dictatour. Neither was there any doubt at all, but that Papirius Cursor should be the man, who in those daies was reputed the onely warriour above all others. But neither could they be assured of sending a messenger safely into Samnium (considering all the countrie was up in armes) nor that the Consull was for certaine alive. And as for the other Consull Fabius, upon an old secret and privat grudge, he maliced Papirius: which quarell, least it might hinder the service of the Commonweale, the Senate thought good to send unto him certaine Embassadors (as it were) even such as had bene Consuls; who of their owne authoritie, as well as by vertue of publick commission from the State, should admonish and counsell him to remit and forget all old displeasures and rancours, for his countries sake. When these personages were come to Fabius the Cos. and had delivered unto him the decree of the Senate, and used withall such speech & reasons of their own, as suited well to the errand they had in charge: the Cos. casting his eyes downe toward the ground, departed from the embassadors without giving ever a word, and left them doubtfull what he would doe. But the night following, in the dead time (as the manner is) he nominated L. Papirius for Dictator. And when these messengers or embassadors gave him great thanks for mastering and ruling his affections so exceeding well, he held his resolution still of silence, and without any answer given, or mention made of himselfe, dismissed them; that it might appeare, how upon a high mind and haughtie stomacke, he bridled and kept in that griefe of heart, and despitous anger of his. Papirius named C. Iunius Bubulcus commander of the horse. And whiles he proposed an act concerning the regiment & command of his armie, before the people assembled by the Curia or wards, there hapned a matter of ominous presage, which caused that businesse to be put off until the next day: for that the ward Fautia, which by lot had the prerogative now to give the first voices, was noted already for infamous and unhappie, in regard of two calamities which fortun'd in both yeares, wherein the same Curia likewise began the suffrages first; namely, the taking of the citie of Rome, and the Caudine peace. Macer Licinius maketh that ward ominous and unluckie, for a third losse and calamitie received at Créméra. But the next morrow, the Dictator, after he had taken new Auspices, went through with the act, and obtained his commission, and set forward with the legions lately mustered and enrolled upon the fearefull alarme given, that the Romanie armie was passed the wood Ciminia, until he arrived at Longula: where, after he had received of the Consull Marius, the old bands of souldiers, he brought his forces into the field to give battaile. The enemies for their part seemed not to refuse fight: howbeit, as they stood armed and arranged, and neither the one side nor the other would begin to charge, the night came upon them, and forced them to retire. Then they abode encamped neere together in rest and quiet for certaine dayes, neither distrusting their owne puissance, nor yet disdaining and despising their enemies. In this meane time there was some doings & war in Etruria; for both there was a battaile fought with the armie of the Vmbrians: howbeit, the enemies were rather discomfited and put to flight than slain, for that they were not able to hold out and maintain fight long with such courage and animositie as they began: and also neer the lake & Meer * Vadimon, the Tuskans had levied a new armie, according to a sacred law, whereby one man had chosen another (who as sworn brethren were to live and dye together) where they fought a field, not onely with greater number, but also with more courage than ever at any time before; and with such heate of anger and malice one against the other they encountred, that on neither side they thought of discharging shot and launching darts, but began at first with their very swords to go to handstrokes: and the conflict being right fiercely begun, increased still, and waxed hotter in the very medley, and continued for a good while so doubtfull, that the Romanes thought they dealt not with Tuskans so often by them defeated and vanquished, but with some new nation more warlike than they. No shew of flight on neither side; downe go the formost, and lay dead before their Standards: and least that the ensignes should be left naked and bare, and without defendants, the second rancke and ward of the battaillon came in place to supply the first: and so still new succours and fresh were set even as farre as from the rereward behind, destined for the last help and utmost refuge. And to that extremitie of travel and perill they proceeded, that the Romanie horsemen abandoning their horses alighted on foot, & were faine to go to the footemen in the forefront of the vaward, over armor, and over dead bodies, lying all spread upon the ground: which new troupe & battaillon risen and sprung (as it were) afresh, to reenforce and strengthen their distressed fellows, disordered the squadrons and ensignes of the Tuskans. The other legionarie souldiours, wearied (as they were) followed hard, and seconded their violence and forceable charge, and at length brake through the ranks of their enemies. Then the Tuskans as stiffe as they stood afore, began to have the worse, and certain bands gave side and reculed: and when they once turned back, they fell plainely to take their heeles and run away. This was the first day, that overthrow and laid along the puissance of the Tuskans, who abounded so long in wealth and fortunate prosperitie. Their whole floure and strength which they had, was in this battaile slaine, and at the same vie their camp woon and ransaked.

With like hazard and glorious successe in the end, was the warre managed with the Samnites soone after; who besides all other preparations and ordinarie furniture of warre, gave order that their armie should glitter and shine againe with a new kind of garnishing their harness and armours. For having divided their forces in two armies, the one had laied their sheelds with gold, the other with silver. The forme and fashion whereof was this, that upper part wherewith the G breft and fhoulders are covered, was broader, and the head of it of even heighth; but the nether end growing downward to the bottome was more pointed wedgewife, for to weld it more nimble: Their breft & fto:ack was fenced with fponges, the left leg armed with a good greeve, their morions with high crefts made a fhew of tall stature. The fouldiers aforefaid with gilded fhields, wore coates of funderie colours; the other with filvered, white linnen: and thefe had the leading of the right wing, or point of the battaile; but they of the left. The Romanes had a notice and knowledge alreadie what preparation there was of brave and goodly armour: and their Captaines had taught them afore, That a fouldier ought to be dreadfull and terrible, not dight and decked in his damasked gold and filver, but trufting in the fharp edge of yron and fteele, and a good heart and courage withall: and as for that other furniture, it was rather a good H bootie than armour of prooffe; faire and replendent, before men come to the fharp, but foule and unfeemly amongst bloudie wounds. The true ornament and beautie of a fouldier, is valour and hardineffe; as for all thofe braveries, they went commonly with victorie: and to conclude, that a rich enemy would ferve well for a good prize to the conquerour, were he never fo poore and needie. With thefe fpeeches, after that Curfor had animated his fouldiers, he leade them into the field: himfelfe he put in the right wing: the left he committed to the conduct of the Generall of horfe. So foone as they charged one another, and buckled together, a great conflikt and hardie had they with the enemy, and no leffe emulation there was betwene the Dictator and him; ftiving avie whether of them twaine fhould begin the victorie. But as hap was, firft I Iunius difordred the enemy, and from the left point which he commanded, he charged right lufily the right wing of the enemies: faying ever and anon, That he offered & facrificed unto the Devill and infernall fpirits, thofe fouldiers of theirs, consecrated alreadie unto them after the manner of the Samnites, and decked accordingly in white liverie, & bright filvered armour, fitting in colour thereunto: and withall advanced forward his ftanderds, brake their araes, and made the battaile to shrinke evidently & recule. Which when the Dictator perceived, How now quoth he, fhall the victorie begin at the left wing, and fhall the right, wherein the Dictator fight-teth in perfon, come behind and follow the battaile of another, and not cary away with it the greateft part of the victorie? Herewith he feteth on his fouldiours, yet gave the horfemen no place in manhood to the footemen, nor the fervice of the Lieutenants was inferiour to the Captaines themfelves and chiefe commanders: M. Valerius on the right point, P. Decius on K the left, both Confular men, put themfelves forward, & rode out to the horfemen arranged in the wings, exhorted them to take part with them in honor, and charged acroffe upon the fides and flanks of the enemies. While this new terror upon the former, had on every fide entred the bat-taille of the enemies; and the Romane legions, to terrifie them the more, had redoubled a frefh fhout, and charged them with great furie, then began the Samnites to flie amaine. Now were the fields overfpread with the bodies of flaine men, & ftrewed thick with armour, erewhile fo brave & glorious: and at the firft, the Samnites in great affright recovered their tents; but being there, were not able fo much as to keepe them, for they were woon and rifled before night, and fire fet upon them. The Dictator by a decree of the Senate triumphed: and the faid armour which was taken from the enemy, made the goodlieft pageant of all other, in the pomp of triumph: L which caried fo ftately a fhewe and magnificent, that the gilded fhields were divided amongft the warders of the companie of Bankers and Goldfmiths, to the beautifying of their Hall and Marker place. And hereof began firft the custome of the Ediles, to adorne and fet out the common place of the citie in their folemne proceffions, when the fared images of the gods, and holie reliques were caried about for pomp in filver chariots. And the Romanes verily for their part put this goodly trim armour of their enemies to this ufe, namely, to honor their gods withall. But the Campaines upon a pride, and inveterate hatred that they bare againft the Samnites, ufed to arme their fwordplayers and fencers at the fharp (which was a folemne fight and paffime they had at their great feasts) with this fame attire, and termed them in mockerie, by the name of Samnites.

* Perugia.

The fame yeer Fabius the Confull fought with the reft of the Tufcanes at Perusia* (which cittie alfo had broken the covenant of truce) where neither doubtfully nor hardly hee obtained vic-torie. And the very towne it felfe he had forced and woon (for in the fame train of his conquelt hee approached the wals) but that their Embaffadours came forth and yeelded the citie. When he

A he had placed a good garifon at Perusia, and fent before him to Rome unto the Senate, the Embaffadors of Hetruria, who treated for peace; he being but Confull, made his triumphant entrie into the citie, for a more magnificent victorie, than the Dictator. And for that a good part of the honour of fubduing the Samnites, was afcribed to the Lieutenants P. Decius, and M. Valerius, therefore at the next Election, the people with great affent declared the one Confull, and the other Pretour. Fabius for taming Hetruria fo bravely and valiantly, continued Con-fultill, and had for his Colleague P. Decius. Valerius was created Pretour the fourth time.
The Confuls parted betwene them the provinces, Hetruria fell to Decius, Samnium to Fabius.
Who taking his voiage to Nuceria, laid fiege to the citie of the Allifates, and woon it by affault: and notwithstanding they made fuit for peace, hee rejected and defpised them; for that when it B was offered, they would not accept it. With the Samnites he fought a battaile: but without any great conflikt, the enemies were vanquished. Neither had the remembrance of that field ben left, in record, but that the Marfians firft tooke armes and warred with the Romanes. After the Marfians were revolted, the Pelignians* did the femblable, and fped alike. Decius alfo the other Confult had good fucceffe in his warres. He drave the Tarquiniens for feare, to find the armie corne, and to fue for a truce of fortie yeeres. Certaine caftles and holds of the Volfiniens, hee forceably wain: fome of them he utterly rafed, for that they fhould not be any receptacle or harbor for the enemies. And with warring round about every where, hee became fo terrible, that the whole Tufcane nation made fute to the Confull for peace and confederacie. It, they could not obtain; but truce for a yeere was granted. In regard whereof, for that yeere they fatisfied the whole pay C for the armie, and a double livecie for every fouldiour was exacted and taken of them. This was the penfion and fine that their truce coft them.

But now when all was quiet among the Tufcanes, the suddaine revolting of the Vmbrians, a nation free, and faved hitherto from the calamities of warre, but onely, that the Romane armie paffed through their territories troubled all anew: for they having raifed the ftrengh and flower of their youth, and follicited alfo a great part of the Tufcanes to rebell, levied fo great a power, that making no account of Decius, whom they left behind them in Hetruria, they gave out proud words of themfelves, and fpake bafely of the Romanes, vaunting and boasting that they would march right forth to affault Rome. Which defigne of theirs, fo loon as it was reported to Decius the Col. he made fpeed, and by long journees departed out of Hetruria toward the citie, D and in the countrie of the Papinians, encamped himfelfe; liftening ever after the enemies, what they ment to do. Neither at Rome was the Vmbrians war neglected & fet light by: for their verie threats and menaces feared them, as who alreadie had feene by experience, by the foile they had at the Gauls hands, how unfure a citie they inhabited and not unpregnable. Therupon meffen-gers were difpatched to the Col. Fabius, That if he had any breathing time, & rcft from the Sam-nits war, he fhould with all fpeed lead his armie into Vmbria. The Col. obeyed, and by great jour-neis went forward to Mevania*, where at that time the forces of the Vmbrians lay. This suddaine & unexpected coming of the Col. whom they thought verily occupied in Samnium far inough off from Vmbria, fo terrified the Vmbrians, that fome gave advife to retire backe to their walled townes, others to relinquifh the war altogether. One canton or tract of their countrie (which they E themfelves call Materina, not only kept the reft in arms, but alfo fet them on to fight immediatly, fo as they charged upon Fabius, as he was trenching & fortifying. Whom when the Col. faw rufhing upon his rampires in fuch heaps, he called his men from their work, and as the ground and time would give leave, he marfhalled them in order of battel: & after he had encouraged his foldiors with a true report & difcource of many glorious and honorable journees achieved as well in Tufcia as alfo in Samnium; he willed them to difpatch this fmal refidue of the Tufcan war, that hung by and remained behind, and to be revenged of that accurfed and impious fpeech, whereby they threatened to affaile the citie of Rome. Thefe words of his were heard by the fouldiours with fuch alacritie and cheerefulnes of hart, that before their Generall had made an end of his fpeech, they fet up a fhout of themfelves and interrupted him: and thus before commaundement and F fignall given by found of trumpets and cornets, they ran amaine upon the enemies, and charged them as if they had not been men, and thofe alfo armed. For (a wonderfull thing to be fpoken) at the very firft they began to plucke the banners and ftreamers out of the bearers hands; after that, the enfigne-bearers themfelves were led to the Confuls, and the fouldiours armed as they were, transported out of one battaillon into another, and where there was any fcufling, they fought fought not so much with sword, as buckler: and what with their boffes and yron pikes, and what G with jusseling, shouldering, and striking the enemies about the arme-pits, they were overthrowne and telled. In which medley, more men were taken, than slaine: and no other crie was heard throughout the field, But down with weapon, down with weapon. So that in the very conflict, the principall authours of the war rendered themselves: and the morrow after, & other daies following, the rest of the people of Vmbria likewise yielded. The Otricularians by stipulation only and pledges given, were received into amitie. And Fabius having thus gotten the victorie in that war, which tell to another mans lot and charge, led backe his armie againe into his owne province. And in regard of his prosperous & happie exploits, like as the people the yeer past continued his Consullship: so the Senat against the year following, when App. Claudius, and L. Volumnus were Consuls, proroged his martial rule stil, maugre the hart of Appius, who was greatly against it. In some H Chronicles I find, that Appius, whiles he was Censor, sued to be Consull, & that his Election was crosse and staied by L. Furius, a Tribune of the Com. untill he had resigned up the Censorship. Being created Cos. and the war with the Salentines (declared new enemies) allotted unto his Colleague, he remained at Rome; that by civile pollicie, and managing home-affaires, he might augment his owne state and authoritie, since that the honor of warre-service rested in the hands and conduct of another. Volumnus had no cause to repent of his charge & province: for many fortunate battailes he fought, and some townes of the enemies by force he wone. He was a bountifull giver of the spoile away unto his souldiours: and this bountie in it selfe alone acceptable, hee helped much with great courtesie and gentleness, by which vertues and artificiall meanes, he made the souldiours both venturous in perils, and tough in travell.

Fabius on the other part, in qualitie of pro-Consull, gave battell to the Samnites neere the citie Allisa, where the day was nothing doubtfull. The enemies were discomfited and beaten into their campe: neither had they beene able to have kept the field, but that there was but a little day left behind: and yet before night, they were beset round about in their hold, yea, and watched with good guards all night long, that none should make escape. The morrow morning ere it was well day light, they began to yeeld themselves, and to capitulate. That as many Samnites as there were among them, should bee sent forth in their single garments, and they all went under the gallows. As for their confederates and allies, there was no such proviso nor composition made; but they all, to the number of seven thousand, were sold as slaves, and ware a garland. As many as adowed themselves to be Hernicks, were kept apart by themselves to be forthcomming. All those Fabius sent to Rome to the Senat, and untill such time as enquire was made, whether in a publicke muster they were pressed souldiours, or voluntarily served under the Samnites against the Romanes, they were committed to bee kept in ward among sundrie Nations of the Latines: during which time, the new Consuls, Publius Cornelius Arvina, and Quintus Martius Tremulus (for those were now created) had in charge to propose that matter anew unto the Senate. The Hernicks tooke that ill. Whereupon the Anagnines held a Diet or generall councell in the round Cirque, which they call Maritimus, of all the cities of that Nation, except the Alatrines, Ferentinates, and the Verulanes. Where the whole State of Hernicks proclaimed warre against the people of Rome. In Samnium also, for that Fabius was departed thence, there arose new troubles and rebellions. Calatia and Sora were forced, and the Romane garrisons that there lay, were put to the sword, and upon the bodies of as manie as they tooke alive, they exercised much torture and crueltie. Whereupon Publius Cornelius the Consull was thither sent. And to Martius were the new enemies appointed (for by this time decreed it was, That warre should bee made upon the Anagnines and the other Hernicks.) At the first, the enemies had so seised all the convenient advences and waies betweene both the Consuls campes, that there could not readily passe a lackey or currier betweene, in so much, as for certaine daies both Consuls abode doubtfull how the world went, and uncertaine one of the others state. The feare wherof, spred to Rome, so as all the younger sort [from seventeen yeers of age to seven and fortie] sware to serve: and against all suddain occasions, and occurrents whatsoever, two full and complete armies were levied and enrolled. But the Hernick war was nothing correspondent either to the present menaces, or to the ancient glorie and reputation of that nation: for having done no worthe adventures, and within few daies lost their campe thrife, they covenanted for to have thirtie daies truce; during which time, they might send Embassadours to the Senate of Rome; and in consideration hereof, they

A they promised to lay downe two moneths pay and to find corne for the armie, and allow everie soldiour one core. But from the Senat they were put off and referred to Martius: unto whom by order from the Senat, a large commission was granted, to dispose of the Hernicks as he thought good: and so he tooke the whole nation as yeilded to his devotion. The other Consull in Samnium being in forces more puissant than the enemy, was notwithstanding encombred much with the difficultie of the ground. All the passages had the enemy stopped, & possessed himself of the Forrests and woods which were thorow-fares, that no way victuals might be conveyed unto him. Neither could the Consull, for all that daily he displaid banner in field, traine them forth to fight: so as it was well seene, that neither the Samnites could abide present battel, nor the Romans long delay of war. But the arrivall of Martius, who upon the subduing of the Hernicks, made haste to aid his Colleague, caused the enemy to differre no longer the triall of the field. For, they who thought themselves not good enough to match so much as the one armie, knew full well, that if they suffered two Consuls armies to joine together, there had beene no hope left. They therefore set upon Martius as he marched without order of battaile. Hereupon in all haste their trustes and fardels were brought together and laid in the middle; and as the time would permit, he set his soldiours in array. At the first encounter, the shout was hard into the campe of the other Consull. Afterwards the dust desired a farre off, gave an al'arme, and made a trouble and garboile there. Then the Consull presently commaunded to arme: and hastily bringing his soldiours forth into the field, entred upon the battaile of the enemies in the flanke, whiles they were busied in another skirmish. He, cried aloud to his men, that it were exceeding great shame, to C suffer the other armie to carry away double victorie, & not themselves win the honor of that war, which was their proper charge. Thus, wheresoever he charged, he brake in and made entrance: and having pierced and made a great lane through the midst of the enemies battaile, he passed on toward their campe; which finding void of defendants, he tooke and set a fire. Which when the soldiours of Martius saw burning before their faces, and the enemy likewise, as they looked behind: then began the Samnites on all hands to flie: but killed they were every where down right: all places full of murder and carnage: so in no part could they finde meanes to escape and save themselves. Now when there were a thirtie thousand of the enemies slaine, the Consuls sounded the retreat, and gathered both their armies together, with great congratulation one to the other: by which time, behold, there were deskied a farre off, certaine new bands of enemies, D enrolled for a supply; and they gave occasion of a new & fresh slaughter. Against whom without commandement of Consull, or any signall received from their leaders, the Romanes advanced lustily, crying aloud, that these Samnites were to be welcomed with an ill hanfell, and this their first training should cost them deere. The Consuls let the legions alone in this their furious heat, as who knew well enough, that these new commers seeing the old beaten soldiours so stationed already and flying away, would soone have enough of it, and not once adventure fight. And they were not deceived in their opinion; for the whole forces of the Samnites as well old as new, fled apace unto the next mountaines: and thither the Romanes also make as great speed. But no safe place could those vanquished enemies find: for even from the verie hill tops which they held, they were beaten downe, so that with one voice they all craved peace. Then after the Consuls had imposed upon them corne for three moneths, and a years pay, and for everie soldiour a liverie besides, they were permitted to send Embassadours to the Senat; to treat and capitulate therefore. During which time, Cornelius was left in Samnium, and Martius returned into the citie, with triumph over the Hernicks. Moreover a decree passed, that his statue riding on horsebacke should remaine in the common place of assemblies, which was erected accordingly, even before the Temple of Cassor. To three States of the Hernicks, to wit, the Alatrines, the Verulanes and Ferentinates, their owne lawes, and ancient liberties were restored againe, because they made choise thereof, rather than to bee enfranchised cittizens of Rome: and permitted they were to marrie amongst the Romanes, which libertie they onely of the Hernicks for a good while enjoyed. The Anagnines, and those that had borne armes against the Romanes, were incorporate free denizens at Rome, but without the priviledge of giving voices and suffrages: F debarrd they were of holding any counsels and making marriages with them, yea and denied at all to elect any magistracie, but onely the function and ministerie of divine service and sacrifices.

The same yeare the Chappell of daine Salus was by C. Iunius Bubulcus now Censor, set out at a price a price to be buile, which he in his Consulship had vowed, in the Samnites warre. By his direction & appointment, together with his colleague M. Valerius Maximus, were the great high waies and caufes made, of all sides of the citie, through the fields, at the common charge and expenses. The same yeare also, was the league renewed now the third time with the Carthaginians; and their embassadors who came for that purpose, were courteously entertained, and rewarded liberally with rich gifts. In that yeare there was a Dictator P. Cornel. Scipio, with P. Decius, Generall of the horie: and these were Presidents at the election of Consuls, for to that purpose they were created, because neither of the two Consuls could be spared from the warres. Consuls were created L. Posthumus, and T. Minutius. But Piso sayth, that these Consuls immediately succeeded Q. Fabius, and P. Decius: leaving out those two yeares, wherein we have written, that Claudius with Volumnius, & Cornelius with Martius were Consuls. Whether he forgot himselfe in digesting his Annales and yearly records, or of set purpose overhight two couple of Consuls, thinking that they were not in truth Consuls, I wote not.

The same yeare the Samnites made rodes into the territorie of Stella, within the liberties and appertinances of the Campanes, and therefore both Consuls were sent into Samnium: who when they were parted into divers wayes, for Posthumus tooke his journey to Tifernum, and Minutius to Bovianum: first there was a battaile fought at Tifernum, under the leading of Posthumus. Some make no doubt, but write, that the Samnites were discomfited, and put to the worke, and thirtie thousand of them taken prisoners: others say, that the conflict was equall, and that they departed on even hand: also that Posthumus making semblance of feare, journeyed by night, and closely retired unto the hils adjoyning, & that the enemies followed after them, two miles, & from thence encamped, & fortified also themselves in strong places of advantage. The Consull because he would be thought to have fought & chose a safe place, and plentifully stored with all necessities (as it was no lesse in deed) where he might keepe a standing camp; after he had fortified the same, and furnished it with all kind of provision, leaving behind him a strong garrison for defence; at the reliefe of the third watch, leadeth the neereft way, his legions not encombred with carriage, to his Colleague; who also himselfe lay in camp over against another armie. There, by the perswasion and advice of Posthumus, Minutius gave battaile: and when as the conflict continued doubtfull untill it was farr on the day; then Posthumus with his fresh legions, on a sodaine charged the battailions of the enemies, now already overytoyled: thus partly for weeriness, and partly for wounds, they being disabled for to flee away, were out of all measure slaine every one: and xxj. banners were taken: and so from thence they went forward to the camp of Posthumus. Where these two victorious armies, finding the enemy discouraged and amazed at the tidings of this overthrow, set upon them, discomfited, and put them to flight, and wan from them xxvj. ensignes: where the Generall of the Samnites Status Cellius, with many a man besides, was taken prisoner, and both their camps woen. Bovianum also, which the morrow after began to be assaulted, was shortly after forced: and finally with great glorie of so noble acts atchieved, both Consuls triumphed. Some write, that the Consull Minutius being grievously hurt, was brought back into the camp, and there died: and that M. Fulvius was substituted Consull in his rounge: and that it was he, who being sent unto the armie of Minutius, wan Bovianum. The same yeare, Sorat, Arpinum, and Consentia were recovered from the Samnites; and the great image of Hercules was in the Capitoll set up and dedicated.

When as P. Sulpitius Averrius, and P. Sempronius Sophus were Coss. the Samnites desiring either to see an end of warre, or els to delay it, sent embassadors to Rome pretending peace. To whom as they pleaded and intreated most humbly, this answer was given; That if the Samnites had not so often treated for peace, when they intended and prepared warre, they might after certaine enterviews, and conferences passed betweene, obtaine their suite: but since that evermore untill that time, their words were but wind; now they would trust to their deedes, and nothing els. P. Sempronius the Consull, shall shortly be in Samnium with an armie: who would not be abused, but soone see, whether their minds be enclined to warre or peace: and as he found, and saw every thing, so would he bring word and make relation: and therefore their embassadors were to attend upon the Consull when he departed out of Samnium. The same yeare, after that the Romane armie had passed peaceably too & fro, and visited all Samnium, having victuals by the countrie courteously allowed, the ancient league was granted againe to the Samnites. From thence turned the Romanes their forces against the Aequians, their old enemies; but for many years

A yeares making semblance of quietnes, whereas indeede their peace was litle to be trusted: for that the Hernick nation was safe and on foote, they with them, had used oftentimes under hand to send aid unto the Samnites; and also after the subduing of the Hernicks, the whole nation in a manner without dissimbling, and averring all they did by publick counsell and authoritie, had fallen away unto the enemy: and after that the Romanes had made league with the Samnites, and their heralds came to make claime for their goods tooke from them by way of hostilitie, they said, it was but a tempting of them, to see, whether upon feare of warre they would suffer themselves to become Romanes. Which, say they, how greedily it were to be wished, the Hernicks were able to teach them: for they, as many of them as had libertie to do what they would, chose rather to live under their owne lawes, than to be enfranchised citizens of Rome: but others, who had not the same scope to choose to their liking, they were constrained to accept of the Burgeoisie of their citie, by way of a punishment. Upon these speeches and arguments commonly tossed in their assemblies & Counsels, the people of Rome decreed warre against the Aequians: to which both the Consuls went, and encamped foure miles from their enemies campe. The Aequians (who in their owne behalfe, and for any quarell of theirs, had many yeares sat still and made no warre) like as if their armie had bene leaved of a sodaine and in haste, without certaine Captaines appointed, and without any Generall to command, were affrayed. Some thought good to go forth into the field, others to defend themselves, and keepe within their campe: most of them were moved to thinke aforehand upon the wasting of their countrie afterwards, and consequently the dettruction of their cities left but with slender garrisons. Therefore after that, amongst many opinions, this only had audience, namely to abandon the care of publick weale, and every man to regard his owne private state, and at the first watch to depart divers waies one from the other, and quit the camp, and convey away all their bag and baggage, and to defend their cities within the walls: they all with one accord accepted thereof, and embraced it. Now when the enemies were thus scattered abroad about the countrie, the Romanes by daylight, with banner displayed went forth into the field: and when they saw no man come abroad to meet them, they marched in warlike order apace towards the enemies campe. But when as they could perceive there, neither warders before the gates, nor any man upon the trench and rampiers, nor to much as the usuall noyse of a leaguer; being moved with this unaccustomed silence, for feare of forelaying and treacherie, they stood still: but being gotten over the rampire, and finding the tents voyde and empty, they set forward to pursue the enemy by his trace. But when they found their foote tracks, leading to all parts of the countrie alike, as being slip here and there, sundrie and divers wayes: at the first they wandered out of the way, and missed of them; but afterwards knowing by their espials the purpose and intent of their enemies, they went round about and besieged every citie, and in threecore dayes wan fortie townes all by assault: most part whereof were raised even with the ground, and consumed into ashes, and the nation of the Aequians utterly in a manner destroyed. Over the Aequians there was triumph. Whose calamitie and desolation was so fearefull an example, to the Marrucines, Marfi, Peligni, and Ferentines, that they sent Oratours to Rome to treat for peace and amitie: and to all those nations at their request, a league was granted. The same yeare, C. Flavius a Notarie or Register by profession, whose father Cnius was no better than of a slave made free, a man, thus descended of base and lowe parentage, howbeit otherwise craftie and eloquent withall, arose to be an Aedile Curule. I finde in some records, that when he gave attendance in his calling to the Aediles, and saw that his owne Tribe were willing to give him their voyces and elect him Aedile, but his name not accepted of among other competitor, for that he got his living by his pen; he cast aside his bookes and papers, and sware an oth, that he would no longer be a Notarie and use pencecraft. But Macer Licinius avoucheth, that a good while before that, he gave over his writing, namely after he had bene Tribune, and borne two Triumvirships, the one for the night misfules, the other for the placing and transporting of a Colonie. But they all agree upon this, that he became verie stout, and in great contumacie opposed himselfe and made head against the Nobles that contemned his base birth. The civile law, which before time was laid up in great secter by the Priests, and Prelats in their Arches, he published abroad; and set up a table in the great common place, in manner of a Calendar, wherein all men might knowe worke-dayes from holy-dayes: when it was lawfull to pleade, and when not. Also in despite, and to the great heart-burning of the Patritij, he he dedicated the temple of the goddesse Concord upon the court of Vulcane: and by the generall consent of the people, Cornelius Barbatius the high priest was compelled to endite and pronounce the certain forme of words therto belonging; notwithstanding he contested and denied, that by the customes of their forefathers any could dedicate a Temple, unlesse he were either Consull or Generall of an armie. And therefore by the authoritie of the Senate, a law was preferred to the people, That no man might dedicate a Temple or Alter, without permission and consent of the Consull, or the more part of the Tribunes of Commons. I will report in this place a thing, of it selfe not worthe of remembrance, but onely for a prooffe and example of the libertie of the Commons against the pride and insolencie of the Nobles. This Flavius, coming upon a time to visit his Colleague lying sicke, by a complot afore hand of certaine yong gentlemen of the Patritians that sat by his beds side, had no reverence done unto him, nor any one so much as rose up at his entrance into the chamber: whereupon, he commaunded his yvorie chaire of State to be brought unto him, & set himself upon it; and so he outfaced his adversaries, that were so vexed to the heart with envie of his dignitie. This Flavius was nominated and chosen Ædile, by the base faction of the commoners, banding together in the place of assemblies: who first tooke heart by the Censureship of Appius Claudius, the first that ever distained and polluted the Senate, by bringing in the sonnes of Libertines: and when he saw that no man accounted that election of Senatours good and lawfull, and perceived withall, that in the court he had not that backing of citizens which he sought for; he entermingled in every Tribe certaine of the most base persons of the Commons: and so hee corrupted both the common place and Mars field also. In so much as the Election of Flavius was reputed so unworthie an indignitie, that most of the gentlemen of Rome laid away their gold rings and rich trapping of their horses, which were the ornaments and ensignes of their calling. And from that time forward, the cittie was divided into two partes. One side was maintained and upheld by the true hearted people, such as favoured and loved good things: the other by the faction of the raffe and skum of the cittie: untill the time that Q. Fabius, and P. Decius were created Censors. Fabius to bring the cittie unto an uniforme accord, and to withstand this inconvenience, that the Elections of Magistrates should not be caried away by the strong hand of the vilest and most abject persons, made a separation of all that base rabble, and cast them into foure Tribes, and called them Urbana*. Which action of his (men say) was accepted with so great contentment and thankfulness, that upon this good temperance of degrees, he purchased the surname of Maximus, which in many victories he had not acquired and obtained. By him also (by report) it was ordained and instituted, that on the Ides of Iuly, the horsemen rode, as it were, in a solemne muster, and shewed their great hories to the Censor.

THE TENTH BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIVS

of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the tenth Booke.

Two Colonies were planted in Sora and Alba. The Mæsians of Cascole, were reduced unto obedience. The fellowship of the Augurs was augmented to the number of nine, where-as before they were wont to be but foure. The Law or Edict as touching the appealing to the people, was now the third time proposed by Valerius the Consull. Two Tribes more were added to the rest, Aniensis and Tarentina. Ware was denounced against the Samnites, and fortunately fought with them. What time as there was a battaile given to the Tuscanes, Vmbrians, Samnites, and Gaulers, under the conduct of P. Decius, and Quintus Fabius, and the Roman armie was in great extremitie of danger, P. Decius following the example of his father, devowed and exposed himselfe to die voluntarily for to save the host: and by his death obtained the victorie of that iourney, to his countymen and fellow citizens. Papirius Censor put to flight an armie of the Samnites, who were bound by a solemne oth, not to depart out of the battaile without victorie, to the end, that with more magnanimitie and resolution, they should enter into the field. The Conference held, and the number taken of the citizens, with the solemne praying and Lustration of the cittie. And assayed there were 362322 pols.

When L. Genutius and Ser. Cornelius were Consuls, there was rest in manner from all warres abroad; in such sort, as they had leasure to place certaine Colonies at Sora and Alba: And for Alba there were enrolled 6000 inhabitants, to affront the Æquians. As for Sora, it had sometimes belonged to the Volsicians territorie; but the Samnites usurped the possession of it, and thither foure thousand were sent to inhabite. The same yeare, the Arpinates and Trebulanes were enfranchised free denizens at Rome. The Frusinates were fined with the losse of one third part of their lands: for they were evidently detected to have solicited the Hernicks to rebellion: and after that the Consull by commission from the Senate, had made due inquisition, the principall heads of that conspiracie, were scourged and beheaded. Yet because there should not passe a yeare cleane without warre, a journey was made (such a one as it was) into Vmbria; upon newes, that there used to yssue forth day by day, certaine men in armes out of a cave, and to make rodes into the countrie about. Into this cave or peake, the Romanes entred with their ensignes displayed: where, by reason that it was a blind corner, they received many a wound, and specially by throwing of stones; untill such time as they found the other mouth of the cave (for it was a thorowfare.) So they piled a deale of wood together at both endes, and set it on fire: with the smoke and vapour whereof, there were about 2000 armed men driven out of their hole, who rushing at last into the flame, desirous to escape, were smouldred and burnt to ashes.

When as M. Livius Dentor, and G. Acmylius, were Consuls, the Æquians began to warre againe: for they hardly could abide and endure, that a Colonie should bee planted upon their borders, as a frontier-fortresse to bridle them; and assaied by all kind of force to winne the same: but they were lustily repulsed by the inhabitants onely within the towne. Howbeit, such a feare they made at Rome, because it was not thought credible, that the Æquians alone all one of themselves, so distressed as they were, would be so hardie as to take armes, that in regard of that trouble, a Dictatour was named, to wit, C. Iunius Bubulcus, with M. Titinius Generall of the horse. Who at the first conflict subdued the Æquians, and upon the eight day of his government returned into the cittie in triumph: and now Dictatour, dedicated the temple of Solut, which hee had vowed being Confull, and had put out to workmen for to be builded, while hee was Censor.

The same yeare a fleet of Greekes, under the conduct of Cleonymus a Lacedemonian, arrived upon the coast of Italie, and wan Thurix, a cittie of the Salentines. Against this enimie was the Confull Aemilius sent, who in one battell discomfited him, and drove him aboard. Thus Thurix was rendered againe to the former inhabitants, and the Salentine cuntry obtained peace and quietnesse. I find in some records, that it was Iun. Bubulcus the Dictatour, who was sent to the Salentines: and that Cleonymus before hee was to encounter with the Romanes, departed out of Italie. From thence hee fetched a compassse, and doubled the point of Brundisium, and sailed with a fore-wind through the midst of the Venice gulf: for that on the left hand the Haven-lesse and harbourlesse coasts of Italie, and on the right, the Illyrians, Liburnians, and Istrians, fierce nations, and for the most part, reputed infamous, for roving and robbing by the sea side, put him in exceeding feare. So he arrived at length upon the river of Venice, lying farre within the shore, & there, he landed a few to discover the coasts: but hearing that the strond that lay out against them, was not broad and spacious, and when they were past over it, there were behind them the plashes (as it were) overflowed with the sea tides, and that not farre off might be seene the champion fields neere hand, and hills beyond; and discovering by this meanes the mouth of a very deepe river, into which he saw, that the ships might be brought about as into a sure harbour (now that rivers name was Meduacus) thither hee commaunded, that the Armada should put in, and to make faile up against the streame. The heaviest vessels, the channell of the river would not beare: but the soldiors were transported in lighter barks and small pinnaces, and so fell at length with the levell and the plaine cuntry, frequented with much people, by reason that a three sea-townes of the Patavines, inhabited that territorie. Being once landed, and having left a slender guard for their ships, they take townes by assault, burne houses, harrie and drive away prizes both of men and cattell: and when they had once tasted of the sweetnesse of bootie and pillage, they went farre from their ships. The alarme hereof was given at Patavium (now the Patavines were alwaies in armes, because of the Gauls their borders.) Whereupon they divided their fighting youth into two regiments: the one was led into those quarters whereas the report went, that the Greekes forraied here and there all abroad: the other, because they would not meet with the pillers and rovers, was conducted another way to the harbour, where the ships rid (about fouretecn miles from the towne.) And after they had slaine the warders, they charged upon the small barks. Whereupon the mariners were afraid, and were forced to retire their vessels to the other banke side. Likewise upon the maine, they sped as well in fight against the stragling rovers: for when as the Greekes fled backe to recover the harbour, the Venetians encountered them affront, and made head against them. So the enemies were environned in the midst, and most of them slaine: some that were taken prisoners, bewrayed what their fleet was, and that king Cleonymus was three myles off. There, when they had bestowed the prisoners sure ynough in ward within the next village; some, man with souldiours their river vessels, made sily and framed with flat bottomes, for to passe over the meeres and shallow washes; others imbarke armed men in the small gallions taken from the enemies; and made way apace to give an assault upon the maine fleet, and beset those shippes which rid at ancker, and durst not weigh and remoove, fearing not the enimie, so much as the unknowne coasts. These, I say, they environned, and charged upon them: and when they made halt to gaine the deepe and open sea, without any resistance at all, they were pursued and chased unto the mouth of the river. Thus when they had taken the enemies ships, and fired others, namely, such as for feare and hast were driven upon the shelles, and run a ground, then they returned with victorie. Cleonymus hardly saved the fifth part of his fleet. And thus having had no good lucke in attempting to land in anie coast of the Adriaticke sea, hee departed. The stemmes of the shippes, with their beak-heads, and brasse pikes, together with the spoiles of the Lacedemonians, were set up in the old Temple of Iuno, and there became at this day alive, which have seene them. The memoriall of this sea-fight, is celebrated yearely (upon the verie same day that it was fought) at Patavium, Atavium, with a solemne skirmish and combate of ships represented upon the river, within the midst of the cittie.

The same yeare was a league made at Rome with the Vestines, who came to sue for peace and amitie. But from that time forward, there arose many and diverse fearefull occurrences. For newes came, that Hetruria rebelled, which troubles tooke their beginning by occasion of the civile dissention and discord of the Aretines: who began to expell by force of armes the house and familie of the Licinij (mightie and puissant above the rest) for verie envie and repine of their wealth and riches. Over and besides, the Marsians stood out, and by armes maintained their title to that part of their territorie, into which, there had bene a Colonie of Carseolanes brought, to the number of foure thousand men, enrolled there to inhabite. Against which stirres and tumults, Marcus Valerius Maximus was created Dictatour, who made choise of M. Aemilius Paulus to bee the Commaunder of the Horse. Which I rather beleeve to bee true, than that Q. Fabius, a man of those yeares and that worth, after so manie honourable dignities, should bee under Valerius. But I would not denie, that the error might growe by reason of the surname of Maximus. The Dictatour having taken the field with his armie, in one battaile discomfited the Marsians: and after hee had driven them into their walled and fenced townes, Miloniana, Plestina, and Fesilia; within few daies, hee woon them also over their heads: and having fined the Marsians with the losse of some part of their territorie, hee received them into their auncient league againe. Then all the forces were employed against the Tuscanes: and whiles the Dictatour was departed to Rome to take his Auspices anew, the Generall of Horse, being gone out a foraging, was by a secret ambush entrapped. And having lost certaine ensignes, hee was forced into the campe, after a foule slaughter and shameful flight of his men. Which fearefull cowardise is, not like to have bene in Fabius, not onely, because if ever hee deserved his surname of Maximus by any commendable parts, it was especially for his prowesse in warre; but also, for that in remembrance of Papirius his crueltie toward him, hee never could have bene brought to fight, without the commaundement or permission of the Dictatour. This discomfiture and losse being reported at Rome, caused a greater terrour than there was cause. For no lesse than if the armie had bene utterly defeated, there was published and proclaimed a stay and cessation of all law-matters, warders bestowed at the gates, order taken for standing watches in every streete, and armour and darts carried up to the wals: And after that all the younger sort were sworn and prest to serve, the Dictatour was sent againe to the armie. Where, hee found all more quiet than hee looked for, through the careful diligence of the Generall of Horse. The campe was removed to a place of more strength and safetie, the bands and companies which had lost their ensignes, leit on the bare earth without the rampires, destitute of tents and couvert; and the armie eager and desirous of fight, to doe away and rase out the former ignominie and shame. Presently therefore, hee raised his campe, and removed forward into the cuntry of Rasella. Thither followed the enemies also hard at heeles. Who albeit, upon their late good speed, they were in right great hope and affiance to bee strong ynough even in open fight and plaine field; yet they assaile the enimie also by the same flights and traines which they had already so fortunately tried. There fortunated to bee in the cuntry thereabout, not farre from the Romanes campe, certaine houses halfe pulled downe and ruinate, belonging to a village which was burned when the cuntry was overrun: where, after they had bestowed closely certaine men in armes, they drave their beasts and cattaille in the very sight of the Romanes corps de guard, commanded by C. Fulvius, a Lieutenant: at which bait, when as there stirred no man from the Romanes wards, one of the Heard-men advanced even under the very trench and fortifications of the Romanes, and called aloud to the rest (that seemed for feare to drive but slowly from the ruines of the village aforesaid) asking why they staid behind, seeing they might safely march, and passe forward still (and it were) through the middle of the Romanes campe? These wordes, certaine Carites interpreted to the Lieutenant Fulvius. Whereat, everie band or companie of soldiors rooke great indignation, but durst not stir a foot without a warrant. Then he commaunded those that were skilfull in the tongue, to mark whether their language sounded neerer to the speech of peasants or to citizens: Who brought word, that both their voice, & also the habit and freshew of their bodies, was more elegant and civile than for cuntry shepheards. Go your waies than (qd. he) unto them and bid them bewray & discover their ambush, which in vain they seem to hide: for that the Romans were dancing in all things, and advertised of their designs, and could no more now be overtaken with wiles, than overcome by armes. When these words were once heard and caried to those that lay in wait, presently they start up out of their lurking holes, & brought forth their ensignes all abroad into the open field. The lieutenant supposing they were a greater troupe than might be dealt with all and matched, by his corps de gard, with all speed sent for aide to the Dictator: and in the mean while himself received & bare off the brunt and forceable charge of his enemies. This message was no sooner brought, but the Dictator commanded the standards to be advanced, and the soldiers to arme and follow: but every thing was done sooner almost than it could be commanded: forthwith they caught up the ensignes, and tooke weapon in hand: and scarcely could they be held in, but that they would run amaine. For not onely the spitefull anger of the late received losse pricked them on, but also the shouts of their fellowes, which they might heare more lowd, & to be redoubled thicker, according as the medley grew hotter and hotter. The greater hast therfore they made, while one putteth forward another, and crieth to the port-ensignes to go faster and mend their pace. But the more hast the Dictator seeth them to make, the more earnest was he to keepe them backe in their march, and to hold them in; willing them to go faire and softly. Contrariwise the Tuscans, who rose up at the beginning of the battaile, were there readie with their whole forces to give the charge. Whereupon there came messenger after messenger to the Dictator, bringing word that all the legions of the Tuscans were entred into the fight, and that his men alreadie were not able to resist any longer. Nay himselfe also, from the higher ground, might see in what danger the corps de gard was. But presuming and resting upon this conceit, that the lieutenant was able yet to maintaine fight, considering that he was not farr off himselfe to helpe and save him out of perill; he was desirous that the enemies might be wearied and tired as much as was possible: and that his own forces fresh and in heart, should set upon them overtoiled. And albeit they went softly forward, yet by this time had the horsemen but a verie small ground to take their run with full carriere. Foremost marched the ensignes of his legions, that the enemy should not feare any couvert and privie stratageme, but leave good spaces and distances between the files of their footmen, through which the horses might have rounne and libertie enough to gallop with ease. Then all the battaillon of the Infanterie set up a crie and shout when they charged, and withall, the Cavallerie, with reines at large entred within the ranks of the enemies, who being not marshalled & set in order against such a blustering storme of horsemen, were with a sodain feare astonished. Whereupon, the troupe of Fulvius which erewhile was in manner environed and compassed about, and had helpe and rescue almost too late, nowe all in generall breathed themselves at ease, and were put to nothing. For these that came fresh and lustie undertooke the whole weight of the medley: which was neither long nor doubtfull. The enemies were put to flight, and in disaray made hast to recover their campe. And when as the Romanes advanced against them with banner displayed, they quit their place & reculed, gathering themselves round into heaps in the farthest part of the campe: and as they would have fled out, they stucke fast in the narrow gaps and passages of the gates: a great part of them leapt upon the banke, to climbe the rampier, if haply either from the higher ground they might defend themselves, or get over any where and escape. By chance in one place where the banke was not well rammed, the rampier was surcharged with the weight of so many standing upon it, and so tumbled downe into the trench. Whereupon, they set up a crie all together, That the gods had made them way to escape, and by that meanes in deed they saved themselves, but more of them unarmed than armed. In this battaile, were the forces of the Tuscans once againe utterly abated: in so much as, after they had capitulated and promised a years pay, and come for two moneths, the Dictator permitted them to send Embassadors to Rome for a treatie of peace. Peace was denied, but truce for two yeares graunted: and the Dictator with triumph returned into the citie. I find in some writers; that Hetruria was by the Dictator quiered, without any notable battaile, onely by composing the variance and debate of the Aretines, and reconciling the familie of the Licinij with the Commons.

M. Valerius upon his Dictatorship became Consull. Some have beleevd that he was created without his owne suit, yea and while he was absent, and that the said Election was held by the Interregent. But howsoever it was, out of all question, he bare the Consulship with Apulcius Pansa. While M. Valerius and Q. Apulcius were Coss. all was well quiered abroad: for the Tuscans of one side, partly upon their ill successe in warre, and partly by reason of their truce, were forced

- A forced to be still and in repose. The Samnites also on the other side, being well tamed with the overthrowes so many yeares together, repented not yet, and were not weary of their new league. At Rome likewise, the Commons were quiet, and found themselves much eased, and discharged of a great number of base and poore people, which were withdrawne and sent away into colonies. But because their rest should not be every where entire and perfect, there arose a quarell betwene the chiefe and principall men of the citie, as well the Nobles as Commons, and that by the suggestion and instigation of Q. and Cn. Ogulnij, Tribunes of the Com. Who having sought occasion and matter every way to accuse and blame the Nobilitie unto the Commons; when they saw all meanes assayed in vaine, at length entred into an action, whereby they kindled and set on fire not only the meanest, but even the chiefe heads of the Commons, such as had bene
- B Consuls, and triumphed: who wanted no promotions & honors, but only Sacerdottall dignities and Prelacies, which as yet were not indifferently common to both States. They proposed therfore a law, That whereas at that time there were but 4. Augures, & as many Prelates or Bishops, and for as much as they thought it good, that the number of Priests should be increased, there might be chosen to the rest, 4. Bishops, and 5. Augurs, all out of the bodie of the Commons. But how this collodge or fellowship of Augurs, was reduced to the number of foure, but by the death of two, I can not find: since this is certaine, that among the Augurs the number must be odd: namely, that the three auncient tribes, Rhamneses, Titieses, and Luceres, should have each one their Augur: or if they needed more, they should with equall number increase those Priests: like as they were augmented and multiplied, when as five being put to foure, made up the number of nine; that is to say, for every tribe three. Howbeit, because they were chosen out of the Commons who should supplie, and make up the number; the Nobles tooke it as grievously to the heart, as when they saw the Consulship parted equally in common: but they made semblance as though this indignitie pertained to the gods more than to them: who would themselves see, that their holy service and sacred mysteries should not be polluted. And as for them, this only they could do, namely, pray and wish, that no calamitie thereby should light vpon the common weale. But lesse earnest were they in opposing themselves and making resistance, for that they were used alreadie in all such broiles and contentions to have the worse: and they saw besides, that their adversaries shot not at that (which in time past they could scarce hope for) namely, the greatest honours and dignities: but that they had alreadie obtained all, for which they had strived so long in so doubtfull termes of hope, to wit, manifold Consulships, Censurships, and Triumphs. Howbeit, the contention and dispute in debating and arguing too and fro the law proposed, was maintained (as men say) betwene Ap. Claudius especially, and P. Decius Mus: and after they had contested and discoursed in their orations pro & contra, the same reasons in manner, touching the rights and liberties pretended by the Nobles and Commons, which sometimes had bene alleaged, both for, and against the law Licinia, at what time as it was set on foote for the Commons to be Consuls; Decius (as it is sayd) represented in open audience the very resemblance and shew of his father, in such manner, as many of them who were then present at the assembly, had seene him: to wit, girded and apparelled in Gabine robe, standing over his iavelin, in which gesture, habit, & fashion, he offered himself to voluntary death,
- E for to save the people & legions of the Romans: Seemed (quoth he) P. Decius, that then was Coss. as pure and religious in the sight of the immortall gods, as if T. Manlius his colleague had bene likewise devowed and offered: and might not the same P. Decius have rightly bene chosen, to execute the publike divine service and sacrifices of the people of Rome? or is this all the feare and doubt, that the gods would give lesse care to his prayers, than to Ap. Claudius? or doth Ap. Claudius with more devotion serve God privately, and worship the gods more religiously, than himselfe? Who was there ever that repented or misliked of the vowes, which so many Consuls and Dictators of the Com. either at their first setting forth to their armies, or in time of warre and battaile, pronounced for the common wealth? Recken and count the chiefe Captaines, yeare by yeare, since the first time that the Commons began to have the leading and conduct of the warres: number all the triumphs ever since: it will appeare that the Commons are no whit abashed, and have no cause to complaine of their owne nobilitie. And this I know for certaine, that if any new sodaine warre should arise, the Senate and people of Rome would repose no more hope & confidence in the auncient Patritij, than in the Com. for to be the Captaines and commaunders. This being so, quoth he, what God or man can thinke it an indignitie, tie, to adorne those persons also with the titles and ornaments of Bishops and Augurs, whome ye have honoured with chaire of yvorie, with the long robe bordered with purple, with the core of armes embroded and branched with the palme tree, with the gowne or mantle of purple, wrought with divers colours, with the chapelots & coronets of triumph, and with the victorious branch and garland of lawrell; whose houses ye have beautified above the rest, with setting up the spoiles of enemies? Or who can thinke much, if he be seen with a sacrificing cup, or holy-water pot, and with a crozier staffe, and his head veiled, either to kill a sacrifice, or to take Augurie by sight of birds from the castle hill; who hath bene adorned & decked with the ensignes and ornaments of the great god Jupiter, and hath ridden in a gilded chariot through the citie into the Capitol? Or in whole title inscription and stile over his image, men shall with content, reade Consulship, Centurship, and Triumph; will not the same abide to see & reade, that ye have added thereunto either Augurship, or Pontificall dignitie? I verily for my part hope (without the displeasure, and with reverence of the gods be it spoken) that we by the beneficence of the people of Rome are such, as for our qualitie and worthinesse, may and will yeeld no lesse credit and honor to our priethoods, than we shall receive thereby: and who desire, in regard of the honor and service of God, more than for our owne sakes and proper interest, to have the meanes, That whome we serve and reverence in private, those we may also worship and honor publickly. But why have I hitherto so pleaded the cause, as if the Patritij were entirely alone intitled and invested in the prerogative of Sacerdotall Dignities; and as though we were not already possessed of one right honorable and principall Priethood? We see that the Decemvirs for celebration of sacrifices, and for interpretation of Sibylla her propheties, and other the fatall destinies of this people, the prelates also and ministers of Apollon his sacrifice, and other holy ceremonies, are of the Commons. Neither was there any injurie done unto the Patritij at that time, when for to gratifie the Commons, the number of the Duumvirs was increased; those I meane, who should oversee (as superintendents) the offering of sacrifices. And now at this present they have no greater cause to complaine, if the Tribune, a stout & brave man, hath added five places more of Augurs, & foure of Bishops, unto which commoners may be nominated: not to dispossesse you of your routes, or to displace you, o Appius, but that men of the commons might assist you in the function and ministerie of divine service & church matters, like as they do their part, & performe good service in humane & civil affaires. And be not ashamed, o Appius, to have him for your colleague in the priethood, whom you might beseech to have in Consulate or Censorship, your companion & fellow, unto whom being Dictator, you might be Coronel of horse; as well as he to you in your Dictatorship. Those aunient Nobles in old time (our progenitors) admitted into their number & order, a Sabine stranger, the very head & top of your nobilitie, one Ap. Claudius, or Ap. Claudius (choose you whether.) You must not thinke much then, to accept us into the number of Priests. We bring with us many honorable titles, even all the same that make you so proud, and to beare your head aloft. L. Sextius was the first Commoner, created Consul; and C. Licinius Stolo the first Coronel of horse. C. Rutilius was the first Dictator & Censor, & Q. Publus Philo the first Prator. We have heard this song evermore sounding in our eares, That to you alone pertaineth the taking of Auspicia: that you only are of noble descent & gentilitie: that ye & none but ye, by right & dutie ought to manage the affaires, and the soveraigne government, both at home and abroad: and yet alwaies hitherto the commons in their places and charges, have done and sped as well as the Patritij, and henceforth ever shall (I doubt not.) What? heard ye never it spoken, that the Patritij were at first made and created, and not descended from heaven: but such as were able to name their father and grandfire; that is to say, even freemen just, and no more? What? I my selfe can nominate already mine owne father to have bene a Consul, and shortly shall my sonne be able to alledge his grandfire. There is nothing els, o Quirites, in the matter whereupon we stand, but that we may obtaine all which hath bene denied us. For the Nobles desire only to maintaine a lide and to contend, and reake not greatly what issue their contentions come unto. As for me, I am of advice, and this would I have, That (to the good, profite, and happie estate of you all, and the weale publick) this law may passe under your affirmative voyce [Uti rogastis.] Then presently the people commaunded the Tribes to be called to a scrutinie: and soone it appeared, that the law would without all doubt be accepted: but that day was lost, by the opposition and negative of some Tribunes. Howbeit, the morrow after, they were afraid to crosse it; and then with exceeding consent of all hands, it passed cleere. So there

A were created Prelates or Bishops; first, P. Decius Mus himselfe (that so pleaded for the law) with P. Sempronius Sophus, C. Martius Rutilius, and M. Livius Dentor. Likewise, five Augurs of the Commons, to wit, C. Genatius, P. Aelius Patus, M. Minutius Festus, C. Martius, and T. Publius. So there were eight Prelates in number, and nine Augurs.

The same year, M. Valerius the Consull, procured the law of appealing to the people, more surely to bee established and confirmed. This was now the third time after the deposition of the kings, that this one Act was revived; and alwaies by the same house or familie of the Valerij. The cause of renewing the same so often, was no other I suppose, than this; for that the mightinesse of some few great men of the Patritij, was more powerfull than the libertie and freedome of the Commons. Onely the law Portia, seemeth to have bene enacted for to save the backe and sides of citizens from whipping, because that it awarded and set a greivous punishment upon him, that either had beaten or killed a citizen of Rome. The law Valeria, which forbade, to scourge or behead any man whosoever, that made his appeal, had this annexed only, that if any one had trespassed and proceeded farther, it should bee decreed, LEAUDLY AND NAUGHTILY DONE. Such was the modestie & reverence of men in those daies, that this one addition [in my conceit verily] was supposed to bee a sufficient bond to strengthen the law. But now adaies, would a man scarcely threaten his servant or slave in that manner.

The same Consull made warre, without any worthie or memorable exploit, against the Aequians that rebelled; who (setting aside their stout & proud stomachs) had nothing left of their ancient fortune and estate. The other Cof. Apuleius, besieged the town *Nequinum in Vmbria. The place was difficult and hard to get up, and on the one side steepe downe right (whereas now standeth Narnia) so that it was impregnable, either by assault, or countermures & skonces whatsoever. Whereupon, the new Consuls, M. Fulvius Patus, and T. Manlius Torquatus, entred upon this enterprize, lest undone and unfinished by the former. Now when all the Centuries nominated with one voice Q. Fabius for the Consullship of that yeare, even without his owne suite and seeking, Macer Licinius and Tubero doe write, that he himselfe laboured to have that charge put off, and reserved unto a yeare of more warre: alleadging, that for the present hee would serve the Commonweale in better stead, by bearing some civile office in the citie: and so neither dissuading what hee rather desired, nor yet seeking for it, hee was made Aedile of the Chaire, with L. Papirius Cursor. But, to set this downe for a certaine truth I dare not; because that Piso, a more ancient writer of Chronicles, sayth, that the Aediles Curule of that year, were C. Domitius, Cn. F. Calvinus, Sp. Carvilius, and Q. Fabius Maximus. That surname, I suppose verily, gave occasion of the error in the Aediles. Whereupon ensued a tale (sorting to that error) mixed & compounded of the Elections of Aediles and Consuls together. The same yeare was held a solemne survey and purging of the citie by sacrifice, called Lustrum, by P. Sempronius Sophus, and P. Sulpitius Avernus, and two Tribes more were added to the rest, Anienensis, and Tarentina. And thus much concerning the affaires at Rome.

But now to returne to Nequinum; after much time spent in long and lingering siege before the town, two of the inhabitants, whose houses joined close to the wall, undermined the ground, and by a secret way came as farre as the corps de guard of the Romanes. From whence they were brought before the Consull, and promised him to let in and receive what garrison and troupe of armed men he would, within the citie. This offer was thought neither to be neglected and refused, nor yet rashly to be credited. So with the one of these twaine (for the other was kept behind as an hostage) two other spies were sent by the same mine to discover the traine. By whose relation, when it appeared sufficiently, that all was safe and without danger: by the leading and guiding of the traitor aforesaid, 300 armed men, by night entred the citie, and seized that gate which was next unto them: at which, being broken open, the Consull and the Romanie armie without resistance, made entrie, and surprised the citie. In this sort Nequinum was reduced to the obedience of the P. of Rome. A Colonie was thither sent to frontier against the Vmbrians, called of the *rivers name [which runneth under it] *Narnia. And the armie with a rich prize was brought againe to Rome.

The same yeare the Tuscanes, contrarie to the tenure of the truce, made preparation for war. But whiles they were busily occupied otherwise, it fortun'd, that a puissant armie of Gauls invaded their marches, and for a while altered their designements. Afterwards, by the meanie monie, whereof they were full and bare themselves mightie, they sought to make the Gauls, of enemies enemies to become their friends, and solicited them to band together, and so jointly to maintain warre with the Romanes. Their societie and friendship the barbarous people refused not; onely, they stood upon the summe what they should have for their hire. Which being agreed upon and received, and all things els in a readinesse for to goe into the field; when the Tuscans willed them to follow after, they flatly denied, that they had received any consideration for to make warre upon the Romanes: but whatsoever they had taken, it was because they should not waite the Tuscan land, and by way of hostilitie and force of armes, doe any violence upon the inhabitants: howbeit, if the Tuscans were so minded to employ them, they would bee willing to serve; but for no other reward and recompense, than to bee admitted into part of their territorie; that at the length they might have some certaine place of abode, to settle themselves in. Many Diets and consultations hereabout were held by the States of Tuscan, but nothing resolved and concluded: not so much, for that they feared to part with some of their lands, as because they were in great dread every one and abhorred, to have dwelling by them such neighbors, descended from so savage a race & cruell nation. Thus were the Gauls let go and dismissed, having away with them a huge masse of monie; which they got without any travell or perill of theirs.

The bruit of the Gauls tumult and insurrection, together with the Tuscans warre, caused no little feare at Rome. Whereupon, more hast was made to conclude a league with the Picene people. T. Manlius the Consull had the charge of the Tuscans warre allotted unto him. Who scarcely was entered into the confines of the enemies, but as hee was training and exercising amongst the horsemen, ran his horse with full carriere, and suddainly as he turned about, was cast off, and presently lay for dead: and so the Consull, three daies after his fall, ended his life. Which the Tuscans taking hold of, as a good ominous token & presage, got hart and were very jolies, saying, that the gods had in favour of them, begun this warre. This was heave news at Rome, both for the losse of so brave a personage, and for the time, wherein so unhappily it fell out: so as, the assemblie held (by the advise of the cheefe Peeres) for to substitute a Consull in his place that was deceased, frightened the Senatours from chusing a Dictator. All their sentences, and all the centuries, gave with M. Valerius to bee Consull: who was the man, whome the Senate was about to have pricked for Dictator. Then forthwith, they ordained him to go into Tuscan to the armie. Whose comming suppressed and kept under the Tuscans; so as not a man durst once go out of their trenches and hold. Even their very feare was as good as a siege unto them: for that the new Consull, neither by wasting the fields, nor firing their houses in such sort, as every where, not onely the final villages, but also the good and wel-peopled townes were seene to smoke and burn againe, could draw them forth to fight.

This warre continued longer than men thought: but behold, there arose a bruit of another, (which, considering the mutual losses of both sides, was for good causes greatly to be feared) upon intelligence given from the Picenes their new allies, namely, that the Samnites were about to take armes and rebell, and had solicited them also to doe the same. The Picentes were highly thanked for this, and a great part of the Senatours care was diverted nowe from Tuscan to the Samnites. The dearth besides of corne and victuals troubled the citie: and driven they had ben to extreame famine, if Fabius Maximus (as they have written, who are of opinion that hee was Edile that yeare) by provident purveying and diligent conveying of corne, had not been as careful and industrious, in the dispensing of victuall now at home, as many times before in war-affaires. The same yeare there was an Interregne, but upon what occasion, it is not knowne. The Interregents were App. Claudius, and after him P. Sulpicius, who held an Election of Consuls, and created L. Cornelius Scipio, and Cn. Fulvius.

In the beginning of this yeare, there came the Oratours from the Lucanes to these new Consuls, for to make complaint, That the Samnites, who by no conditions and meanes could induce them for to band and take armes with them, were entered into their confines, and made wast of the countrey, and by verie force provoked them to warre, saying, That the Lucanes had long agoe overshot and passed themselves that way: but nowe they were so fully resolute, that they could find in their hearts, sooner to abide and endure all kind of calamitie whatsoever, than ever after to offend and displease the Roman name. They besought the Senate therefore, to receive the Lucanes into their protection, and also to keepe and defend them from the violence and injurie of the Samnites. And for themselves, albeit entre-

A ring into warre already with the Samnites, they were of necessity obliged to be fast and true unto the Romanes: yet for better securitie they were readie to put in sufficient hostages. The Senate was not long consulting hereabout: but all with one consent were of opinion, to make league with the Lucanes, and to summon the Samnites to make amends and restitution. The Lucanes, besides a courteous & gracious answer, were accepted into the league. Then were there Fecial Heralds dispatched to the Samnites, to give them warning for to depart the territorie of the Roman allies, and to withdraw their forces out of the confines of the Lucanes. But the Samnites sent out certaine messengers to meet them upon the way, & to denounce unto them, that if they presented themselves in any Councel within Samnium, they should not depart againe with safeguard of their persons. When these news were heard at Rome, both the Senat advised, and the people allowed, to make warre upon the Samnites. The Consuls parted their provinces and charges between themselves. To Scipio fell Herruria, & the Samnites to Fulvius: and so they take their journey divers waies, each one to the warre allotted unto him. Scipio looked for no other, but a lingering warre at the enemies hands, and like to the defensive service of the former yeare: but behold, they with an armie well appointed and arraigned, encountered him and gave him bataille neere to  Volaterra*. Where they fought the better part of the day, with much bloodshed on both sides: and whiles they were doubtfull which way the victorie went, the night came between. But the morning after, bewtraied both who were winners, and who were losers. For the Tuscans in the still and dead time of the night dislodged. The Roman Consull comming forth into the field, and seeing by the enemies departure, the victorie confessed; went forward to the campe: which he found emptie of men, but full of rich pillage, (for they had fearfully and in great hast abandoned their tents) and was master thereof. From thence he retired his forces into the territorie of the Faliscanes: and after he had left at Falerij, all his bag and baggage with a meetly garrison there; lightly appointed, he marched forward, and with a running campe wasted the marches and territories of his enemies. He put all to fire and sword: drave away booties from all parts: and left not the ground onely, wast and desert, but set fire also upon castles and borough townes. Onely he forbore to assault the great and strong cities, into with feare had driven the Tuscans for refuge. Cn. Fulvius the Consull on the other part fought a noble bataille in Samnium, neere  Bovianum*, and the victorie was no whit doubtfull. After which he assailed Bovianum, and not long after Aufidena: & both cities he wan by force. The same yeare was there a Colonie brought to  Carseoli* within the territorie of the Aequuli. And Fulvius the Consull triumphed of the Samnites.

When as now the time of the Consuls Election drew neere; there was a rumour raised, that the Tuscans and Samnites were levying and enrolling of great and mightie forces: that openly in all their assemblies and Diets, the princes of the Tuscans were coured & reprooved, for that they had not waged the Gauls to warre, whatsoever it had cost them: that the magistrates of the Samnites were blamed, for exposing that armie as it were a price unto the Romanes, which had bene provided against their enemies the Lucanes. For now seeing that the enemies both with their owne power, and also with the helpe of their allies, were come to warre; they should not be able to match them, having their forces thus redoubled. Now albeit there were other famous and renowned persons stood to be Consuls, yet this new feare and affright turned all men to become favourites of Q. Fabius Maximus: who at the first made no suite, and afterwards, seeing the inclination of their affections, refused also to be Consull. Demanding what they ment to trouble and molest him, so aged a man as he was, and one, who as as he had gone through all labours and travails of this world; so he had passed also the rewards, and recompenses of his travailes: alleading, that neither strength of bodie, nor vigor of spirit could alwaies continue the same, and last for ever: and besides, he feared fortune her selfe, least haply she might be thought of any of the gods too propice and favourable unto him, and more pennant than the ordinarie train and course of this world would permit. Therefore, like as himselfe had grown up after the glorie of his elders, & succeeded them; he saw & beheld with joy of heart, others also rising up after him, and to succeed him in the like glorie: and as there wanted not at Rome high promotions and advancements for hardie and valiant men, so there failed not brave men of worth for to receive those honours and dignities. But by this refusall of his so modest, so just and reasonable he whetted and kindled more and more their earnest affections and favours towards him, which hethinking to dull and quench, with the reverent regard and awe of the lawes, commaunded a statute to be

be read, wherein it was not lawfull for one and the same man within tenne yeares to be created Consull twice. But scarcely for the noise that the people made, could this law be heard red: and the Tribunes of the Com. said, that this should be no let: for they would preferre a bill unto the people, that he might be discharged and despened withal from the Statutes in that behalf. Howbeit he stood stiffly in his refusal: demanding of them to what purpose & end were the lawes made, if by the verie makers thereof, they might be thus deluded & made of no force? For so (qd. he) lawes ruled not, but were overruled. But nath'lesse, the people went to a scrutinie and began to give their voices: and as everie Centurie was called into the railes, they named and chose Fabius Consull, without flicking at the matter. Then at last, overcome with this generall accord and consent of the whole citie: God say Amen (quoth hee) o Quirites, to that you doe and are about. But for as much as you will have your will and dispose of me at your pleasure, doe me this favour yet, that I may have the chusing of my Colleague. I beseech you make Consull with me, P. Decius, a man approved unto me alreadie, with whom, I have sorted well in the fellowship of another of sice: a man I say, answerable otherwise to the greatnesse of his name, and worthie of his fathers vertue, from whom he is defended. This favour which he requested, seemed unto them just and reasonable. So all the Centuries behind, created Q. Fabius and P. Decius for Consuls.

The same yeare the Ediles served processe upon verie many citizens for holding and possessing of more lands, than by law was limited: and none in a manner was able to acquite himselfe hereof. Which was a great bridle and restraint to their unmeasurable avarice. As the new Consuls, Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and P. Decius Mus the third time, conferred and laid their heads together about their charges, that the one should take in hand the Samnites, and the other the Tuscans; and consulted what forces might serve and be sufficient for this or that province and exploit; and to whether warre either of them were the more meete and sufficient leader; certaine Embassadors, from Sutrium, Neper, and Falerij, advertised them, That the States of Tuscanie, were now consulting in their Diets, about a Treatie of peace: which was an occasion, that they turned all their preparations and forces into Samnium. The Consuls being gone forth, to the end they might have the readier provision of graine and victuals, and the enimie be more to seeke, which way they would assaile them, led their Legions into Samnium; Fabius, through the territorie of Sora, and Decius by the way of the Sidicines. When they were come into the confines of their enemies, both of them spred themselves all abroad, and fell to forray and spoile the countrie: yet so, as they sent out their espials farther than they waited. Whereupon, they were well ware of their enemies, as they lay in ambush well appointed, within a close & secret valley neere Tifernum; what way as, they thought to take the vantage of the higher ground, & to set upon the Romans so soone as they were once entred in. Fabius having removed his cariages into a sure place, & set there a competent gard for defence, foretold his soldiours that there was a battaile toward: and in a four square battaillon marched directly to the forsaide Embalcado, where the enemies lurked & lay in wait. The Samnites then, despairing and out of all hope to do any great exploit, by suddain tumult, considering their trains were discovered; and seeing they must once at the length come to the triall in open field, were themselves also more willing to put all upon a set battaile. Thereupon they descended into the plaine and even ground, and committed themselves to the fortune of fight, with more courage of heart than hope of victorie. But were it, that they had assembled together the whole floure and manhood out of all the nations of the Samnites, or that the hazard of the maine chance, made them more hardie and take the better heart: surely even in plaine field, they held the Romans play and put them to great feare. Fabius seeing the enemies no way to recule and give ground, commaunded M. Flavius and M. Valerius, two Colonels, with whom he had set forward and advanced into the forefront, to go to the horsemen, and to exhort them. If ever they remembered and called to mind, that the Commonwealth had bene helped by the valour of the gentlemen on horsebacke, they should that day endeavour to make invincible and eternall, the glorie of that degree and order of Cavallerie. For seeing that the enemies stood unmoveable against the Infanterie, there was no other hope but in the force of horsemen: and herewithall hee called upon those two young Gentlemen, and plied both the one and the other with like courtesie, one while praising them, another while loding them with faire and large promises. But when as the assay of that force likewise, prevailed not, thinking where strength would take no place, there craft was to be tried and practised, he caused Scipio his Lieutenant, to withdraw out of the medley, the javeliniers veliniers of the first legion, and as closely as hee could to fetch about with them, toward the next hills: and then, to march up the hill some way from the sight of the enemies; and after hee had gained the top, all of a suddaine to shew himselfe behind, and charge upon the enemies backs, whiles their faces were turned another way. Now the horsemen, by the direction of those two Colonels, being ridden of a suddaine before the standards, troubled their owne fellows almost as much as the enemies. For against these troupes and cornets of horse that thus violently put forward, the Samnites battaile stood unmoveable, and on no part could either be forced to reforward, the Samnites battaile stood unmoveable, and on no part could either be forced to reforward, or to breake their array. The horsemen when they saw this attempt to take no effect, retired themselves behind the ensignes, and departed out of the battaile. Hereupon tooke the enemies more heart unto them; neither had the vanguard of the Romanes bene able to abide so long a conflict, and the violence of the enemies still encreasing, upon their owne confidence, but that the second raunges in the middle ward, by the Consull his commaundement, came forward into the front of the vaward. Where they with their fresh strength, staied the Samnites, being now readie to enter forceable upon them, and to gaine the ground: and withall, at the time appointed, the ensignes threw themselves from the hills, and came downe unware to the enemies; and setting up a shout, not onely daunted the hearts of the Samnites [but also encouraged the Romanes.] For both Fabius cried aloud, that his Colleague Decius approached, and every souldiour for his part, what he might, with joyfull and cheereful hearts, iterated, that the other Consull was come, and the legions were at hand. Which error and mistaking, as it turned to the good of the Romanes, so it caused the Samnites to flie, and to be surprisid with a fright, fearing and doubting nothing so much, as that being now overtoiled and wearied, they should be overcharged also with fresh and lustie forces. And for that in their running every way, they were scattered asunder, there was lesse slaughter than for the preparation of so great a victorie. For 3400 only were slain, & of prisoners were taken, welnear three hundred and thirtie: and three and twentie banners and ensignes woon and caried away. The Apulians had joined with the Samnites before the battel, but that P. Decius the Consull encamped against them at Maleventum, and having drawne them forth to fight, discomfited them. Where also there were more that fled, than died upon the sword: for not above 2000 Apulians were slaine. And Decius making no reckoning of that enimie, conducted his legions into Samnium. Where, two Consular hostes, having overrun the countrie in divers parts, within five moneths space laid all wast and desolate. Five and fortie places there were in Samnium, where Decius had encamped: and eightie fixe, wherein the other Consull had pitched. In which, they left behind them not only the marks of stakes, rampires, and ditches, but also many other more notable signes and tokens of the countrie wasted all about, and utterly spoiled by them. Fabius besides, woon the citie Cimetra. Where there were taken prisoner two thousand and foure hundred armed souldiours, and slaine there were in fight upon 430.

From thence he went to Rome against the Election of new Consuls; and made all the hast he could to dispatch that businesse. And when as all the Centuries first called forth to give their suffrages, named Q. Fabius for the Consull; then Appius Claudius a Consular man, and one of the Competitours, a grim sir, and ambitious by nature, laboured no more for his owne honour and advancement, than to recover again unto the Patrij, both the roomes of the Consulship, and employed as well his own devoir, as also all the means & assistance of the Patrij and Nobilitie, to have himselfe chosen Consull with Q. Fabius. As for Fabius, at the first spake and alreadie in his owne behalfe, the same reasons in manner which he had used the former yeare, and refused to be Consull. The whole bodie of the Nobilitie stood about his seat, praying instantly, and entreating him to plucke the Consulship out of the mire and base degree of these Commons, and to restore the auncient majestie both to the Magistracie it selfe, and also to the Patrij and their houses and families. Fabius after silence made, framed a middle and moderate kind of speech, whereby he appeased and allaid their hote affection, promising and assuring them, that he would willingly accept the names of two of the Nobilitie, if he might see, that they would create any other Consull but himselfe: for at this present Election, he would in no wise admit himselfe, to be eligible and nominated Consull, and give so bad a precedent to prejudice all course of law, for the time to come. So L. Volumnius, out of the bodie of the Commons, was created Consull with App. Claudius, who likewise in the former Consulship had been matched Colleagues together. The Nobilitie used to object unto Fabius, and reproched him, that he avoided App. Clau- deus to be his companion in government, who for eloquence & other civile parts was no doubt a singular and excellent man. When the Election was ended, the old Consuls were commanded to warre in Samnium, having their government continued, and their commission renewed for fixe moneths. And so in the year following likewise, when L. Volturnius and Appius Claudius were Consuls, P. Decius, who being Consull, had been left behind his Collegue in Samnium, ceased not now in qualitie and name of Proconsull, to wast the countrie; untill at length, when the Samnites would in no place abide battell, they were by him chased out of their owne borders and limites. And thus driven out of the field, and excluded out of their owne countrie, they went into Hetruria. Where, supposing that with so huge a multitude of armed men, they should doe that more effectually with intreatie and praiers, mingled with threats among, which by so many Emballages they had so oft attempted in vaine; they called for a Diet and generall Counsell of the Sates and Princes of Hetruria. Which being assembled, they declared and shewed, for how many yeares space they had maintained warre with the Romanes in the right of their freedome; that they had assailed all meanes, if haply they might have beene able by their owne puissance alone, to sustaine and support the weight of so huge and important a warre; that they had besides made proofe of the aides of other neighbour nations, but to little effect; that they had sought for peace of the people of Rome, when they were not able to wage war any longer: and because peace was more greivous unto them with that subjection, than war with their libertie, they had rebelled and made warre againe: and now their onely hope they had, remained in the Tuscanes; knowing well enough, that for men, munition, and monie, they were the mightiest nation of all Italie; as having to their neighbours the Gaules, a people borne and bred up in armor and war; by naturall disposition fierce & cruell, but especially in any quarell against the people of Rome; of whom they doe (and not untruly report) that they were by them vanquished and constrained to raunisme themselves for gold. Now, if the Tuscanes were of that heart and courage, as Porci- us sometimes, and other their noble progenitors were; there were no doubt, but that they might suffice the Romanes, and dispossesse them of all the ground on this side Tybris, and make them fight for the defence and preservation of their lives, and not for the intollerable feignorie and dominion of Italie. They said moreover, that there was now come unto them an armie of Sam-nites, well appointed and furnished with armour, and stored with pay and monie, who would follow them forthwith, even to the assault of the citie of Rome, if they would lead them.

Whiles they were thus braving, and gloriously boasting themselves, and preparing of warre in Tuscanie, the Romanes warre at their owne dores, lay fore upon them, and stung them at the heart. For P. Decius having learned by the espials, that the Samnites armie was gone forth, and had taken their voiage, assembled a counsell and said, What meane wee thus to raunge over the fields, warring from village to village? And not rather assaile the walled townes and strong citities? There is no armie now, that defendeth Samnium: gone they are out of their confines, and wrought their owne exile and banishment. When they all had allowed of this motion, hee led forth his power to assault the strong citie Murgantia. And so hotely were the souldiors set, both for the love they bare to their capitaine, and also for hope of winning a richer pillage thereby, than by driving booties out of the countrie, that in one day by fine force of armes they won the towne. Where two thousand and one hundred Samnites, fighting men, either fell upon the edge of the sword, or were taken prisoners, with a great & rich bootie besides. But for fear that it should surcharge and encomber the armie with heave carriages, Decius caused his souldiors to be called together unto an audience, and thus to them he said. And will ye stand contented indeed with this victorie onely, and this prey? Or will yee build your hope still, answerable to your prowess and valour? All the cities of the Samnites, all the substance and riches that lieth and remaineth in their cities are yours; for as much as yee have in so many battailes vanquished their legions, and at last driven them out of their owne countrie. Sell these prizes, and with hope of gain draw after you chapmen and merchants to follow the armie. I will from time to time still helpe you to wares and commodities for to sell. Let us goe from hence streight to the citie Romulea, where your toile shall not be so great, but the spoile farre greater. So when they had made sale of their pillage, and willingly of themselves called upon and exhorted their captain to that expedition, to Romulea they goe. Where likewise, without mure and platforme, without warlike engines of batterrie, so soone as they advanced their ensignes, and approched the wals, they could by no violence bee driven from thence, but set up ladders in all hast, at the next place that every man could

A could find, and so scaled up the walls. Thus the towne was woon and ranfacked. To the number of 2300 were slaine, & 6000 taken prisoners. The souldiors having gotten an exceeding bootie, were forced to sell it, and make all away, as before: and from thence without any rest at all given unto them were they led to Ferentinum, yet they marched thither with exceeding courage and cheerefulness. Howbeit, there they found more difficult & perillous service: for the walls were with all forcible meanes defended, & the place it selfe was both by mans hand, and naturall situation, surely fenced; but yet the souldiors now being fleshed, & inured to spoile, overcame all difficulties.
 Three thousand men about the walls were slaine: and the saccage fell to the souldiors share. The greatest part of the honor in assaulding & winning of these cities, is ascribed in some Chronicles to Fabius Maximus. For they write, that Murgantia was by Decius woon, but Ferentinum & Ro-mulea, by the conduct of Fabius. But some attribute the glorie hereof unto the new Consuls.
 B And there are, that give the glorie not to both, but to the one of them, to wit, P. Volturnius, unto whom befell the Province of Samnium.

Whiles these affaires thus went in Samnium (by whose leading and managing it skills not) in the meane time a mightie war was a preparing in Hetruria; and that, of many nations banded together: the principall author whereof was Gellius Egnatius a Samnit. The Tuscanes, in manner all, had taken armes and levied their forces, and the neere societie, caused also the people of Umbria adjoining to take their part: besides, Gaules also were waged for money to ayde: all which multitude assembled together, & met in the Samnites camp. The newes of which fodaine and unexpected tumult, being brought to Rome; for so much as P. Volturnius the Cos. with the second C and third legions, & with 15000. confederates, was gone alreadie into Samnium; it was thought good & determined, that Ap. Claudius with all speede possible, should go into Hetruria: and after him, two Roman legions followed, to wit, the first and fourth, with twelve thousand allies; who encamped not farre from the enemy. But more good was done there, in respect that they came thither betimes, (to the end that the feare of the Romane name might keepe in awe certaine nations in Hetruria, which alreadie intended warre) than for any exploit performed either skilfully or luckily, under the conduct of the Consull. Many skirmishes there passed in places of disadvantage, and at times inconvenient; in so much, as the enemy took more heart, and conceived greater hope every day more than other: and now it grew welneere to this point, that neither souldier could wel reckon of the sufficiency of Capitaine, nor Captain trust upon the loy-D altie of the souldier. In three severall Annales I find, that Appius dispatched his letters to his fellow Consull, and sent for him out of Samnium: howbeit, I am loth to set this downe, being so uncer-taine as it is; seeing that the verie Consuls themselves of Rome, who now the second time were coupled together in one government, contested, and openly jarred about this point: whiles Ap- pius denied flatly that he sent any script at all, and Volturnius again avouched, that he was sent for by Appius his letters. Volturnius by this time had woon three Castles in Samnium, wherein were slaine three thousand enemies, and almost halfe so many taken prisoners: and composed besides, the seditions and quarels of the Lucanes, which arose from the commons and needie persons; and that, with the exceeding good contentment of the chiefe and principall personages of the countrie, by the meanes and mediation of Q. Fabius the Proconsull, who was thither sent with E the old armie. This done, he left Decius to wast and pill the countrie of the enemies, and himselfe with his forces marched toward his Collegue into Hetruria. Who at his first coming, was received generally with all the joy that might be. For mine owne part, I suppose verily, that as Appius had good cause to carie an angrie stomach with him, in case his conscience bair him witnesse, that he wrote not unto him: so againe, if he had need of his Collegues aid, he shewed an illiberall, unkind, and unthankfull nature of his owne, in that he would so dissemble, and not be knowne thereof. For being come forth to meete him, before they had well greeted and saluted one another, How now, quoth he, L. Volturnius, is all well? How goes the world in Samnium?
 VVhat hath moved you to abandon and leave your owne charge and province, and to depart?
Volturnius made answer, that in Samnium all things went well and chieft prosperously, and F that himselfe was now come, as sent for by his letters: which if they were counterfet, and that there were no neede of him in Hetruria, he would presently turne his ensignes, and be gone.
 Many quoth he, & good leave have you: you may be gone when you wil, & no man holdeth you: and ill befecming it is, that you who peradventure are not able to weeld and manage your owne affaires of warre, should glorie thus, and make your boast that you are come hether to helpe others.

others. Hereat, Volumnius should reply again and say, It is well, and God send us good luck: I had rather lose my labour, than ought should have hapned, whereby one Consuls armie were not sufficient to deale with Hetruria. Now as the Consuls were parting asunder one from the other, the Lieutenants and Colonels of Appius his armie, came and stood round about them both: some requested their owne Generall, that the aide of his Colleague which ought to have bene accepted by them if it had bene required; now that it was offered so willingly, and of his owne accord, should not be refused and rejected. But the more part encountered Volumnius, as he was ready to die to go his way, and earnestly besought him not for any forward contention, & debate with his companion, to betray the common-weale. For if any overthrow or misadventure should happen, the blame would be imputed rather to the forsaker, than the forsaken: and now things were come to this passe, that the honor or dishonor of the war in Hetruria, prove it wel or ill, should fall upon Volumnius: for that no man would enquire of the words and language that Appius gave him, but of the fortune and successe of the armie: and albeit Appius had given him his farewell and passport, the weale publick & the armie held him still by the sleeve, and for prooffe hereof, let him but make triall of the souldiers harts & affections. Thus with remonstrances, persuasions, and heartie prayers to the one Consull and the other, they drew them both, in manner against their wils, to parlie in publik audience before the whole army. Where they grew to longer speeches and discourtes, but to the same purpose and effect, as before in the hearing and presence of a few. Now when Volumnius (as having the better cause) seemed to reply, and that with good grace and words enough, against that singular eloquence of his Colleague; and that Appius in trumping and taunting manner, gave out and said, That they were beholden to him, and might con him thanke, that of a dumbe and tongue-tide Consull, they had one now, that was so readie and eloquent: & who in his former Consulship, & specially in the first moneths, could not open his mouth, and speake a word, was now of a sodaine become an Oratour, and able to make plausible and popular Orations: then replied Volumnius and said, Would God, with all my hart, you rather had learned of me to fight valiantly, then I of you to speak finely: & in conclusion, he said, he would tender him an offer, which should determine and put out of all doubt, whether of them twaine, were, not the better Lawyer and Orator (for at this present the commonweale stood not in neede of such) but the better warrior & Captaine generall. Whereas therefore, there are ij. Provinces, Hetruria & Samnium, it shal be in your choise (quoth he) to take one of them, whether you will, and I my selfe will with my owne armie, make warre in the other. Then began the souldiers to cry aloud unto them, that they would joyntly enter both upon the Tuscan warre. Which consent and accord of theirs, when Volumnius had perceived, For as much (quoth he) as I have once mistaken and misinterpreted the will of my Colleague, I will not in any case stand in doubt, and be ignorant of your minds too: let me know therefore by a shout of yours, whether you would have me tarrie or depart? Whereat they set up such a note, that it gave an alarme to the enemies, and raised them out of their camp; and presently they caught their weapons up, and came forth into the field. Volumnius likewise caused the trumpets to sound, and the standers and ensignes to be brought abroad. Then Appius (as it is reported) seeing plainely, that whether he fought or fate still, the victorie would be ascribed to his Colleague, stood in a mammering and suspence for a while: but afterwards fearing, least that his owne legions also would follow Volumnius, gave likewise unto his men the signall of battaile, which they so instantly called for. But neither they, nor the enemies were well arranged and in good order: for both the leader of the Samnites (Cellius Egnatius) was gone a foraging abroad, with some few cohorts and bands with him; whereupon the souldiers rather of their owne head, than by conduct and direction of Captains, began to charge: and also the Romane armies were not both lead forth together, nor yet had time enough to be marshalled accordingly: for Volumnius first gave the charge, before that Appius could come to encounter the enemies: whereupon, the forefronts were not equally matched together: and as if some fortune had exchanged the enemies, that they were wont to fight withall: the Tuskans presented themselves to Volumnius, and the Samnites who stayed a while (for that their Generall was absent) affronted Appius. It is reported that Appius in the very heate of the medley, was seene in the front of the foremost ensignes, to lift up his hands to heaven, and pray in this wise, O Lady Bellona, if thou give us victorie, and the honor of this day, then, be sure, I vow here unto thee at this houre, a faire Temple. When he had thus prayed, as if the goddesse had put life unto him, and animated his courage, both himselfe marched the valour of his Colleague,

A Colleague, and his armie answered the vertue of their Commander. For he performed the devoir and part (indeed) of a brave Generall. The souldiers likewise, for feare that the other armie should begin the victory, endeavoured and streined all that ever they could. Whereby, they disraied, discomfited, and put to flight the enemies, who could not easily abide any extraordinary force and violence, more than they were wont to meet withall. And so with preasing hard upon them still that reculed, and chasing them hotly that were scattered in flight, they beate them into their campe. There, by the coming in of Gellius and the Sabellian bands, the battaile for the time was freshly renewed. But when they also, within awhile were discomfited, then was the camp assaulted by the conquerors. Thus whiles Volumnius for his part entred with banner displayed unto the verie gate, and Appius ever and anon, reiterated the name of Bellona the victresse, and all, to set on fire and inflame the courage of his souldiers; there was neither trench nor rampier that could hold them backe. So the campe was won and sacked, and a huge pillage therein found, which was given all to the souldiers. Seven thousand and three hundred enemies were slaine, 2120 taken prisoners.

During the time that both Consuls, and the whole puissance of the Romans, were thus bent and imploied in the warre within Tuscane; there were new forces raised in Samnium, to wast the marches of the Romane dominion: who taking their way through the Vestines, into Campania and the cuntry of Faleria, drave huge prizes & booties away. And as Volumnius by great journeyes returned into Samnium (for by this time Fabius & Decius were come to an end of their prorogued government) the bruit that was blowne abroad of the Samnites armie, & their foraying of the territorie of Capua, turned him out of his way, to the defence of his allies and confederates. So soone as he was entred into the cuntry Calenum, both he himselfe saw the fresh marks and tokens of great dammage and desolation: and also the Calenians advertised him, that the enemies caried with them already so excessive a preie and bootie, that they were scarce able for it to march in good order, and that their captaines began openly to speake and say, that the best course they could take, was presently to retire into Samnium, there to leave their prizes and booties, & so to returne afresh to their rodes and make new expeditions; and not to commit an armie, so loden and furcharged, to the fortune and hazard of a battaile. Which words, albeit they founded much to a truth, yet he thought it meet to looke better into the matter, & to build upon a surer ground, and therefore he sent certaine light horsemen, to intercept some forragers as they stragled and were scattered one from another in the fields. By whom he learned, after much questioning with them, that the enemies encamped by the river * Vulturius, and from thence at the * third watch, would set forward on their journey directly into Samnium. After he had sufficient intelligences and advertisements concerning these things, he dislodged and put himselfe upon his way and encamped so farre from the enemies, as his approach by being too neere could not be knowne, and yet he might be able to surpris them as they should yssue in disorder out of their campe. So, a good while before day, he marched towards the enemy: and sent such as were well seene in the Osciane tounge, to listen and learne what they did. Who being intermingled with the enemies (which was an easie matter in that night garboile and confusion) they found that the ensignes were set forward, not sufficiently accompanied with armed men for defence; and that the whole pillage with the guard and convoy thereof, was now going forth, and marched carelesly, like a sort of vile and base lozels, every man thinking of his owne particulars and running on his owne head, without consent of others, and with little or no direction and government. This was thought the meetest time to set upon them: and now it drew neere day. Whereupon he commaunded the trumpets to sound the charge, and set upon the march of the enemies. The Samnites, incombred as they were, and pelted with their bootie, and few of them here and there in armour, began, some of them to double their pace and to march faster away, and drive before them the bootie: some stood still, and wist not whether they were better, to go on forward, or retire againe into the campe. But whiles they thus trifled and staid, they were environed and surprisid by the Romans: and by this time they had gotten over their rampier: much killing there was, and confusion in the campe. The Samnites, as they marched, besides that they were troubled with the assault of their enemies, were also disquieted with the suddain escape & revolt of their prisoners: who being some of them loosed, loosed also those that were bound: whiles others of them, caught vp their weapons which were fastened to the packes, and being confusedly intermeddled in the march, made a greater and more fearefull garboile and havoocke, than the verie battell of the enemies. And more than that, they per- G formed one memorabile and notable Act above the rest. For as Statius Egnatius the Generall, went about the ranks and files encouraging the souldiours to fight, they set upon him, scattered the horsemen asunder, that accompanied him, environed him about, and tooke him as he sat on horsebacke, and haled him to the Romane Confull. Vpon which tumult and sturre, the foremost ensigns of the Samnits were called back, and the battell which in manner was done, now began afresh: yet could not they any long time resist and hold out. Slaine there were about fixe thousand two thousand & five hundred taken prisoners. Amongst whom, were 4 Colonels and 30 ensigns: and that, wherein the victors took contentment of captives, 7000 & 400 hundred were again recovered; with an exceeding great bootie which they had gotten from their allies: whereunto, by proclamation were called, all that could lay any claime, or pretend a right, to seaze upon their owne goods, and to receive the same by a day appointed. And look what parcels could not be owned or chalenged by the true owner, was given away to the soldiours: who were compelled to make sale thereof, to the end, that they should not set their heart upon any thing but warre.

This saccage of the territorie of Capua, had raised great trouble and stir in Rome. And at the verie same time also, it chanced, that there came news out of Etruria, how that upon the withdrawing of Volumnius his forces out of those parts, all that countrie was up afresh in arms; that Gellius Egnatius the Samnite captaine, and the Umbrians likewise, were moved to revolt; and the Gaules also solicited with great summes of mony. At this bruit the Senate being affraid, commanded an abstinence or vacation of terme, and that all sorts of men should be mustered: and not onely the free borne naturall citizens, and the flower of the youth were prest and sworne, but certaine *companies also of the elder fort, yea and bands of Libertines newly enfranchised, were inrolled by the hundreds. Likewise they sat in Councel about devising meanes for defence of the cittie: & P. Sempronius the Pretor, had the whole government of the State. But the Senat was partly eased and discharged of this care, by the letters of L. Volumnius the Col, which gave intelligence that the forraiers of Campaine were diffeated, slaine, and put to flight. Therupon were decreed in favor of the Confull, for this exploit by him achieved, solemne processions, and the abstinence of terme again was remitted, which had continued for eightene daies space: and the procession abroad, was right joyfully performed. Then began they to devise about garrisons for defence of the countrie, thus waited and overrun by the Samnites. And agreed it was, that two Colonies should be sent, about the Vestine & Faleme coasts, one to the mouth of the river Liris, which K Colony was called *Minturnæ, the other in the Vestine Forrest & streights, adjoining to the Falerne countrie; where Synope, a Greeke town sometime stood, and afterwards was called by the Romanes there inhabiting, *Sinuessa. The Tribunes of the Com, had in charge to ordaine by an Act of the common people, that P. Sempronius the Pretor should choose certaine Triumvirs, about the sending and translating of inhabitants into those Colonies. But much adoe they had to find those that willingly yeelded to be inrolled Coloners, supposing indeed, that they were sent thither, not to inhabite land and ground for their best behoofe, but to lie in garrison, and to stand upon their guard in those frontiers, which were continually molested by warlike enemies. From the care of these affaires, the Senate was withdrawne, by occasion of the Tuscane warre, whereof the rumour daily increased: and letters also came thicke from Appius, L who warned them not to neglect the rising of that countrey: which letters imported, that four nations had united their forces, and banded themselves together; to wit, Tuscanes, Samnium, Umbria, and the Gaules: that they were already encamped in two places, for that one was not able to receive so greata multitude. Vpon these occasions, as also for that the time drew neere of Election of Consuls, Lucius Volumnius the Confull was called home to Rome. Who before that he called the Centuries for to give their voices, having assembled the people to an audience, discoursed before them at large, concerning the greatnesse of the Tuscan warre. How that afore time, when he himselfe and his brother Confull warred there together, it was of so great importance, that neither one leader, nor yet one armie was sufficient: and by report, the Umbrians, & a mightie power of Gaules were afterward combined unto them. M So that they should remember, that they were to chuse that day two Coss. against foure nations.
As for himselfe, but that he was certainly perswaded and assured, that the people of Rome would with a generall content declare him Col. who at that time, without all controuersie was counted the principall captain and best leader of all others, he would forthwith nominate a Dictator. No man

A man doubted, but that Q. Fabius was the man, who by the assent of all, was ment & destined to this charge: and him, together with Volumnius, both the prerogative tribe, & all those that were called first, everie one, nominated to be Coss. Fabius made a speech by way of excuse, in substance, like as he had done before, two years together: but afterwards seeing he was overcome with the generall agreement of the people, he framed it so in the end, that he required P. Decius to be his colleague: Alleging, that he would be in steed of a good prop & stay to him in his old age: how he had found by experience in one Consulship & two Consulships, born jointly together with him, that there was no surer & defence of the Commonweale, to the concord and agreement of those that are companions in government. And to any other new Colleague besides him, hardly could an old mans mind fort & frame. Also that he would and could more easily impart his mind & purpose to one, whose humor, condition, and behavior, he had been already acquainted with. The Coss.
B to one, whose humor, condition, and behavior, he had been already acquainted with. The Coss. himselfe confirmed his Oration, and accorded thereunto; as well, in regard of the commendable parts and deserts of P. Decius, as also of the good that proceeded and ensued upon the managing of war-affaires, by the concord and unitie of the Consuls; and of the hurt which happened and followed upon their disagreement and dissention; and therewith he shewed how neere they were of late to utter perill and destruction, through quarrels betweene him and his brother Appius; admonishing Decius and Fabius both, to live so, as with one mind and heart they affected and intended the same things. He added moreover and said, they were men of Action both, borne for war and to be soldiours; for martiall feats renowned already: but for to maintaine contentions of words and quarrels of the tongue, altogether rude and unskilfull, and such natures, C (said he) were fittest to make Consuls. As for nimble heads and fine wits, deeply scene in points and quirknes of law, full of their eloquent tearmes, such as Ap. Claudius was; those were meet to be made Lord Presidents of the cite and cheefe Iustices in the common place, for to sit in judgement of causes, and see the execution of lawes. Thus in handling of these matters was that day spent. The morrow after, according to the Consuls appointment, was the Election held, both of new Consuls, and also of Pretors. Q. Fabius and P. Decius were created Consuls, and App. Clau- dius Pretour, all absent. And L. Volumnius by Act of the Senate, and graunt of the Commons, had his government proroged, and continued in his charge one yeare longer.

The same yeare were many strange sights and prodigious monsters seen: for the turning away of the dangers foresignified and menaced thereby, the Senate decreed supplications and Leta-nies for two daies together. Wine and incense for the sacrifices, was allowed at the publick changes of the cittie, and in procession went both men and women in great number, with much reverence, to visit the holy shrines, and there to doe their devotions. These solemne supplications were more renowned and memorable, by reason of a contention that arose among the dames of the cittie, in the chappell of Ladie Pudicitia Patricia, which standeth in the beatt-market, by the round church of Aulus, who, notwithstanding she was noble descended from the race of the Patritii, yet had espoused Volumnius the Confull, a Commoner, and was married (forsooth) our of the familie and raunge of the Patritii. Whereupon, there began some short and cutted shewed words to be dealt betweene: and so (as women commonly are soone angrie and set on fire) they grew to heartburning and hote contention. Whiles Virginia alleadged and said, that shee being E a gentlewoman and Patritia borne, and a chaste and honest dame, was entred into the chappell of Patritian Chastitie: over and besides, she had not been noted for Bigamie; but was the wife of one onely husband, unto whom she was given and brought a pure maiden: and as for her husband, and his dignities which he had borne, his noble acts that he had achieved, shee had no cause to complaine, or be ashamed, nay rather she gloried therein right greatly. After this, shee accumulated these magnificent & glorious words, with as generous and brave a deed. For in the long street where she dwelt, she set by and cut off a part of her dwelling house, as much as would serve for an Oratorie or petite chappell, and there erected an altar. And when she had assembled the wives of the Commoners together, and had complained of the injurious dealing of the Pa- tritian dames, This altar (quoth she) doe I dedicate unto Pudicitia Plebeia: and all you here I exhort, that with what emulation, the men our husbands, in this cittie contend about feats of valor and armes, who may doe best; so likewise the Matrones and wives strive avie in continence and chastitie; and that yee will labour and endeavour, that this altar may have the name to bee frequented, and resorted unto, with more reverence and devotion, yea and if (it bee possible) of more chaste women, than that other of the Nobilitie. And so it fel out indeed, that from that time, this alter also had the same rites (in a manner) and ceremonies as the other, which was more ancient: in such sort, as no wife, but of approved honestie and chastitie, and wedded but to one husband during her life, might be allowed there to sacrifice and offer oblations. But this religious order and institution, in lapse and proesse of time was prophaned afterwards and divulged, and the altar frequented by them that were stained and infamous, and not onely by matrones of name and qualitie, but also by women of all sorts and degrees, until at last through disuse it grew to be utterly forgotten, and came to nothing.

The same yeare the Ædiles Curiule, Cn. and Q. Ogulius accused certaine Vsurers, who were convicted, and their goods forfeit and confiscate. And of that which came into the common chest, they caused to be made a brassen portaille in the Capitoll, and silver vessels for to furnish our three tables in Jupiter his chappell: also the image of Jupiter himselfe in the lantern or frontispice of the Capitoll, sitting in his chariot drawne with foure steeds. Moreover, at the figtree Ruminalis, they erected and set up the images of the foundling babes, the first founders of the citie, pendant at the teates of a shee wolfe. They paved also with square stone, the caufey and high way from the gate Capena, unto the temple of Mars. The Ædiles likewise Commoners, L. Aelius Patus, & C. Fulvius Curvius, of the forfeited monie which they levied of the graiers or farmers of the citie pastures, who were condemned and fined, exhibited certaine pageants and plaies, and set up golden bolles in the temple of Ceres.

After this, Q. Fabius the fifttime Consull, and P. Decius the fourth, entred their government, who now had been companions together in three Consulats, and in one Censorship, men renowned, not more for the honour of their noble exploits in war, which was right great, than for their loving agreement and concord. Which unitie of theirs was not perpetuall to the end; by occasion, I suppose, of the contention of the States that came betweene, rather than of any difference betwixt themselves. For the Patritij laboured, that Fabius should have the province of Tuscan extraordinarily: and the Commons were as earnest with Decius to put the matter to a Lotterie. Certaine it is, that a great contention there was in the Senate. But afterwards, seeing that Fabius was able there to doe more and make a greater side than his Colleague, the matter

Delate betwixt Decius and Fabius for the province

was brought againe before the people. In which assemblie, few words passed betweene the parties themselves, being martiall men both, standing more upon deeds than words. Fabius gave out and said, that it was an indignitie, that another should gather fruit under the tree that hee had planted. Also, that himselfe was the man, who had opened the way through the wood Ciminius, and had given entrance and passage for the Romane warre, through desert and wild forrests. What meant they then to trouble him, a man of those yeares, with this place of charge, in case, they minded to give the conduct of this war to any other Generall but himselfe? No doubt, but by little and little hee upbraided them covertly and cast in their teeth, for chusing unto him an adversarie, and not a companion in government: yea, and charged Decius, that he repented and envied the good concord, wherein they had lived together, during the time of three Magistracies already. Finally, he aimed and reached at no farther matter than this, but if so bee, they thought him worthe of the province, thither to send him. For as he had been at the appointment & pleasure of the Senate, so would he be at the ordering and direction of the people. On the other side, P. Decius complained of the injurie offered by the Senat: for that the Nobles had endeavoured to their power, and done their best, that no Commons might have acceffe to honourable places and dignities: and after that prowesse and valour had gotten the upperhand, and prevailed so, as even in those kind of men vertue wanted not her due reward and honour; there were meanes sought, that not onely the voices of the people were deluded and made vaine, but also the very awards and arbitrements of fortune, were transferred to the wils and pleasures of some few. All Consuls before him had given their provinces by lot: and now the Senate by their absolute authoritie, without casting lots, gave unto Fabius the charge of his province. If it bee (saith hee) to honour the man: verily, he hath so well deserved both of my selfe and of the Commonwealth, that I favour highly and tender the glorie of Q. Fabius: provided alwaies, that it get not a shining lustre, by a toile of my disgrace and dishonour. And who will ever doubt, where there is one difficult and dangerous warre, and the same precisely and absolutely charged upon one Consull, without ordinarie and lawfull calling: but that the other Consull standeth for a cipher, and is reputed either needlesse, or good for nothing? As for Fabius, like as hee gloried

A gloried in his service and noble Actes atchieved in Tuscan, even so would Publius Decius also full faine doe the semblable: and peradventure, hee should bee able to put out and quench that fire once for all, which Fabius left behind him, so covered and raked up, as that oftentimes it suddainly brake out againe; and yeelded forth newe flames and blasfes. In conclusion, hee could bee content to yeeld the titles of honour and all rewards of vertue unto his Colleague, in the reverent regard of his old age, and majestie of his person: but for any hazard or jeopardie that might be presented unto them, he neither at this time gave place, nor ever would (with his good will) to him or any man else whatsoever: and if he gat no other good by this contention, yet would he obtaine thus much at the least, that the people should hold their owne, and dispose of that absolutely at their discretion, which was in their power; rather than permit the Nobles to gratifie any one therewith at their pleasure. And herewith he prayed Opt. Max. and all the immortall gods, that even as they vouchsafed to bestow upon him and his Colleague equall valour and happineffe in the conduct of their warre, so they would afford them one and the same right in authoritie and rule. For certes, it was in nature meete and reason, for example good and profitable, and for the credit and fame of the people of Rome much materiall, that such should be Consuls, as by either of their guidance and conduct, without exceptions, the warre with the Tuskans might be administred, as it ought to be. Fabius then, having besought the people nought else, but that before the Tribes were called in to give their suffrages, they would heare the letters of Ap. Claudius Pretor red, which were brought out of Tuscan, departed out of the assembly. So the Province of Tuscan, without casting lots, was awarded unto Fabius, with no lesse consent of the people, than of the Senate. Hereupon, all the younger sort (in manner) ranne unto the Consull, and offered their service of themselves, and gave their names to be enrolled, so desirous were they to serve under that Captaine. Which multitude being thus stocked about him round; Foure thousand foote-men, quoth he, and fixe hundred horse, and no more, am I minded to take up and levee. As many therefore, as to daye and to morrowe, will present themselves and give their names, will I accept of, and take with me: more care have I to bring you all home rich and wealthie, than to have numbers of souldiers to fight my battailes. Thus went he forth with a comperent armie well appointed, and so much more confident, & in hope of good successe, by how much lesse he stood upon the great number; and directed his journey to the towne Atharna, where Appius the Pretor encamped, & from whence the enemy was not far distant. A few miles on this side, the seuillers or woodpurveiors, accompanied with a good gard of souldiers for their convoy, met him: who seeing the sergeants going before, & understanding that it was Fabius the Consull, with joy & cheerefull hearts, thanked God & the people of Rome, for sending unto them such a Generall. After this, when they came all about the Consull to salute and welcome him, Fabius demanded whether they went? who answered, To purvey wood and seuell. Say ye so? (quoth he) and have ye not your campe empaled and fortified? Yes, cried they all, and that with a double rampier and ditch, but yet are we in exceeding feare. Then quoth he, ye have wood and timber enough. Go ye back again, & down with the trench & pallisade. Who returned into the camp, and as they were plucking up the rampier, they gave the alarme both to the souldiers that taried behind in the camp, and to Appius himselfe, and made them afraide. Then every man sayd, to one or other as they came, that it was by the expresse commandement of Q. Fabius the Consull that they did so. The morrow after they removed the camp, and Appius the Pretor was dismissed and sent away to Rome. After which time, the Romanes abode no where in standing campe: for he said, it was not good & commodious for an army to make abode in any one place; but that it was better and more holosome both for the agilitie and health of their bodies, to have a running campe, to be ever marching, and changing the aire and the soyle. But their journeyes were no other, than the winter would permit, which was not yet past.

In the beginning of the Spring, Fabius having left the second legion at Clusium, which in old time was called Camars, and appointed L. Scipio Propretor to be governor of the campe, he returned himselfe to Rome for to consult about the warre: were it of his own accord & mouffe, because it appeared evidently in view of eye much greater than it was reputed before; or that he was sent for by order from the Senat: for there be writers that affirme both the one and the other. Some would have it thought, that he was called back again by Appius Claudius Pretor, who both at the Counsell table in the Senatehouse, and also before the bodie of the people (like

(like as he had continually done by letters) enforced the feare and terror of the Tuscan warre, G saying, that one Generall and one armie, were not sufficient to make head against foure nations: that it would bee dangerous and doubtfull, whether they ioyntly in one masse gave battaile unto one, or maintained warre apart in diuers quarters: that one man was not able to performe and manage all at once. As for himselfe, hee had left behinde him two Romane legions and no more, and with Fabius there were come not full five thousand in all, of horse and foote together. His opinion therefore was, that with all speede, P. Decius the Consull, should go to his Colleague into Tuscane, and L. Volumnius have the charge of Samnium in the meane time. But in case the Consull had rather go into his owne province, then he advised, that Volumnius tooke his way directly, with a full and compleat Consular army into Tuscane, to the Consull. When this discourse of the Pretor, had moved a great part of the house, then P. Decius spake H (by report) to this effect; That all should be left entier and free to the disposition of Q. Fabius, untill such time as either himselfe in person (if it might stand with the weale publick) were come to Rome, or sent one of his Lieutenants, by whom the Senate might be informed, and truly understand, the poyle and importance of the warre in Tuscane; what forces were requisite, and how many leaders and captaines were expedient and needefull. Fabius, so soone as he was returned to Rome, both in the Senate house, and also in the audience of the people, held a middle course in all his speech; that he might seeme neither to increase, nor yet to diminish the rumor of the warre; and in assuring to himselfe another Captaine, he pretended, that he condescended thereunto, in regard of other mens feare, more than for his owne safetie, or for any danger that the State was like to incur. Howbeit, if they would allow him a coadjutor and companion in warre, I how might he forget P. Decius the Consull? of whom he had so good proofe and experience in so many Magistracies, which they had borne and administered together. Of all men in the world he loved none better, and would make choise of no one sooner: and having P. Decius with him, hee would never thinke his forces too fewe about him, nor his enemies too many before him. But if peradventure the mind and heart of his Colleague stood otherwise, his request was, that they would give him L. Volumnius to be his assistant. The determination of all was referred over to Fabius, both by the people and Senate, and also by the Consull himselfe. And when as Decius shewed & testified, that he was ready to take a journey either into Samnium or Tuscane, there followed such a joy and gratulation of all men, as if they had conceived in their spirit a victorie aforehand, and even now, had decreed for the Consuls, not a doubtfull warre, but a glorious triumph. I find in some writers, that Fabius & Decius, presently upon the entrance into their Magistracies, went into Tuscane, without any mention of casting lots for their charges and provinces, or of the contention betwene the two Colleagues, which I have set downe. There be some againe, who having laid abroad these debates, stayed not there, but over and besides have added a surcrease of matter, touching the invectives of Appian before the people, against Fabius in his absence; as also the obstinat stubbornnes of him being Pretor, against the Consull, to his very face: moreover, another contention and variance betwene the two Consuls; whiles Decius endeavoured to bring about, and was instant that each one should keepe him to his owne Province allotted unto him, and hold it. But all writers agree in the course of the historie, from the time that both Consuls went out to warre, and so forward. L

But before that the Consuls arrived in Tuscane, certaine Gaules called Senones, came with a great power before Clusium, ready to give assault unto the Romane legion and the campe. But Scipio, who was left Governor thereof, thinking it necessarie to help out the small number of his men, by advantage, of the ground, led his armie up to the hill betwene the towne and the camp. But (as it falleth out in such sodaine cases) he had not discovered aforehand the waies and avenues all about; but inconsiderately went forward, and engaged himselfe up to the top and pitch of the hill, which the enemy was maister of already by another side. Thus was the legion assailed on the back, & beaten downe, and thus was it enclosed and environed round, by a multitude of enemies, and put to the sword. Some writers there be who report, that the whole legion perished there, so as not one escaped alive to carry tidings. Also, that the Consuls who now were not farre from Clusium, had no newes brought them of this overthrow, before the horsemen of the Gaules were in fight, who carrying the heads of them that were slaine, some hanging before at their horse poyntles, other sticking aloft upon their lances, braved and triumphed, singing and chaunting songs of joy, after their manner. Some write they were the Vmbrians and not

A not the Gaules, and that the defeature and massacre was not so great: also that when the forragers for the campe under the leading of L. Manlius Tergathus a lieutenant, were compassed about by the enemy; then Scipio the Pro-pretor came forth of the campe to succour and rescue them, and that the Vmbrians, who first had the better, afterwarde when the battaile was renewed, suffered the foile and were overcome, and that as well their prisoners as their bootie was taken from them. But more probable it is, that this overthrow was given by the Gaules, than the Vmbrians; for that as divers times afore, so that yeare especially the cittie was frighted with the tumults and risings of the Gaules. Vpon this defeature, over and besides, that both the Consuls were gone to warre with foure legions, and a great power of Cavalterie of naturall Romanes and a thousand horsemen of Capua, chosen out of purpose for that warre, and sent unto them, with a greater power also of allies, and of Latines than of Romanes; B there were two other armies not farre from the cittie of Rome, opposed to frontier & make head against Tuscane: the one in the Faliscian territorie, the other in the Vatican. Cn. Fulvius & L. Posthumius Megillus, both Propretors, were commanded to keepe a standing campe in those parts. But the Consuls by this time, having passed over the mountaine Apenninus, were come to the enemies within the country of the Sentinats. And there about foure miles off, they fat them down and encamped. Then the enemies, after much consultation, resolved in the end upon this point; not to be intermingled all in one campe, nor come into the field and hazard all their forces at once in one battaile: but that the Gaules should take the Samnites unto them, and the Vmbrians joine with the Tuscans. The day of the battaile was appointed. The Gaules and Samnites had the charge to maintaine the fight: and in the time of battaile the Tuscans and Vmbrians were commanded to assault the campe of the Romanes. But these their designs and purposes were altered by reason of three Clusine fugitive traitors, who by night stole away privily unto the Consull Fabius, & disclosed the intents and enterprise of the enemies: who were sent away with rich rewards, to the end that everie hower, upon new plots and devises that should be determined by the enemies, they would give them an ynking and certaine intelligence. The Consuls wrote unto Fulvius & Posthumius, that the one should advance & come forward with his armie, out of the Faliscian country; and the other out of the Vatican directly unto Clusium: and that with all their forces, they should overrunne and destroy the enemies countrie. The rumor of these rodes and invasions, caused the Tuscans to remove out of the Sentinate territory, to the defence of their own frontiers. Hereupon the Consuls made speed to strike a battel in their absence. D And for two daies space they skirmished continually with the enemy, and chalenged him to the field: but for those two daies, no worthie deed of importance was atchieved. A few on both sides were slaine, and hereby were their courages rather provoked, & their stomachs whet to a full set battaile than any trial or hazard made of the maine chance. Vpon the third day into plain field they come with all their power. When both armies stood ranged in battaile aray, there fortun'd a Hind to be chased out of the mountains, & to run away before a Wolfe, even through the mids of the plains between both armies: then, parted both these wild beasts atunder, the Hind tooke her way to the Gaules, and the Wolfe his course to the Romans. The Wolfe had way given him through all the ranks & files: but the hind was killed among the Gauls. Then a Romane foldior, E one of the forefront, who was to fight before the ensignes: There will the fight, (qd. he) there will the slaughter bee, where you see the beast sacred and dedicated to Diana lie dead: but heere on this part, the martiall Wolfe, consecrated to Mars, having with victorie gone cleere away safe and unwounded, hath put us in mind of our martiall nation and of our first founder, the sonne of Mars. The Gaules put themselves in the right wing, the Samnites in the left. Against the Samnites, Fabius marshalled the first and third Legions, in the right point: and Decius, the fifth and sixth in the left, affront the Gauls. For the second & fourth served in Samnium under L. Volumnius Pro-consull. At the first shooke and encounter, the battaile was so indifferently fought, and with so equall force, that if the Tuscans and Vmbrians had either shewed themselves in the field, or assailed the campe, the losse and overthrow must needs have light in either place, where as they had bent their forces. F Howbeit, although hitherto the conflict of battaile went equall and indifferent, and that as yet fortune had not determined, which way she would incline and give the victorie; yet they fought not alike, in the right and left wings. For the Romanes under the conduct of Fabius, rather warded the enemy warily, and stood upon their gard, than offered to charge lustily: so as they maintained fight, & drew it at length untill it was verie late in the evening, because the captain captaine was enformed and persuaded of the Samnites and Gauls both, that being as they were in the first skirmish very hot and furious, it was sufficient to keep off at length, & at staves end. As for the Samnites, their courages would abate & fall by any long conflict: and the bodies of the Gauls, (who of all other can least away with travaile, & heat especially) would turne all to sweat, and melt away: who at the beginning, fight more fiercely than men, but in the end more faintly than women. Against that time therefore, when the enemy used to faile & give over, Fabius had kept his lodgers in breath, & reserved their strength fresh and lustie. But Decius, being verie eager and hot by reason of his youth and courage of heart, laid on lustily at the first, and spent upon the enemies all the force and vigor he had: and for that the Infanterie seemed to fight but coldly, he set the Cavallerie a worke: and himselfe personally in the thickest throng and troupe of most valiant and hardie knights, exhorted & besought the formost gallants of those lusty youths, to joine with him, and to charge upon the enemy: saying, that they should cary away a double honor, if by the means of the men of armes, the victorie began at the left wing. Twise they forced the Gauls horsemen to turne side and backe: but when as they were engaged farther within, and were now fighting hard pell-mell among the squadrons of the horsemen, they beheld a new and strange kind of fight, which troubled & terrified them. For the enemies standing all armed upon chariots and wagons, with a great noise of their steeds, & rumbling of the wheeles ran full upon them, and mightily affrighted the horses of the Romans, which had not been acquainted with such uncouth and strange dinns. So the horsemen who had the upper hand before, and were at point of victorie, were now with a foule feare discomfited & scattered, as if the hideous furies of hell, and the devil himselfe had bene amongst them. Whereupon they fled suddainly, & not looking before them were overthrowne both men and horse. By this occasion, the ensignes of footmen were distressed and disordered; and many of those that were ranged in the front before the ensignes, were by force of horse & wagons, driven crosse through the battailions, troden under foot, and their guts squashed out. Herewithall the battailions of the Gauls footmen, seeing their enemies thus scared, followed on apace, & gave them no time of breathing. Decius cried out aloud to his men, Whether slee yee? Or what hope have yee to save your selves by flight? Decius opposed himselfe against them that recoiled and fled: Decius rallied those that were disbanded and scattered: but seeing that by no force or means he could stay them, thus amazed and astonished as they were; he called upon his father P. Decius by name, and said; Why do I stay any longer the fatall death that is destined to my house and name? It is given to our race and familie, to be sacrificed in lieu of propitiatorie sacrifices, for to assuile and save the publike-weale from dangers menaced & threatened unto it. Even now therefore, will I offer the legions of the enemies to be sacrificed with my selfe to Dame Tellus and other infernall gods. When he had spoken these words, he commaunded M. Livius the high priest (whom as he marched into the field, he streighly had charged not to depart from him) for to pronounce and say that forme of words, whereby he should devow, offer, and berake himselfe to death, together with the legions of the enemies, for to save the armie of the Quirites & people of Rome. Which when he had done by the same forme of prayer, and in the same habite wherein his father P. Decius at the river Veseris, in the warre against the Latines, caused himselfe to be offered to death: and besides these solemne prayers, added moreover these words:

That he drave before him, Fright, flight, murther, massacre, bloudshed, yre and wrath of gods in heaven, & fiends in hell; and that he would with deadly maledictions and execrable curses smite the ensignes, weapons, and armours of his enemies; and that one & the same place, should give both himselfe, and also the Gauls & Samnites together with him, plague, perdition, and destruction. After these cursed, horrible, and detestable speeches against his owne person and his enemies; looke where he saw the thickest ranks of the Gauls, thither he spurred his horse, and rode in amongst them: where amidst the pikes, javelins, and swords, he was presently slaine. Then could it hardly be seene, that the battaile was any longer fought by power and helpe of man. The Romans so soone as they had lost their captaine, (which at all other times is wont to smite a terror into them) staid their flight, and were willing and contented to renew the battaile afresh. The Gauls, and especially that troupe which stood about the Cos, his bodie, fared as though they had ben out of their wits, flung their darts from them (I know not how) to no purpose, & in vaine: some of them stood still, as it were benumbed, forgetting both to run away, and to fight still. But on the other side, the high priest Livius, with whom Decius had left the serjeants, & whom before his death hee nominated and ordained to be Propretor, cried out, as lowd as he could, that the Romans

A had the victorie, and by the death of the Consull, were acquit and excused from all other fatall daunger: but as for the Gauls and the Samnites, they were destined and forfeited (as it were) to mother Tellus and the infernall spirits. And now Decius (quoth he) haleth after him, and calleth to follow him; the armie that with him was devowed, cursed, and offered: now all the enemies are full of furies and fearefull fright. Then, as these aforesaid began the medley againe, beheld there came unto them, Cornelius Scipio, and C. Martius with a supplie of succours from the rearward: who by commaundement of Q. Fabius the Consull, were sent to aid and rescue his Colleague. Where they heard of the worthe end of P. Decius, a noble example to encourage them to adventure all hazards in the service of their countrie and Commonweale. Therefore, when as the Gauls stood close and thicke together, opposing their targuets before them, ranged & joined one over another featherwise, so, as to deale with them affront, and to cope together at hand strokes, was thought a difficult and dangerous matter; then, by the commaundement of those two Lieutenants, the darts and launces which lay strewed upon the ground, betwene the two armies, were gathered up, and slung against the pavoise or tortoise-fence of the enemies targets above said. And by reason that these javelins and speares light and stucke fast, some in their targets, and some in their very bodies, it happened, that their knot was broken, and the battailion (as massive and close as it was) disbanded, in such sort, as many of them, notwithstanding their bodies were untouched and unhurt, fell down astonished one upon another. Lo how fortune altered the case, & changed all in the left wing of the Romans. But in the right, Fabius (as is before said) at the first, lingered and drew on the day: but afterwards, when as he perceived, that neither the enemies shouds, nor their manner of giving charge, ne yet the darts and javelins which they launched, had the same vigor and force, as before; hee commaunded the captaines of the horsemen to wheele about with their cornets, and to flanke the Samnites, that upon a signall given, they might charge them overthwart with all the violence they could, whiles his owne Legionarie footmen by little and little advanced forward, and brake the ranke, and disordered the enemy. When he saw once, no resistance made, and that without all doubt, they were wearied and out of breath; then he gathered together all his subsidiairie companies of the reregard, which hee had reserved untill that time and businesse, fresh and in heart; and at once, both set forward the Legions, and gave the horsemen also a signall to set upon the enemies. But the Samnites could not endure this violent charge, but ran as fast as ever they could to recover the camp fast by the battailion of the Gauls, leaving their fellows behind them in fight, to pay the reckoning. The Gauls having likewise made a target-fence, stood thicke and close together under it. Then Fabius advertised of the death of his brother Consull, commaunded a wing or corner, to the number almost of 500 horsemen of Capua, to withdraw themselves out of the medley, to cast about and to play upon the backs of the Gauls: after whom, hee caused the Principes of the third Legion to follow; and wheresoever they elplied the ranks of the enemies by force of horsemen disordered and broken, there, to second them, and presse on still, and kill them whiles they were in disarray, and afraid. Himselfe vowed a temple to Jupiter Victor, together with the spoiles of his enemies. Which done, he advanced streight forward to the campe of the Samnites. Thither all the multitude of them were driven in great fright and disarray. And for that the gates were not able to receive so great a multitude, crowding together, they that were kept out, and could not get in, by reason of the throng of their fellows, began again to fight under the rampier. Where Gellius Egnatius, the Generall of the Samnites was stricken down and slaine: after this, the Samnites beaten within their rampier, were killed every one, & their camp after small resistance woon. The Gauls behind their backe were environned and cut in peeces. That day were slaine of enemies five and twentie thousand, and 8000 taken prisoners. Howbeit, this victorie cost the Romans blood: for of P. Decius his armie, there died seven thousand, and of Fabius, a thousand and two hundred. Fabius then having sent out to seeke the bodie of his Colleague, gathered up all the spoiles of the enemies into an heape, and burned them, to the honour of Jupiter Victor. But that day could not the Consull his bodie be seene, by reason it was covered and hidden under heapes of the Gauls that lay there dead. The morrow after it was found and brought againe with many a teare of all his fouldiours. Then Fabius setting all other matters for the time aside, solemnized the buriall and funeral obsequies of his fellow Consull, with due commendation and condigne praises, and with all honour that could be devised.

In Tuscan also about the same time, Cn. Fulvius Propretor, had fortunat successe to his hartes desire:

desire: for besides great damage done to the enemy, by invasions and rodes into the country, he fought also a notable battaile: wherein of Perusines and Clusines were slain above three thousand, and twentie ensignes woun. The Samnites, as they fled through the territoire of the Pelignians, were by them intercepted and enclosed; and of five thousand, they were left but one thousand. Great is the fame of that day, and of the battell that was fought in the Sentinate territoire; if a man hold him only to the truth, and make no more of it than it was. But some have overreached a little, & written, that the enemies were 40,330 foot, and 400 horse strong; also, that they had a thousand chariots, or waggones, reckoning and compassing the Vmbrians and Tuscane withall: who also (as they say) were at the battell. And to increase also the power and forces of the Romans, they report, that L. Volturnius Proprietor was a Commandery together with the Consuls, and that his armie was joined with the Legions of the Consuls. But I find in most Chronicles, that this victorie was achieved by the two Consuls only, Q. Fabius and P. Decius in the year next after in Samnium; and having forced and driven the armie of the Samnites, to take the hill Tifernum; nothing afraid for the disadvantage of the place, discomfited them, and put them to flight. Q. Fabius, having left the armie of Decius behind him in Tuscane, conducted his owne legions into the citie, and triumphed over the Gaules, Tuscans, and Samnites; and his soldiers followed him in his triumph, who in their rude militarie richmes and songs, celebrated no less the brave and noble death of P. Decius, than the worthie victorie of Quintus Fabius. And they revived the memoriall of his father late deceased, comparing him in equal degree, for the illustre event, as well publicke as private, with the praises of his sonne. Of the bootie and pillage gained from the enemies, the souldiours had given unto them 182 Assees apeece, with a liverie cloke, and a coat; a good reward for a souldiours service in those daies.

For all these notable victories achieved, yet neither the Samnites nor the Tuscans were at quiet. For, both the Perusines began to rebell, so soone as the Consull had away his armie; and also the Samnites came downe to forrey and spoile into the territoire of Vellute and Pormianum, and another way into Eletunium, which lie along the river Vulturnus. Against them was Appius Claudius the Pretor, sent with Decius his armie. And Fabius in Tuscane, which began new warre, slew foure thousand and five hundred Perusines, tooke prisoners 1740, who were ransomed for 310 Assees apeece. The rest of the spoile was all bestowed upon the souldiours. The Legions of the Samnites being pursued hard at heeles, partly by Appius Claudius Pretor, and partly by L. Volturnius Proconsull, met all together in the territoire of Stella. Where both the Samnite Legions abode, and also Appius and Volturnius joined and encamped together. There was a sharpe and cruell battaile fought on both sides. The Romanes were incensed with anger and choller against those that had so often rebelled: the other, upon a desperat mind were resolute to hazard the utmost. So there were slaine of the Samnites, 16300; 2700 taken prisoners; and of the Romanes there died 2700.

This yeare so fortunate in warre, was by reason of pestilence much afflicted; and for certaine prodigious tokens, full of care and perplexed. For it was reported, that in divers places it rained earth: and that in the armie of Appius Claudius, there were many smitten and blasted with lightening. In regard hereof, the bookes of Sibylla were perused and sought into. The same yeare Q. Fabius Gurgus, the Consull his sonne, fined and punished by the people, certaine wives who had been convicted and condemned before the people, of Adulterie; of which monie so raised by their fines, he caused to be built the temple of Venus, which standeth neere the great Cirque or Race.

There remaine yet behind certaine warres of the Samnites, whereof we have now continued our historie in these foure bookes, for the space of fixe and fortie yeares, ever since that M. Valerius, and Au. Cornelius were Consuls; who were the first that warred in Samnium. To let passe therefore, and not to trouble the readers, with a prolixie narration of the alternative overthrowes given and received betwene both nations so many yeares one after another, for all which calamities and losses their hearts and courages could not bee daunted or conquered; the very last yeare, the Samnites, in the Sentinate countrie, in the Pelignes territoire, at Tifernum, and in the territoire of Stella, were defeated both by themselves, with their owne legions, and also mingled with others; and that, by foure armies, and foure Roman Captaines; lost the bravest and most noble Generall of their nation; saw their confederats and allies in war, the Tuscans, Vibulanians, and Gaules, in the same predicament as themselves, nor able to stand and maintain their

A estate any longer, either by their owne power, or with help of forreine forces; yet for all this, would they not forbear and abstaine from warre, so little wearie were they of defending their libertie, although it were unfortunately: choosing rather, to be vanquished, than not to attempt the winning of victorie. Who is he, that would not thinke it yrkesome, and tedious, either to write or read this long suite and traine of warres, which they in fighting were never wearied?

After Q. Fabius and P. Decius, succeeded Consuls L. Posthumius Megillus and M. Atilius Regulus. To them both was committed the charge of Samnium; for that the brute went, that the enemies had prepared three full armies; the one to go againe into Tuscane, the second to invade and over-runne afresh the territoire of Capua, and the third to defend their owne frontiers. Posthumius by reason of sicknesse remained at Rome, but Atilius went presently with an armie forth, to the end that he might surpris the enemies on a sodaine in Samnium, before they had taken the field; for so the Senate had given direction: and he found the enemy in the way to meete him, as if it had bene so of purpose before by them determined, readie there to keepe him from entrance: and so far off were they from wasting the lands of the Samnites, that they could not once enter into their confines; nay, the Samnites debarred them from departure thence, into the peaceable parts and territories of their allies. Now when as they were encamped affront one against another; that which the Romanes being so often conquerours, would hardly have adventured, (see how utter despair driveth men to rash projects and extremities) the Samnites attempted: even to give assault upon the Romans campe. And albeit this so venturesome enterprise sped not well in the finall effect, yet was it not altogether in vaine attempted. There chanced to be a foggie mist, which continued a good part of the day, so thick and palpable; as men could not see before them; I say not, so farre as without the trench, but not so much as those that came close to speake one to another. The Samnites hereupon taking the advantage for an ambushment; before it was full day light, and the same much overcast and dimme with the mist, came as farre as the Corps de guard of the Romanes, who in the gates and entrance of the campe warded but negligently: being thus taken on a sodaine, they had neither courage nor strength enough to resist. At the back side of the camp, they assailed the great gate. Decumana, seized the Questors pavilion, and that quarter about it: where the Questor himselfe (L. Opimius Pansa) was slaine, and thereupon the alarme was given. The Consull, being with this tumult raised, commaunded two bands or cohorts of allies, to guard the Pretors pavilion, and that other of Suesians, which haply were next hand; to defend & guard the Pretors pavilion, and that quarter. In the meane while he marched with the legionarie bands along the high broad streete in the campe, called Principalis; and before they had buckled and fitted their armour about them, they were raunged in battaile aray; and had knowledge of the enemy, by the care and outcries, rather than by sight of the eye: neither could they give an estimate what number they were. At the first, as doubtfull of the event, and mistrusting their fortune, they recoiled, and received their enemies in, and let them come even into the middes of the campe: but then the Consull cried out, and asked, Whether they ment to be turned out of their owne rampiers and holds first; and after have a new peece of worke to assaile and win them againe? So, they set up a shout, and put all their might together, and first made resistance only and kept their ground; but afterwards they set forward, and pressed upon them; and having once beaten them back, they drave them afore them; with the same feare, that they themselves began, yea and chased them out of the gate and the trench: but to proceede further, for to pursue the chase, they durst not, for feare of some ambushment; by reason of the mistie & troubled weither, contenting themselves with the saving of their campe and no more: and so they retired within their rampiers, having slaine to the number welneere, of three hundred enemies. Of Romanes; as well those that were in the first Corps de guard and Sentinels, who kept the watch, as of those that were surprisied about the Questors lodging, were killed 230. This bold adventure of the Samnites (speeing so well, made them take better hart; so as they would not permit the Romanes to encamp farther into the countrie, no nor so much, as to go a foraging into their territoire: whereupon they were compelled to retire againe, and to purvie forage in the quiet and peaceable quarters of their friends about Sora.

The bruit of all these occurrences more troublesome and fearefull than truth was, being come to Rome, caused L. Posthumius the Consull, before he was well recovered of his sicknesse, to take the field; but ere he departed the citie, he proclaimed the Rendez-vous at Sora, for his soldiers there to meete. Himselfe now dedicated, unto the goddesse Victoria, the Temple, which in the time of his curule Edileship he tooke order to be built, with the money rayled of certaine fines taken of persons condemned. Then tooke he his journey to the armie, and so went forward from Sora directly into Samnium, to the camp of his brother Consull. But the Samnites distrusting themselves, as not able to withstand two armies, were dislodged, and departed backe: and the Consull also parted one from another, sundrie waies, to waste the country, and assault the townes. Pellumius at his first coming, assayed by fine force to assault the towne Milionia, and seeing he could do small good that way, at length by rolling trenches and platformes, he approached close to the walls, and wan it: and albeit the towne were thus forced, yet there continued a sharp and long fight in all streets and parts thereof; from the fourth houre of the day untill the eighth, with doubtfull and variable events for a good while; but in the end the Romans became masters of the towne. Of Samnites were slaine 3200, and 4200 were taken prisoners: besides the gaining of other bootie and pillage. From thence, he led forth the legions to Ferentinum, but the inhabitants with their bag and baggage, and all that ever they could drive or carie, had quitted the towne in the still night season; and departed in great silence at a contrarie posteine gate, which opened from the campe of the enemy. The Consull so soone as he was come, at the first approached the walls, as well appointed and provided of all things, as if he should have found as much to do, as at Milionia: but afterwards, perceiving all silent and desolate throughout the citie, seeing neither men nor munition within the towres, and upon the walls; he held back his souldiers, desirous and greedie to enter upon the bare walls, so abandoned and disurnished of defence: & doubting, to fall headlong ere he were aware, into the traines of some hidden & privie ambush, he commanded two cornets of the Cavallerie of Latine confederates, to ride about the walls along the countrescarp, and well to view and consider all places. The horsemen finding one or two gates, neere together of one side standing wide open, and in the verie same waies that led from thence, the fresh tracks and footing of the enemies, as they fled by night, rode softly neerer and neerer to the gates; and there they might see streight afore them safe entrance, and the citie lying open even from one end to the other: whereupon they brought word backe to the Consull, that the citie was abandoned, and the enemies gone: which was verie evident & apparent, as well by the very solitude thereof, as the new and fresh marks and traces of their dislodging, and departure; as also by the stuffe and goods that lay here and there scattred all abroad, whiles they hastened fearefully in the darke, to take their flight. The Consull upon this report, with his host drew to that side of the towne, which the horsemen were at: and pitching downe his ensignes not farre from the gate, commanded five other horsemen to enter into the citie, giving order, that when they had gone forward a pretie way, three of them should stay behind in the same place; if they saw all safe and out of danger; and the other two, bring him word what they had seene and found. Who being returned, made relation that they were gone so farre, as they might see about them every way into all parts, and could perceive nothing but silence and vast desolation all about, both farre and neere: then forthwith, the Consull entered into the citie, with certaine cohorts lightly appointed, and charged the rest in the meane while to fortifie the campe. The souldiers being once entered, fell to breake open the dores: where they found a few silly old folke, and some feeble and diseased persons, with such moveables as were hard to be conveyed and transported: those they rifled, and ransacked; and by certaine captives they understood, that divers other townes thereabout, were all with one accord fled and gone: and as for their owne countrymen, they departed at the first watch of the night, and they thought no other verily but that in the rest of the cities, they should find the like emptinesse and solitude. And as the prisoners said, so it proved indeede: and the Consull possessed himselfe of those forlorne and abandoned townes.

The other Consull M. Attilius, had not so easie warre for his part: who as he was marching with his Legions toward Luceria, which he heard was besieged by the Samnites; the enemy encountered and met him in the verie entrie of the frontiers, and gave him battaile: and the anger and indignation of both sides was answerable to their might & forces. The fight was variable & doubtfull on both parts, but the end & issue more heavie & dolorous on the Romans side: both because they were not used to be vanquished; and also for that in the verie loose and retreat, rather than in the combat and medley, they found that many more were hurt & slain of their part. Which fearefull fight & terror, as it began in the campe, if it had surprised them in the conflict,

*From ten of the clocke in the morning, untill seven in the afternoon.

A it would have beene an heavie day with them, and no doubt they had received a notable overthrow. And even then, being as it was, they had a carefull night, and full of anguish, thinking verily that the Samnites would presently assault their camp, or at least waies, that in the morning betimes they must of necessity fight with the conquerors. But the enemies, as their losse was lesse, so their heart and courage was never the more: For so soone as the day brake, desirous were they to be gone without any battaile. Howbeit there was but one way, and that lay close and neere to their enemies; which they were not so soone entered into, but they made shew a farre off, as if they marched streight to the assault of the campe. The Consull commaunded his men to arme, and to follow after him without the rampiers. To his lieutenants, colonels, and captaines of the Allies, he gave severall charges to doe as he thought needfull & requisite. They all promised to execute any direction whatsoever: but they said withall, that the souldiers hearts were done, that they had watched and sit up all night, amongst the grievous wounds and uncomfortable groanes of them that lay a dying: and no doubt if the enemy had come before day against the campe, so daunted were they, that they would have abandoned their colours: and even now for very shame, and nothing else, they forbore indeed to run away, but otherwise their hearts were gone, and they cleane spent. The Consull hearing this, thought good to go about himselfe in person, unto every one of his souldiers, and to speake unto them: and even as he met with any of them, & saw them so backward, and going about so coldly to take armes and weapon in hand; he checked and rebuked them: crying aloud, & asking why they sat still; why they loitered and made such hasting; saying, that the enemies would come to them within the very camp, & cut their throats, unless they made more hast to sally forth: yea & forced they should be to fight before their tent dores, if they would not give battaile without the trench and rampiers. They that are armed, (saith hee) and will fight manfully, shall obtaine undoubted victorie: but the unarmed and naked man that attendeth the enemies coming, must either die for it, or endure captivitie. As he rated and rebuked them in these termes, they answered flatly againe, that they had enough of yesterdaies worke, and were utterly done; and had neither strength nor blood left them in their bodies: and now the enemies (say they) seeme more in number, than they were the day before. Amid these speeches the armie approached: and being now but a little way off, they might take a full view of them more certainly, and see every thing. Whereupon they said confidently, that they saw the Samnites to bring with them their stakes and pales to cast a palliasse, no doubt, round about their whole campe. At this, the Consull cried out upon them, for verie shame, to suffer so foule a reproch and disgrace of a most dasterly enemy. And shall we be (quoth hee) beset and empaled within our owne campe, there to die for hunger and famine, with shame, rather than by edge of sword (if there be no other remedie) with honour, like men? The gods speed us well (quoth he) and their will be done; and do every man as he thinks best: as for M. Attilius the Consull, he is resolved even himselfe alone (if no man else will follow) to meet the enemy in the face, and rather be beaten downe and die amongst the Samnites ensignes, than see the Romane campe besieged, with a trench cast, and rampier raised about it. The Lieutenants, Colonels, and all the bands & cornets of the Cavallerie, yea and the principall Centurions of the foremost companies liked well of this, and accepted the Consul his words. Then the souldiers for sharke shame, full faintly take weapon in hand, and as slowly, God wot, go forth of campe. And thus in long ranks and files; not close united together, but broken here and there, with heave chere, and as men halfe vanquished already, they marched after a sort toward the enemy, who was neither in hope nor in heart better resolved and settled than they. For so soone as the Samnites discovered the Romane standers, suddainly from the vaward to the reregard, there went a muttering and bruit from one to another, that the Romans were come forth (the onely thing they alwaies feared) to empeach and stop their passage; so as now there was no way for them to flee and escape from them, and save themselves, but must either die in the place, or slay their enemies & make a lane even over their bodies. All their packs & fardels, they cast together upon an heap in the mids: and being armed as they were, every man ranged and marshalled themselves in their owne arais. Now was there a verie little space betwene the two armies, and they stood looking one upon another, waiting when their enemies would begin to give the first charge, and set up the first shout. But neither of both had any stomacke to fight. And surely on both sides, they had gone sundrie waies untouched, and without any blowes given or taken, but that they feared both, lest if they had dismarched of one part first, the other would have come upon them. Thus of themselves they began a faint

fight, as unwilling and loth thereto, with an uncertaine and unequall shout; neither started any man one foot. Then the Roman Consul, to begin the skirmish, sent out some few corners of horsemen from a side, without the battailions: whereof the most part fel from their horses, & others were disarmed and put out of order: whereupon both Samnites ran out to kill those that were fallen, and Romanes also to rescue their fellowes. Then the skirmish began a little to wax hott: but the Samnites advanced forward in greater number farre, and bestirred themselves (as it seemed) more lustily: and withall, the Romane horsemen being disordered and in confusion, with their horses affrighted trode under their feet the footmen that came to rescue. VWho beginning once to flie, caused the whole Romane armie also to turne their backs: And now the Samnites plaied upon the backes of the Romanes, as they fled: whereat the Consull rode before a gallop to the campe gate, where he bestowed a good corps degard of horsemen, opposite in the way; and made proclamation, that who soever came toward the campe, were he Samnite or were he Romane, should be taken and used as an enemy. With these and such like threats, he put himselfe against the soldiours, that hied them so fast in heapes to the campe. VWhithera way stirba, (quoth hee to every soldiour that he met) even here thou shalt find men in armes to fight withall; here shalt thou meet with thine enemy, as well as in the field behind: no entering here into the campe without victorie, so long as thy Consull liveth: chuse therefore whether thou shalt rather fight with thy owne countrymen or thine enemies. Whiles the Consull intreated them with this welcome, the horsemen also with speare in rest, and bent full against them, came all about, charging the footmen upon their perill to turne againe to battaile. Thus not onely the Consull his vertue & proesse served in good stead, but fortune also went on their side: for the Samnites followed not the chase so hard, but that the Romans had both time and ground enough to turne about their ensignes, and to direct their battailions from their campe against the enemy. Then one encouraged another to go to battaile againe. The Centurions snatched the banners out of the bearers hands, and advanced them forward: declaring to their soldiours, how few the enemies were in number, and how disorderly and out of all array they came against them. In this while the Consull lift up his hands to heaven, and with a cleere & audible voice, vowed a temple to Iupiter Stator, if so be the Romane armie staied their flight, and by renewing the medley should kill and vanquish the Samnites Legions. Hereupon endeavoured they on all hands, the captaine and soldiour, both horsemen and footmen, to re-enforce the battaile. And even the verie gods from heaven seemed to have a speciall regard of the Romanes at that time, so quickly the dice turned, and the enemies were repulst from the rampiers, and within a small while forced againe to the verie place where the battaile began. VWhere by reason of their fardels and packs which they had heaped together in the mids, and now lay in their verie way, they were stopped in their passage, and for feare, least their goods should be rifled and spoiled, they cast a ring round about their bag and baggage. Then the Romane Infanterie a front, and the Cavallerie behind, compassed them, and charged upon them right fiercely: where, in the mids between, they were either slaine or taken. The prisoners were in number 7300. who were all put naked under the yoke, and sold: the number of them that were slaine was about 4800. The Romanes for all this had no great list to boast and brag of their victorie, for the Consull taking view and account of his losse these two daies, found by computation, that he missed 7300.

Whiles these things thus passed in Apulia, the Samnites with another power, assaied to surprise and get againe * Interamna, a Colonie of the Romanes, situate upon the Latine high way: but when they could not be masters of the towne, they ouerran and harried the territorie: and having gotten a good bootie of men, women, and cattaille, one with another; whiles they were driving the same before them, together with certaine Coloners whom they had taken prisoners, they light upon the Consull as he returned with victorie from Luceria: where they not onely lost their spoile, but were themselves slaine as they marched disorderly in long files. The Consull made proclamation, That every man should repaire to Interamna, for to owne and challenge his owne goods, and to receive the same againe: and there, leaving his armie, went to Rome, against the Election of new magistrats. VWhen he laboured instantly for a triumph, he was denied that honour, both for that he had lost so many thousands, and also because he had put his captives under the gallows, and sold them, without farther imposition.

The other Cos. Posthumius, wanting subject matter of war to worke upon among the Samnites, passed with his armie into Tuscane: and after he had first pilld and spoiled the Voluntians territorie,

A rie, he gave them battel not far from their wals, who issued forth to defend their frontiers; where there were 2200 Tuscans slaine: the rest, by reason that the citie was so neere, escaped and saved themselves. Then led he his armie into the territorie of Rosellum, where he not only laid the fields wast, but wan the towne also: tooke prisoners above two thousand, and slue under two thousand before their wals. Howbeit, in that yeare, the peace obtained in Ueturia, was more honorable and renowned than the warre had ben. For three of the strongest and most puissant states, even the very capital cities of Tuscane, to wit, Volsinii, Perusia, and Aretium, desired accord. And having conditioned with the Consull, and promised, to find his soldiours clothing and come, so they might have leave to send Oratius to Rome to treat for peace, obtained at length a truce of forty yeares. And for that present, each citie was fined to pay 400000 Afkes. For these acts done, the Consull having requested triumph of the Senate, for manner and fashion, rather than upon any hope to speed, and perceiving some of them to denie him flatly, as pretending, that it was too late ere he departed the citie; and other some, for that without order and direction of the Senat, he passed out of Samnium into Tuscane; and that partly his adversaries, and partly the friends of his Colleague, who might take some comfort and contentment, that he also had the repulse with him, were against his triumph. My masters (quoth he) you that are Senators of Rome, I will not be so far mindfull of your honour and majestie, as that I will forget my selfe to be a Consull: and by vertue of the same authoritie of commission, wherewith I have conducted and managed these warres, for so much as, I have happily brought them to end; and subdued Samnium and Tuscane, atchieved victorie, and obtained peace; triumph I will, and ask you no leave. And with that, he departed out of the Senate. After this, there arose a debate and dissention among the Tribunes of the Commons: Some of them said, they would enterpose their negative, that he should not in this manner triumph, and give so ill a precedent: Others gave out, that they would assit him in his triumph, maugre the heads of all their Colleagues. After much ado, the matter was referred to the people, and the Consull being thither called, alledged, that L. Horatius, and Mar. Valerius Consuls, also Caius Martius Rutilius of late daies, even the father of him, who then was Censor, triumphed without the authoritie and approbation of Senat, only by the ordinance of the people. Over and besides, he added and said, that himselfe also would have mooved the people therein, but that he knew, that the Tribunes of the Commons, who were become vassals and slaves to the Nobles, would have nipped and crossed the bill. As for himselfe, he protested, that he did and would account of the will and favour of the people, agreeing together, as well as of all their acts and decrees whatsoever. So the morrow after, by the assistance of three Tribunes, against the opposition and negative voices of seven, yea, and against the generall resolution of the Senat, he triumphed: and all the people with great joy solemnized & celebrated the honor of that day. But the records do varie much about the acts and affaires of this yeare also. Claudius writeth, That Posthumius having woen certaine towns in Samnium, was after in Apulia discomfited and put to flight: and that himselfe in person being hurt, was with some few besides, driven to take Luceria for refuge: and that it was Attilius, that fought in Tuscane, and triumphed. Fabius contrarily reporteth, That both Consuls warred in Samnium, and at Luceria: and that one of the armies was transported into Tuscane: but which of the Consuls had the conduct thereof, he hath not set downe withall: also, that before Luceria, there were on both parts many slaine: and how in that battell, there was a temple vowed to Iupiter Stator, like as Romulus had done before in times past: howbeit, before this time, there was no temple erected, but onely a Fanum, [i.e. a place pronounced, destined, and consecrated before, to build a temple on.] But in this yeere at last, the citie being now twise bound and obliged to performe one and the same vow, made a consecration of it, and moved the Senate to decree and take order, that the house and temple aforesaid should beedified accordingly.

After this yeere, there succeeded a brave and noble Consull, L. Papyrius Cursor, as well in regard of his fathers glorie, as his owne reputation: Also a mightie great warre, and such a victorie as never any Generall wan the like at the Samnites hands before that day, but L. Papyrius againe the Consuls father. And as it fell out, they made the like preparation for warre, with the same endeavour and furniture of most costly and brave armors, as before time. Moreover, they used the helpe and favour of the gods besides, by a strange kind of induction and institution of the soldiours, binding them to take their oath, after an old ceremoniall custome, as if they were to take orders in some holy mysteries; yea and levied musters throughout all Samnium, after a newe forme forme of a law and edict: That whosoever of the younger sort and serviceable men, fit to beare arms, shewed not themselves, & gave attendance at the Generals appointmēt and proclamation, and whosoever departed without his leave and licence, his head should be forfeit unto Capitulum as accursed and damned. Which done, the Remus-virus was appointed at Aquilonia, for all the forces to assemble. Where there gathered together, to the number of forty thousand fighting men, even the whole flower and manhood of Samnium. There about the midst of the campe, was a plot of ground set out, well fenced and enclosed all about with hedges and bords, and the same covered all over with linnen clothes; the place was two hundred foot square, every way. Then there was a solemne sacrifice celebrated, and divine service said, according to an order read out of an old booke made of linnen, and the same, by a certaine Priest, one Ovius Paccius, a very aged man: who avouched, that he set these sacred and holy ceremonies from the old ancient religion of the Samnites, according to the manner and custome, which in times past their ancestors had used, at what time as they comploted secretly, and conspired, to surprise Capitulum out of the Tuscans hands. When the sacrifice was done, the General of the armie by his Purservant at armes, commaunded to cite and call forth by name, the noblest persons, either for parentage, or acts atchieved: who were brought into the place aforesaid, one by one. Amongst other preparations of this sacred solemnitie (which were able to strike a religious feare and devotion in a mans mind) there were certaine altars erected in the midst of this place closely covered in all parts, and sacrifices lying flaine all about, and the Centurians standing round with their swords readie drawne. Then the souldior was caused to approach neere the altars (like a sacrifice himselfe, rather than one that should have his part of the sacrifice). & urged by vertue of an oth, to promise, that he would never utter abroad and reveale, whatsoever hee there should see or heare. Afterward, he was put to sweare, after an horrible and dreadfull forme of words, framed and tending expressly to the cursing of his owne person, his house and all his race and linage; in case, he went not into any battell, wheresoever the Generals should lead him; and if either himselfe fled out of the field, or saw any one to run away, and slue him not outright in the place. At the first verily, some there were that refused to take such an oth, and presently were massacred by the altars side. And lying there along together with the beasts, which had their throats cut for sacrifices, they served for a warning, to teach all the rest how they made refusal. When the chiefe of the Samnits had taken this abominable and cursed oth, ten of them were elected and nominated by the soveraigne captaine, who every one had in charge to chuse himselfe a fellow, & they likewise successively to take other to them, man by man, untill they had made up the number of 16000. And these were called Linteata Legio [i. the linnen Legion] taking the name of the covering of that enclosure, wherein the Nobilitie of the Samnites was sworn. These had given unto them brave and glorious armour, with helmets crested and plumed, because they should seeme taller than theret. Another armie there was, consisting of twentie thousand and better, who neither in goodly and tall personage, nor in martiall proesse and reputation, ne yet in furniture and setting out, were inferiour unto the linnen Legion aforesaid. Lo, what a number there was of fighting men, even the whole strength and manhood of all Samnium, assembled and encamped in Aquilonia.

The Romane Consuls tooke their journey from the cittie of Rome, and C. Carvilius first unto whom were appointed the old Legions, which M. Attilius the Consull of the former years, had left in the territorie of Interamna. And with them he marched into Samnium. And mean while that the enemies were overmuch busied and amused about their superstitious ceremonies, and held their secret and mysticall counsels, he woon by force from the Samnits, the towne Amiternum. Where almost 2800 men were slaine, and 4270 taken prisoners. But Papirius, having by direction from the Senat enrolled a new armie, forced the towne Duronia; tooke fewer prisoners than his Colleague, but in lieu thereof, put many more to the sword. A rich bootie there was gotten, both in the one place and the other. Afterwards, the Consuls overran the whole countrie of Samnium, but they spoiled & wasted especially the lands about Arinum. Carvilius marched as far as Cominium, and Papirius to Aquilonia, where the whole power of the Samnites lay encamped. There, for a good while they neither sat still, & were altogether idle in the campe, ne yet was there any hot service in the field. They spent the time in provoking them to fight, that gladly would have listen still; or in lying off & giving ground, to those that assailed them: & thus, I say, with threatening, rather than offering battell, they passed the day. For whiles they began eff-

A sabbons, and gave over anon; there was no issue seene of any skirmishes, and the decision even of small matters and occurrences were prolonged and put off from day to day. The other campe of the Romaines lay twentie miles off: and albeit the other Consull was absent, yet his hand and counsell was in every enterprise and exploit. For as there lay a greater weight & charge at Aquilonia, than at Cominium: so Carvilius had a more carefull eye that way, than to the place which himselfe besieged. L. Papirius being now at all points provided to fight, dispatched a messenger to his Colleague, to signifie unto him; that he minded the next day, if he were not checked by the Auspices, to give the enemy battaille: and withall, that it was expedient and needefull; that he likewise should with all his forces assault Cominium; that the Samnites within, might have neither meanes nor leysure to send any succour to Aquilonia. This post had that one day allowed him to do his message, and attend his dispatch; and by night he made returne, and brought word unto the Consull from his Colleague, that he liked well of his purpose and advice. Papirius then immediately dismissed and sent away the courriers aforesaid, and assembled his souldiers to an audience, where he discoursed at large concerning warre in general. Much he spake also as touching the present preparation and magnificent furniture of the enemies, more brave & goodly for show and ostentation, than effectual and of importance in the end: For they are not the plumed crests (quoth he) that give the deadly wounds, but the Romaines speare and lance: it is that is able to pierce their guilded and damasked shields: yea, and that other glittering armie with milke-white diaper coates, must be died red in blood, when they come to strokes, and to try it out by dint of sword. The golden and silverd armies of the Samnites, were sometimes by my father put to the sword, and killed to the last man: and they saved rather their rich spoiles to honour the victorious enemy, than for armour of proesse, to defend and save themselves. This is a fatal gift, and destined to our name and familie, for to bechisten Generals, and to be opposed against the greatest puissance and attempts of the Samnites, and to bring away with them, those spoiles which might be ornaments to beautifie the publicke places of the citie. And the immortall gods no doubt are present to defend and assist us in our quarell, against those that so oft have sought for peace and alliance, and as often broken the same themselves. And if a man may conjecture and guesse of the will and providence of the gods, they never were to any armie more adverse and full of indignitie, than to that, which being stained and polluted with the blood of beasts and men, massacred and mingled together in an horrible and execrable kinde of sacrifice, and devoted to a double anger of the gods, having in dread and horror of one side, the vengeance of the same gods, witnesses of their breach of covenants with the Romaines; and on the other side the detestable and abominable curses, comprised in an oth, taken against all covenant and promise; hath sworn by constraint and perforce; hateth and detesteth the oth whereby they are perjured, and at one time, is in feare of the gods, of their owne selves, and their enemies. Thus having shewed unto his souldiours (who were already of themselves badly and maliciously enough bent against the enemies) that he had certaine intelligence of all these things, by the constant relation ayverted by certaine fugitives that were fled from them unto him; they all being now full of assured hope of Gods help, and mans, with one united forme crie called for battaille: and nothing grieved them more than this, That it was put off untill the morow; hating in their hearts the rest of that day behind, & that one night, for being frowning. About midnight, Papirius having received letters back from his Colleague, gat him up closely when all were fast asleepe, and sent the chick-maister to take token, and observe the presage of the pullets. There was not one throughout the whole campe, of what qualitie or degree soever, but had a desire to fight. The highest as well as the lowest were earnest and eager: the Captaines might behold & see the souldiours affection & courage: that way, and the souldiour likewise the Captaines; in so much as the same ardent desire of battaille which was in all the rest, reached also even to those that had the charge of the Auspices. For when as the chickens would not peck, the chick-maister adventured to lye and falsifie the token, and made report to the Consull, that it was Tripudium solistimum. Whereat the Consull right glad and joyous, pronounced that the token was huckle, and that they were to fight under the favour and conduct of the gods: and hereupon he put forth the signall or bloudie banner of battaille. As he was now marching forth into the field with his armie, behold a fugitive out of the enemies campe, brought word, that twentie cohorts or companies of Samnites, and those were about 400 in a cohort, were gone to Cominium.

The chickens felt to their nature so eagerly, that with their hasty feeding, some came fell from their bills to the ground, and rebounded againe: and this was Tripudium solistimum, and in their leaping was repared the best Auspicium in that kind, and presaged most happy success.

Cominium. And because his Colleague Carvilius should not be ignorant hereof; he presently dispatched a currier in post unto him, and himselfe commanded the Ensignes and Standards to be advanced and set forward with speede, ordering the bands in the reeward for succours; and disposing them in divers places, with Captaines over the same, accordingly. He appointed L. Volumnii to leade the right wing, and L. Scipio the left, and the horsemen he committed to the conduct of two other Lieutenants, C. Ceditius, and Trebonius. As for Sp. Naktius, he charged him in all hast to take off the packadles from the Mules, and to mount the cohorts of the light armed footmen that serve in the wings, upon their backs, and with them to fetch a compass, and to seize upon an hill there in sight, and in the heate of the medley, to shew himselfe from thence, and to raise as great a cloud of dust as possible he could. Whiles the Generall was occupied hereabout, there arose some warbling amongst the chicken-maisters touching the auspice, or presage of that day; in so much as they were overheard of the Romane horsemen, who supposing it a matter of good consequence and to be regarded, advertised Sp. Pappius (the Consuls nephew, or brothers sonne) that there was some doubt and question about the Auspice. The youth, borne in those dayes when there were no Atheists, nor lectures red of despising Gods and religion; enquired farther into the matter, because he would not certifie any thing whereof he was not sure: and when he had found out the truth, gave knowledge thereof to the Consull: who sayd thus unto him, God blese thee my sonne: and be not thou dismayed therat; but fight hardly more valiantly, and do thy best devoir. As for him, that hath the charge and oversight of the birds & Auspice, if he have made a wrong report, and given up a contrary presage, or false signe, all the mischief and perill light upon his owne head for his lewd lie. As for me, I was told of a Tripudium, and that the birds fell hartily to their meat: and I hold it for a luckie auspice and token of good successe unto the people of Rome and the armie, and for no other. This sayd, he commanded the Centurions to set those pulletors, in the forefront of the battaile. The Samnites also for their part set forward their ensignes, and their battaillons follow after, gallantly set out in gorgeous armour and brave apparell, in such sort, as the very sight of the enemies represented a magnificent and stately shew to the beholders. But see what hapned; before the first shout given, before the first vollie of shot and encounter, the principall pulletier chaunced to be stricken with a lavelin, launched at adventure and at randon, and fell downe dead even before the ensignes. Which being reported unto the Consull, Behold the handiwork of God (quoth he) the gods are present in this battaile; the guiltie person hath his due reward. And as the Consull was speaking these words, lo, just before him a Raven set out a wide cleere throate, & cryed with a lowd note: at which Augurie, the Cos. rejoyced, and avowed, that the gods appeared never in mens affaires more evidently. And herewith he commanded the trumpets to sound, and to scrup a lustie shout: then followed a cruell and terrible fight on both sides, but with harts and courages farre unlike. The Romanes were ravished and carried on end to the battaile, with anger, hope, and heate of conflict, greedie of bathing their swords, and embruing their hands in the enemies bloodhead. But the Samnites many of them, by force of necessitie, and constraint of a blind and superstitious religion, even against their wils, were forced to make resistance, and defend themselves rather than to fight and offend the enemy. Neither had they susteined and held out the first shout, charge, and shock of the Romanes (as having now for certain yeares past bene used evermore to go away defeated and vanquished) but that a mightier feare imprinted and sealed in their heart rootes, held them perforce from running away: for they ever had continually represented in their eye, the whole furniture of that secret sacrifice; of those armed sacrificers and priests with naked swords of that hideous butchery of men and of brute beasts, lying slaine one with another in their blood intermingled together; of the altars besprinkled and stained with the lawfull sheading of the one, & the detestable effusion of the other; of the dreadfull and horrible execrations; and to conclude, of that frantick, furious, and detestable forme of words, composed and devised to the detestation and malediction of their line and race. Being fast bound, I say, with these bonds for fleeing away, they stood to it, and stirred not back, fearing their owne countrymen more than the enemies. The Romanes from both points, and from the middle and maine battaillon charged hotely, beat them downe, killed and cut them in pieces; thus amazed and astonied as they were with dread of gods, and awe of man. Small resistance made they, as who only feared to flye and run away: so as by this time, there was execution and havock made of them almost to the very Standards. At which very instant, there appeared overthwart

A thwart from the one side a dust, as if a mightie armie had raysed it in their march; namely Sp. Naktius (or as some say Ostavian Metius) who had the leading of certaine Cohorts called Alarici, mounted upon Mules, which for the nonce made a dust greater than somewhat number they were. For those warpers and new horsemen, as they ran on their Mules and Sumpter beasts, drew after them trailing on the ground, boughes of trees full of branches and leaves: and first, there appeared in the fore-front (as it were) through a dusky and dimme light, their armour and guidons; but the dust behind them, rising higher and thicker made shew of a troble of horsemen flanking an armie of footmen: wherewith not onely the Samnites but Romanes also were deceived. And the Consull himselfe, to avoyd the distrust and beare them downe, it was so said lowde amongst the forriest ensignes, so as his voice reached unto his enemies, That Cominium was won, and his brother Consull was comie with victory; and therefore they should endeavor and enforce themselves to get the day: before that the battaile should win the honor out of their hands. Thus cried he out on horsebacke galloping along the ranks too and fro. Then he commanded the Colonels and Centurions, to make a way for the meivof times: Himselfe afore, had killed Trebonius and Ceditius, that when they opposed him to beare his speare upright & to shake it, then they should with all the might they had; pursue the Cavallerie and charge the enemies. Everie thing was done at a becke, according as they were directed, and entrusted before hand. The waies were made wide betwene the files. The horsemen flung out, and with speare in rest charge upon the middle battaillon of the enemies, and brake their arrayes whosoever they charged. Volumnii and Scipio seconded them with the Infanterie; and while they were disarrayed overthrew them, and bare them to the ground. C Downe went these linnen Cohorts now; when God and man fought against them, and were discomfited: and as well those that broke the oth, and the other that were unsworne, fled amaine; and without respect of one thing or other, feared none but their enemies. All the footmen that escaped the battaile, were beaten into their campe at Aquilonia. The gentlemen and the men of armes fled toward Bovianum. The Cavallerie of the Romanes pursued the horsemen; and the Infanterie chased the footmen. The wings tooke divers waies, the right toward the campe of the Samnites, the left unto the towne. Volumnii was somewhat before, and got the campe. Scipio found more resistance in the cittie: not for that vanquished men, as they were, had more courage and resolution, but because that wals are stronger to endure an assault, and better to keepe outarmed men, than a plaine trench and rampier. For, from the courtine, with stones they beat and repulld the enemy. Scipio foreseeing well enough that they should be longer about the assault of a strong and fenced town, unlesse he dispatched the matter quickly & went through with it, in their first affright and confusion, before theyooke heart againe: demanded of his soldiers, If they could take it well, and abide to see the campe wonne by the other point of the battaile; and themselves (being likewise conquerors) to be repelled from the citie gates? When they allcried, No; and said they would never endure that disgrace: himselfe with his target over his head, approached the gate, the others following after under a target fence, rush into the citie, thrust downe the Samnites about the gate; and gat to the walles: but to engage themselves farther into the citie, they durst not, being so fewe as they were. The Consull himselfe at the first knew nothing of all this, but was occupied about the retreat; and rallying of his men: for now the sunne was well neere down; and the night coming on apace, caused every thing even to the verie victours to seeme dangerous and suspicious. But when he was advanced farther, he saw on the right hand the campe taken: and on the left, he heard a confused crie and blunder in the citie, compounded of the noise of fighting men; and frighted persons: and even at that instant, it fortune, that they skirmished at the gate. Then he rode on neerer and neerer, and saw his owne men upon the wals, howbeit nothing yet fully personified: but through the rash adventure and foolhardines of some few, an overture onely made; and some advantage gotten of performing a great peece of service and a worthie exploit. Wherupon he commanded the forces that were retired to be called, and with banner displayed to enter the citie. So soone as they were in, they tooke the next quarter to the gate; and for that the night approached, there they rested, and went no farther. But even in this verie night, the enemies abandoned the towne. There were slaine that day, before Aquilonia 3030 Samnites, and 3890 taken prisoners: and of field ensignes they went away with 90. Moreover this is reported and recorded of Pappius, that there had not bene lightly scene a Generall in any battaile more li ghesome lightsome, cheerfull and merie; were it of his owne naturall disposition, or upon assured confidence of victorie. Upon which courage and resolution, he could not be revoked from battaile, albeit there was some question and scruple about the Auspices: and even in the hottest time and dangerous point of the conflict, at what time as the manner is to vow temples to the immortal gods: he vowed unto Jupiter Victor, If so be that he defeated the Legions of the enemies, to present him with a cup of sweet and pleasant mead, before he drinke any strong and headie wine of the grape: which vow the gods accepted and liked of, and turned the ill presage of the Auspices, to good.

The other Consul had as good speed at Cominium: For at the break of day, he approached with all his forces to the wals of the towne, and invested it round about: and set strong guards at the gates, for feare they should yssue or fall forth. And even as he was about to give the signal of assault, there came a messenger post from his fellow Consul who in great affright brought word of the coming of twentie cohorts to the succor of them within the citie, which both kept him short from giving the assault, and caused him to call back againe part of his forces, which were arranged and readie under the counter Scarpe to assaile the defendants. Then he gave charge to Decius Brutus Scaeva, one of the Lieutenants, to take the first legion, and twentie cohorts of the wings, and other horsemen, to make head against the rescue of the enemies aforesaid; and where soever he met them, to take them, to smother them, yet and if occasion served, to give them battaile, and in no case to suffer that power to come to Cominium. Himselfe commaunded that ladders should be reared on everie side of the towne, and under a sense of targets approached the gates. So that in one instant the gates were burst open, and the wals scaled on every part. The Samnites, as their hearts served them well enough to keepe the enemies from entrance, before they saw any armed men upon the wals: so, after they perceived, that they were assailed not above with stones and darts, but fast by and with hand strokes: and how that they, who hardly and with great difficultie from the plain gat up the wals, having now gained & surmounted the place (which they most feared before) could fight at ease from aloft with their enemies, who was not able to match them in the even ground, quit their towers and wals, and gathered all together in the market place, and there for a while tried the utmost hazard of battaile. But afterwards throwing downe their weapons, 15400. of them yielded themselves to the Consul his mercie. There were slaine 4380. Thus went the game at Cominium, and thus at Aquilonia.

In the mid way between these two citie, where a third battaile was looked for, the enemies were not to be found. And when they were seven miles off from Cominium, they had a counter-maund from their owne countie men, and were called away, and so came not to the rescue, neither in the one battaile nor the other. In the shutting in of the evening, when it began to bee darke, being within the sight of the campe of one hand, and Aquilonia on the other, they might heare a like noise and crie from both parts, which caused them to pause. But afterwards, when they were over against the campe which was fired by the Romanes; the flame spreading farre abroad declared the diffature of the Samnites more evidently, and staied them there for going farther. In which verie place, they laid them downe here and there in their armour (as they were) and passed a restless and unquiet long night, expecting (and yet fearing) the light of the day. At the dauning whereof, and so soone as it began to peepe, while they were uncertaine, and doubtfull what way to take, they hapned to be discovered by the Cavallerie of the enemies, and suddainly in a fearefull amaze and affright, they tooke them to their heeles and fled in great disorder. Those horsemen having pursued the Samnites, who in the night season escaped out of the towne, chaunced to espie this foresaid multitude, and perceived they were neither enticed, nor defended with a good corps de gard. This companie was descried also: even from the wals of Aquilonia: whereupon, by this time, the Legionarie footmen likewise made after them; but they, could not overtake them in the chase, so fast they fled: howbeit the horsemen cut off some, and slew two hundred and fourescore in the taile of the retreat. In this affright they left much armour behind them, and eighteen ensignes, and so the rest of the armie saved themselves, and as well as they might in so fearefull confusion, recovered Bovianum. The joy of these two Romanes armies was wonderfully increased, to see one another have so good and fortunat successe in their enterprises. Both the Consuls, by ech others advise and consent, gave their towns thus woon, unto their soldiours, to be sacked and rifled: and after the goods were out, to set fire on the emptie houses; in such wise, that in one and the same day, both Aquilonia and Cominium were burnt.

A burnt as a host, and the Consuls, with mutuall congratulation and joy, as well betwene their Legions as themselves, feasting one another, joined both their camps in one. Afterwards in the sight of both armies Carthaginius highly commended and praised his soldiours, severie one as he desired, and rewarded them with gifts accordingly. Papirius also for his part, who had performed many & sundrie hardnes as well in the field and battaile, as about the winning of the camp and forcing the citie, bestowed by way of honour upon Sp. Nautius, and Sp. Papirius his brothes son, as also upon foure Centurions, and the band of the Hastati oraveliniers, brailes and coronets of gold: and namely Nautius, for that he bare himselfe so worthily in that journey & expedition, wherein with his counterfeite troupe of horsemen upon Mules, he so terrified the enemies, as if he had conducted a maine armie of men of armes: and young Papirius, for his good service with his Cavalles as well in the battaile and medley, as also in that night, wherein he forced the Samnites to the secrecy, and quit the citie Aquilonia: the Centurions and souldiours, in this regard, that they were the first who seized the gates and wals of that towne: as for all the horsemen in consideration of their manifold travaile, and brave devoute shewed in sundrie places, he gave them brailes and little hornes of silver. Thus done, for as much as it was time now to withdraw their armie from out of Samnium, either both twaine, or one of them alone; they fate in counsell and consultation thereupon: and thought it was the better course (to the end that the Samnites might be brought lower, and their state more sensibly decayed) to go forward still, and charge them with greater force and resolution, and to pursue the rest that was behinde; that Samnium might be delivered up to the Consuls their successours, utterly ramed and subdued. Since that the enemies now had no armie abroad in field, like either to give or abide another battaile; and there remained but one manner of making warre, even to besiege and assaile their cities and strong townes; by the winning and subversion whereof, they might with the pillage enrich and make their owne souldiours for ever, and withall empoverish their enemies; and make a hand of them quite, being now at the last cast, forced to fight for church and home. Hereupon the Consuls dispatched their letters to the Senate and people of Rome, containing the effect at large of all their exploits; and then divided themselves, and tooke two severall wayes: Papirius marched with his legions to the siege of Sepinum; and Carvilius with his, to besiege Volturna.

The Consuls letters were read and heard with exceeding joy, as well in the court of the counsell of the citie, as in the common hall of assemblies; and this publick contentment and rejoycing was solemnized with generall processions, for the space of foure dayes, and with marvelous zeale, affection, and devotion of private persons in particular. And to say a truth, this victorie was to the state of Rome not only great and honorable, but also of great consequence, in regard that it fell out in so good & commodious a time. For even then, newes came, that Tuscanes was revolted and rebelled, and men began to cast in their minds, and discourse how they should do (in case ought should happen but well in Samnium) to withstand the forces and invasions of the Tuscanes: who taking heart, and presuming upon the Samnites, and their cursed and execrable oth, by vertue whereof they were obliged to fight to the utterance and extremitie, imbraced the occasion and opportunitie of taking armes againe, while both the Consuls and the whole forces of Rome were diverted and withdrawne into Samnium, and there employed. The Embassadors of their allies and confederates, were by M. Atilius the Pretor brought into the Senate, and had audience given them; where they complained, that their territories were overrun, burnt, and spoiled, by the Tuscanes their next neighbours, and all because they were unwilling to revolt from the people of Rome: humble beseeching the LL. of the Senate, to defend and protect them against the violence, wrong, and outrage of common enemies. Answer was returned unto the embassadors: That the Senate would have regard, that their allies should have no cause to repent of their faithfull allegiance, and constant loyaltie; and that ere many dayes went over their heads, the Tuscanes should tast of the same cup that the Samnites had begun unto them. Howbeit, they would have bene slack and cold enough in dealing with the Tuscanes, had not fresh newes come, that the Falisci also, who had for many yeares continued in amitie and friendship with the people of Rome, were combined with the Tuscanes, and enticed into armes, as well as they. The neere neighbourhood of this nation, gave an edge to the Senators; and wher them on, to take care and ordeine, that their Feciall Heraults should be addressed thither, to demand restitution and amends for harmes done: which being denied, and no goods restored; by the advice and authority of the Senate, together with the grant of the people, warre was proclaimed against the Tuscans: and the Consuls were commanded to call lots, whither of them should passe out of Samnium with his forces, into Tuscanie.

By this time now Carvilius had wooen Volana, Palumbinium, & Herculanum, towne appertaining to the Samnites. Volana was forced within few daies: Palumbinium, the same day that he came before the walls: but at Herculanum, he fought two severall battailes, with doubtfull and uncertaine issue; yea and with more losse of his owne part, than of the enemies. But afterwards, he pitched his campe before the towne, beleaguered the enemies, and kept them within their walls, gave the assault, and wooen it in the end. In these three townes there were either taken prisoners or slaine in all, to the number of ten thousand: but so, as through fear the greater part by farre, suffered themselves to be captives, rather then to dye on the edge of the sword.
